

ENGL 4243 and 6243: Studies in British Literature
Cristina Maria Cervone
cmcervone@memphis.edu
spring 2022, MW 2:20 - 3:45

Romance: A Journey Through Time

Genres are notoriously difficult to pin down and romance is no exception. From its origins in wanderings and quests, to its contested relationship with the origin of the novel, to its present-day association with bodice-rippers and the like, romance has seen many incarnations over time. In this course, we will privilege romance's underlying sense of a fantastical story of travel and adventure. Drawn from a time span encompassing more than 800 years, readings include the twelfth-century lais of Marie de France; the thirteenth-century Roman de Silence; a fourteenth-century retelling of the Orpheus legend, Sir Orfeo; Sir Thomas Malory's fifteenth-century Le Morte d'Arthur; William Shakespeare's early seventeenth-century The Tempest; from the eighteenth century, Eliza Haywood's Fantomina: or, Love in a Maze and Horace Walpole's The Castle of Otranto: A Gothic Story; from the nineteenth century, Edwin Abbott Abbott's Flatland: A Romance of Many Dimensions, and H. G. Wells's The Invisible Man: A Grotesque Romance; and from the twentieth century, J. R. R. Tolkien's The Hobbit: or, There and Back Again. So, we will encounter knights and ladies, werewolves, cross-dressers, fairies, white magic, and geometric figures, among other interesting characters. In the process, we will consider the role of love, the use of poetic or novelistic forms, vernacular language, and the prevalence of the fantastical or wondrous.

Course requirements for 4243 will include weekly response papers, a close-reading presentation, a close-reading paper, and a researched paper or project; for 6243 a researched presentation, close-reading paper, book summary and critique, and researched paper or project.