J. Chicago Roundtable Discussion – July 31, 2015

This interactive roundtable discussion was presented via the American Bar Association Coalition on Racial and Ethnic Justice, the Council for Racial and Ethnic Diversity in the Educational Pipeline and the ABA Criminal Justice Section. This program was part of the American Bar Association's 2015 Annual Meeting. The roundtable highlighted what we learned from the Town Hall meetings and focused on solutions that the ABA could support to reverse the negative trends.

Speakers included:

- Paulette Brown, President-Elect, American Bar Association 2014–2015
- Leigh-Ann Buchanan, Business Litigation Attorney; Incoming Chair, COREJ
- Patty Ferguson-Bohnee, Faculty Director, Indian Legal Program; Director, Indian Legal Clinic
- Dr. Nancy Heitzeg, Professor of Sociology, St. Catherine University; Co-Director, Interdisciplinary Critical Studies of Race/Ethnicity Program
- Craig Holden, President, California State Bar
- Sarah E. Redfield, Professor Emeritus, University of New Hampshire School of Law, Moderator
- Jessica Schneider, Staff Attorney, Educational Equity and Fair Housing Projects, Chicago Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law
- Rev. Dr. Janette C. Wilson, Senior Advisor, Operation PUSH, Chicago, IL

APPENDIX A. SELECTED CURRENT LEGISLATIVE INITIATIVES

Legislation eliminating criminalizing student misbehavior that does not endanger others

Several states have undertaken reforms to reduce the severity of punishments for non-violent infractions. These measures have generally been enacted as part of repealing zero-tolerance policies that mandated suspension or expulsion for certain offenses. In 2013, Oregon repealed its zero-tolerance policy[480] and replaced it with a set of guidelines[481] that limit expulsions to "conduct that poses a threat to the health and safety of students or school employees."[482] In 2009, Florida significantly amended its zero-tolerance policy[483] to clarify that the provision is "not intended to be rigorously applied to petty acts of misconduct."[484] The amendment also requires school boards to "[d]efine acts that pose a serious threat to school safety" and thus warrant the application of zero-tolerance.[485]

480. H.B. 2192, 77th Leg., 2013 Reg. Sess. § 5 (Or. 2013).
481. Id. § 5(2)(a).

More sweeping legislation goes beyond the repeal of harsh punishment and prescribes alternative methods of discipline for student behavior that does not endanger others. Legislators in Tennessee and Texas are currently debating bills that would mandate alternative punishments and graduated disciplinary models for truancy offenses.[486] The Florida Senate is considering broader legislation that would prohibit schools from referring students to the criminal justice system for "petty acts of misconduct."[487] It would also require law enforcement officials to notify a school's administration of student arrests, thereby creating a barrier between student misconduct and the criminal justice system.[488]

Legislation eliminating the use of suspensions, expulsions, and referrals to law enforcement for lower-level offenses

Three states have taken concrete steps to reduce the use of suspensions and expulsions as a discipline strategy. In September 2014, California signed Assembly Bill 420, which eliminated "willful defiance" and "disruption of school activities" as a basis to 482. Id. § 5(2)(b)(A).

---

483. S.B. 1540, 2009 Leg., 111th Reg. Sess. (Fla. 2009) (amending FLA. STAT. § 1006.13 (2015)).

484. FLA. STAT. § 1006.13(1) (2015).

485. Id. § 1006.13(2)(b).

486. H.B. 1349, 190th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2015) ("As an alternative to criminal prosecution for education neglect, a school district shall adopt progressive truancy interventions . . . . [to] [m]inimize the need for referral to juvenile court."); H.B. 1490, 84th Legis., Reg. Sess (Tex. 2015) (introducing a "Progressive Truancy Intervention System" and requiring that systems adopted by school districts "must include at least three tiers of interventions").

487. S.B. 490, 2016 Leg., 118th Reg. Sess. (Fla. 2015). Existing law allows school boards to define "petty acts of misconduct." See FLA. STAT. § 1006.13(2)(c).

