Structure in Design

Structure is at the heart of all our buildings, and plays an unique role in the safety of our built environments. While often hidden, structure can be one of the most interesting and expressive aspects of a building. Beginning with basic structural principles, the class will engage in several hands-on exercises exploring structure as an important architectural element.

Students who successfully complete Structure in Design will receive a certificate and completed projects may be used in a portfolio for application to architecture and design schools.

Architecture + Design Days at the University of Memphis is an exciting series of one-day programs developed for high school students (grades 9-12) who are interested in learning more about the built environment and the professions of architecture and interior architecture. Each class focuses on an aspect of design practice. The program is sponsored by the University of Memphis, Department of Architecture, in partnership with AIA Memphis, a chapter of the American Institute of Architects.
