

Abstract

This paper explores what it means to move forward as a Nation when race and racism remain entrenched in public policy at every level. Using the lens of Critical Race Theory, the panelists interrogate the possibilities for change in the lives of youth and schooling practices. Critical Race Theory employs legal literature to explore how race and racism is filtered through legislation, interpreted into policy, and manipulated by individuals and institutions to continue inequitable practices suffered by people of color.