488. See S.B. 490, 2016 Leg., 118th Reg. Sess. (Fla. 2015).

expel students.[489] Further, Assembly Bill 420 also prohibits schools from using those reasons as a basis to suspend students enrolled in kindergarten through the third grade.[490] Connecticut,[491] Louisiana,[492] and the District of Columbia[493] have passed similar laws prohibiting the suspension or expulsion of young students. Georgia[494] and Minnesota[495] are considering such legislation during the current session. Maryland now requires school districts to adopt policies that impose certain requirements on schools before they can suspend or expel a student. For example, regarding suspensions of ten days or more or expulsion, the superintendent (or his designated representative) must investigate and approve the suspension and meet with the student's parents.[496] Illinois also passed significant reforms. Under a new law passed in 2015, suspensions of three days or less are allowed only if a student poses a threat to others or "substantially disrupts, impedes, or interferes with the operation of the school."[497] Suspensions longer than three days, expulsions, or transfers to alternative schools are only permitted if the student poses a threat or significantly disrupts

---

489. See Assemb. B. 420, 2014 Leg., Reg. Sess. (Cal. 2014) (amending CAL. EDUC. CODE § 48900 (2015)); see also Susan Frey, New Law Limits Student Discipline Measure, EDSOURCE (Sept. 28, 2014), http://edsource.org/2014/new-law-limits-student-discipline-measure/67836.

490. See Cal. Assemb. B. 420.

491. Act of June 22, 2015, Pub. Act No. 15-96, 2015 Conn. Pub. Acts 96 (Conn. 2015) (prohibiting expulsion and out-of-school suspensions for students in grades pre-kindergarten through two).

492. S.B. 54, 2015 Leg., Reg. Sess. (La. 2015) (prohibiting the suspension or expulsion of students in grades pre-kindergarten through five).

493. Act of May 6, 2015, D.C. Act No. 21-50, 2015 D.C. Sess. Leg. Serv. 21-12 (D.C. 2015) (prohibiting the suspension or expulsion of pre-kindergarten students).

494. Too Young to Suspend Act, H.B. 135, 153rd Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Ga. 2015) (prohibiting the suspension or expulsion of pre-kindergarten and kindergarten students for most offenses).

495. S.F. 1001, 2015 Leg., 89th Sess. (Minn. 2015) (prohibiting the suspension, exclusion, or expulsion of students in grades pre-kindergarten through three).

496. MD. CODE ANN., EDUC. § 7-305(a)-(d) (West 2015).

497. 105 ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. 5/10-22.6(b-20) (West 2015).

the learning environment, but only after other disciplinary options have been exhausted.[498]

Legislation to Support school policy and agreements that clarify the distinction between educator discipline and law enforcement discipline

State legislatures should require schools that rely on SROs to enter into written agreements or memorandums of understandings (MOUs), ideally before establishing an SRO program, to ensure that SROs and school officials understand that SROs and other law enforcement should not become involved in routine-discipline matters. There may be philosophical differences between school officials and SROs that must be addressed before SROs begin working inside schools.[499] This MOU should clearly delineate all actors' roles and responsibilities.[500] A report that evaluated nineteen SRO programs stated that "[w]hen SRO programs fail to define the SROs' roles and responsibilities in detail before—or even after—the officers take up the posts in the schools, problems are often rampant—and often last for months and even years."[501] The U.S. Department of Education, the American Civil Liberties Union, the Congressional Research Service, the National Association for School Resource Officers, and the United States Department of Justice.[502] Several states support the 498. See id.; see also Evie Blad, New Illinois Law to Prompt Changes in Discipline Policies, EDUC. WEEK (Sept. 8, 2015), http://www.edweek.org/ew/articles/2015/09/09/new-illinois-law-to-prompt-changes-in.html.

499. See JAMES & MCCALLION, supra note 318, at 11.

500. Id.; see also DOJ FERGUSON, supra note 340, at 37.

501. PETER FINN ET AL., NAT'L INST. OF JUSTICE, COMPARISON OF PROGRAM ACTIVITIES AND LESSONS LEARNED AMONG 19 SCHOOL RESOURCE OFFICER (SRO) PROGRAMS 2 (2005), http://files.eric.ed.gov/fulltext/ED486266.pdf.

502. See JAMES & MCCALLION, supra note 318, at 11; KIM & GERONIMO, supra note 319, at 5; RAYMOND, supra note 318, at 30; U.S. DEP'T OF EDUC., GUIDING PRINCIPLES: A RESOURCE GUIDE FOR IMPROVING SCHOOL CLIMATE AND DISCIPLINE 9–10 (2014), http://www2.ed.gov/policy/gen/guid/school-discipline/guiding-principles.pdf; Lisa H. Thurau & Johanna Wald, Controlling Partners: When Law Enforcement Meets Discipline in Public Schools, 54 N.Y. L. SCH. L. REV. 977, 991 (2010).

use of MOUs if schools use SROs, including Indiana, Texas, Maryland, and Pennsylvania.[503]

Legislation requiring and providing financial support for training of SROs and police dealing with youth on appropriate strategies for LGBTQ students and students with disabilities.

In June 2015, Texas passed a law requiring the state's education commission to create a model training curriculum for SROs.[504] The legislature left the details of the training program to the commission, but it listed several objectives the curriculum must incorporate.[505] These objectives include "positive behavioral interventions and supports"[506] (PBIS), "restorative justice techniques,"[507] "de-escalation techniques and techniques for the limited use of force."[508]

---

503. See IND. CODE § 20-26-18.2 (2013); MD. CODE ANN., EDUC. § 26-102 (West 2014); TEX. EDUC. CODE ANN. § 37.0021 (West 2013). Pennsylvania has several fairly thorough regulations in regard to memorandums of understanding between police departments and schools. See 22 PA. CODE § 10.1 (2012) (setting forth the state's intent to "maintain a cooperative relationship between school entities and local police departments"); 22 PA. CODE § 10.2 (2012) (defining memorandum of understanding); 22 PA. CODE § 10.11 (2012) (requiring each school administrator to "execute and update, on a biennial basis, a memorandum of understanding with each local police department having jurisdiction over school property of the school entity."); 22 PA. CODE § 10 app. A (2012) (providing a model memorandum of understanding).

504. Act of June 20, 2015, ch. 2684 (Tex. 2015) (codified as TEX. OCC. CODE ANN. § 1701.262 (West 2015)). The curriculum will also apply to "school district peace officers," defined by TEX. EDUC. CODE ANN. § 37.081 (West 2015). TEX. OCC. CODE ANN. § 1701.262(a)(3) (West 2015).

505. TEX. OCC. CODE ANN. § 1701.262(c) (West 2015).

506. Id. § 1701.262(c)(2).

507. Id.; see The Institute for Restorative Justice and Restorative Dialogue, Restorative Discipline in Schools, http://www.utexas.edu/research/cswr/rji/rdinschools.html (explaining the philosophy of restorative justice); see also Thalia N.C. González & Benjamin Cairns, Moving Beyond Exclusion: Integrating Restorative Practices and Impacting School Culture in Denver Public Schools, in JUSTICE FOR KIDS: KEEPING KINDS OUT OF THE JUVENILE JUSTICE SYSTEM 241, 241 (Nancy E. Dowd ed., 2011); González, supra note 92 (discussing use of restorative justice to repair harm and change behavior, enhance school safety, and improve graduation rates).

508. Id. § 1701.262(c)(3).

Proposed legislation in several states is also attempting to rectify uncertainty about the role of SROs. Massachusetts House Bill 335 would create a fund to train SROs in de-escalation strategies—"strategies such as restorative justice."[509] Similarly, New Hampshire House Bill 527 seeks to establish guidelines for SRO education, including at least forty hours of training in techniques like PBIS and restorative justice.[510] Additionally, a bill under consideration in the Florida Senate would both limit SROs' authority to arrest students and direct police and school authorities to develop minimum qualifications for the selection of SROs.[511]

Legislation supporting alternative strategies to address student misbehavior, including Restorative Justice

In May 2015, Indiana passed a law[512] to amend the parameters of the state's "Safe Schools Fund," which was created in 1995 with a focus on detecting crime with methods such as drug-sniffing dogs.[513] This year's amendment, in contrast, provides grants for programs designed "to improve school climate and professional development and training" through the development of "alternatives to suspension and expulsion; and . . . evidence based practices . . . [including] positive behavioral intervention and support, restorative practices, and social emotional learning."[514]

New education provisions in Colorado,[515] Georgia,[516] Louisiana,[517] Maryland,[518] and Pennsylvania[519] also recognize 509. H.B. 335, 2015 Leg., 189th Gen. Ct. (Mass. 2015).

510. H.B. 527, 2015 Leg., Gen. Ct. (N.H. 2015).

511. S.B. 490, 2016 Legis., 118th Reg. Sess. (Fla. 2015).

512. Act of July 1, 2015, Pub. L. No. 220, 2015 Ind. Acts. 220 (amending IND. CODE § 5-2-10.1-2 (2015)).

513. Act of July 1, 1995, Pub. L. No. 61, 1995 Ind. Acts 61; see also IND. CODE § 5-2-10.1-2(a)(1)(A) (2015).

514. IND. CODE § 5-2-10.1-2(a)(7). See generally OWEN ET AL. , supra note 46.

515. COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 22-32-144 (West 2015) ("Restorative justice practices—legislative declaration.").

516. GA. CODE ANN. § 20-2-741 (West 2015) ("Positive behavioral interventions and supports and response to intervention.").

517. LA. STAT. ANN. §§ 17:252(A)(2)(g), (D)(1) (2015).

518. MD. CODE ANN., EDUC. § 7-304.1 (West 2015) ("Positive Behavioral Interventions and Support Program").

the need to implement alternative strategies like PBIS and restorative justice techniques. However, prescriptions for change have not always been explicitly linked to state resources.

Alternative discipline is gaining support in other states as well. Massachusetts, for example, is considering a bill to create a three-year pilot "dropout prevention and recovery program" that would incentivize schools, through a competitive grant process, to implement "evidence-based" strategies, including "restorative justice and social service referrals."[520] Similarly, a South Carolina bill would create a "Restorative Justice Study Committee" with the aim of developing a pilot program much like the one being debated in Massachusetts.[521] California may also require schools to adopt "one or more research-based, whole school approaches, including . . . positive behavior intervention and support, restorative justice . . . [and] social-emotional learning."[522]

Washington seems likely to pass Senate Bill 5688, which would allow school districts to use existing funds to develop "multitiered systems of support frameworks [including] . . . positive behavior interventions and supports and social emotional learning."[523]

Legislation supporting continued and more detailed data reporting relating to school discipline and juvenile detention and disproportionality

Maintaining and reporting data about each aspect of the school-to-prison pipeline is a basic necessity for reform. This data need be sufficiently disaggregated as to reflect specific state or area conditions as well as national trends. As part of initiatives aimed at reducing exclusionary discipline and criminalization, states have started to require school districts and schools to report 519. PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. §§ 13-1302-A(c)(1), (c)(3) (West 2015).

520. H.B. 453, 2015 Leg., 189th Gen. Ct. (Mass. 2015).

521. H.B. 3239, 2015 Gen. Assemb., 121st Sess. (S.C. 2015) (Stop the School House to Jail House Pipeline Act).

522. S.B. 527, 2015 Leg., Reg. Sess. (Cal. 2015).

523. S.B. 5688, 64th Leg., Reg. Sess. (Wash. 2015) (as passed by S. Rules Comm. on Mar. 6, 2015); see also H.B. 2149, 64th Leg., Reg. Sess. (Wash. 2015).

detailed information about their disciplinary practices and outcomes.

A recent Connecticut law reining in the authority of SROs, discussed above, requires school boards to submit detailed disciplinary data, which the state department of education will examine and report annually.[524]

Several states are pushing for more comprehensive reviews of their schools' disciplinary outcomes. A proposed Pennsylvania resolution would initiate a thorough study of disciplinary policies at state schools and a review of other states' policies, ultimately establishing an advisory committee to recommend new legislation.[525] Likewise, an Indiana bill would repeal and replace the state's existing data reporting requirement with a more detailed one.[526] Based on the data collected under this new requirement, Indiana's department of education would develop "a model evidence based plan for improving behavior and discipline within schools."[527] Additionally, in Louisiana, the state senate passed a resolution calling for the state's Board of Elementary and Secondary Education to study the effectiveness of PBIS programs as a means of reducing suspensions and expulsions.[528]

Connecticut has directed its department of education to disaggregate disciplinary data "by school, race, ethnicity, gender, age, students with disabilities, English language learners" and other categories.[529] In 2013, Arkansas amended its education code to provide for the collection of data on the "rate of disciplinary disparity" in its schools and to require school boards to implement corrective measures, including restorative justice techniques.[530] In the current session, a house bill under consideration in North Carolina would update the state board of education's reporting re-

524. H.B. 6834, 2015 Gen. Assemb., Jan. Sess., 2015 Conn. Pub. Acts 96 (Conn. 2015).

525. H.R. 540, 2015 Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Pa. 2015).

526. H.B. 1558, 2015 Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Ind. 2015).

527. Id.

528. S.R. 130, 2015 Leg., Reg. Sess. (La. 2015).

529. Act of July 1, 2015, Pub. Act No. 15-168, 2015 Conn. Pub. Acts 168.

530. ARK. CODE ANN. §§ 6-18-516(a)(3), (b), (e)(1)(B) (West 2015).

quirements to include data disaggregated by similar categories, with the express purpose of examining disproportionalities.[531]

Proposed legislation in other states would go further by mandating reductions in disciplinary disparities or by linking positive changes to funding incentives. For example, Indiana's House Bill 1558, discussed previously,[532] would require the state's department of education to "develop criteria and guidelines for determining the existence of disproportionality in discipline."[533] It would also create "the positive discipline practices fund," under which schools could apply for grants "to assist in the reduction of disproportionality in discipline and to establish positive disciplinary practices."[534] Similarly, a Washington bill designed to implement "strategies to close the educational opportunity gap" would create a task force to investigate disproportionalities, design model disciplinary practices, and adapt faculty and staff training to incorporate those practices.[535]

531. H.B. 819, 2015 Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (N.C. 2015).
532. See supra note 526 and accompanying text.
533. H.B. 1558, 119th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Ind. 2015).
534. Id.
535. H.B. 1541, 64th Leg., Reg. Sess. (Wash. 2015).

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force:
Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement
Appendix A

TERM	REASONING
A:
Aggravated Assault	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report.
Alcohol	Call police unless the alcohol was not consumed, shared or sold if your security can handle the situation. There is no legal distinction between possession, consumption, sharing and selling. If there is more than one student involved, then liability concerns lead most schools to make a police report. An online report can be made to document the incident, but not require police to come on site. Many schools also refer to community counseling programs, but some do not have the resources or information to do so.
Armed Robbery	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report.
Arson, of an occupied structure	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report.
Arson, of a structure or property(not occupied)	Call unless it causes little or no damage, there are no safety concerns and no intent to cause harm.
Assault	Defined as unwanted physical contact with injury. This term would not be used for a mutual conflict without injury, but if there is injury, it is a mandated report.
B:
Bomb Threat	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report.
Bullying	Bullying is not a legal term, but can represent a range of offenses. The response should be based on the actual offense. If there was a threat, harassment, intimidation, an assault or the behavior is persistent then administrators should call law enforcement. If a crime was not committed, then do not call law enforcement.
Burglary/ Breaking & Entering (2nd & 3rd Degree)	Call law enforcement. The definition for burglary does not consider the value of the items*; it is about being in a place you are not supposed to be with intent to do something you are not supposed to do.* Value and the amount of damage is important but the act of burglary is enough to call.
Burglary (1st Degree)	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report. The definition of 1st degree is that it is burglary committed with a deadly weapon or dangerous instrument.
C:

1 | Page

6/19/14

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force:
Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement
Appendix A

TERM	REASONING
Cheating	Do not call law enforcement
Chemical or Biological Threat	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report. These could be household items that can be mixed together to be explosive.
Computer and Telecommunications Device	Do not call unless the student commits another violation with a computer or telecommunication device. A computer violation alone would not require law enforcement contact.
Contraband	Be specific and list the violation under the type of contraband it is. If the student has illegal drugs, it should be documented as a drug violation. If an item is against school policy but legal, then law enforcement should not be called.
D:
Dangerous Items (Air Soft Gun, BB Gun, Knife with blade less than 2.5 inches, Laser pointer, Letter Opener, Mace, Paintball Gun, Pellet Gun, Taser or Stun Gun)	Do not call law enforcement unless the items are used, or there is immediate danger that they will be used. These items are not illegal to possess, but are against school policy. They should be confiscated, and the school should give consequences for possessing them at school, but police should not be contacted.
Defiance, Disrespect of Authority, and Non-Compliance	Do not call unless there is a specified clear threat to the safety of students, staff or self. If the situation escalates, the violation should be classified as a higher offense.
Disruption	Do not call law enforcement.
Dress Code Violation	Do not call law enforcement.
Drug Paraphernalia	Call law enforcement if there is residue or if there is paraphernalia that is associated with narcotics. The residue is what makes the paraphernalia illegal to possess.
E:
Endangerment	Using the term endangerment implies that it is a significant event that endangers someone's life, e.g. a large rock thrown at a moving car, or a bullet going through a wall. If this term is used, then the violation is significant enough to involve the police.
F:
Fighting^	Do not call law enforcement for mutual combat, although it must be reported to ADE. If there was injury, or it was not mutual, use the term assault or aggravated assault depending on who was

2 | Page

6/19/14

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force:
Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement
Appendix A

TERM	REASONING
	assaulted, the severity and whether a weapon was used.
Fire Alarm Misuse	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report.
Firearms	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report.
Forgery	Do not call law enforcement.
G:
Gambling	Do not call law enforcement.
Graffiti or Tagging	Do not call unless there are at least $250 in damages, which is classified as vandalism, or if any hate speech or threats are communicated in the tags / graffiti. Schools should document the graffiti with dates and pictures as they occur. This will help law enforcement if the graffiti becomes a larger problem and needs to be reported. Gang affiliation and symbols were purposefully omitted as factors because assumptions can be made about a student and this may contribute to disproportionate minority contact.
H:
Harassment, Nonsexual	Do not call law enforcement, unless behavior is persistent.
Hazing	Do not use this term. Classify the violation based on the actual offense. Do not call law enforcement unless it is determined that a crime was committed. Like bullying, hazing can include a wide range of offenses and it is important to base the consequence on the actual violation.
Homicide	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report.
I:
Illicit / Illegal Drugs	Call law enforcement. Even small amounts are illegal for the school administrators to possess or dispose of, and it is a mandated report.
Indecent Exposure or Public Sexual Indecency	Call law enforcement if there is a victim. Consult with appropriate school personnel to assess the situation.
Inhalants	Do not call law enforcement unless there is some proof that the student used the inhalant (e.g. caught using, can see paint marks on the nose or other direct signs of use). TPD informed the group that it is not illegal for youth to have possession of inhalants. It is a felony for them to use them.

3 | Page

6/19/14

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force:
Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement
Appendix A

TERM	REASONING
Inappropriate Language	Do not call law enforcement.
K:
Kidnapping	Call law enforcement. This is a mandated report.
L:
Leave School Grounds without permission	Do not call law enforcement unless it is coupled with another violation or there is concern for the student's safety.
Lying	Do not call law enforcement.
M:
Minor Aggressive Act	Do not call law enforcement if the violation fits within this classification. If the situation escalates to assault and there is injury, then call law enforcement.
N:
Negative Group Affiliation	Do not call law enforcement.
Network Infraction	Do not call unless the network was hacked to access sensitive information.
O:
Over the Counter Drugs	Do not call law enforcement for personal use, sharing or selling. These items are not illegal, and the minor cannot be charged with any crime. If there is an emergency then call 911 for emergency assistance.
P:
Parking Lot Violations	Do not call law enforcement.
Plagiarism	Do not call law enforcement.
Pornography	Do not call unless the student is distributing pornographic material, any of the materials contain someone who is known to the student (e.g. another student, a relative, etc), or the pornography is of a minor.
Prescription Drugs	Do not call law enforcement for personal use with a current prescription in the student's name. Parents should always be called to inform them of school policy regarding any prescription drugs.

4 | Page

6/19/14

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force:
Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement
Appendix A

TERM	REASONING
Theft, Petty	Do not call law enforcement unless the value of the items is more than $100. Then it is classified as theft, not petty theft.
Threat or Intimidation	Call law enforcement if there is intent to harm or behavior is persistent.
Tobacco	Do not call law enforcement.
Trespassing	Do not call law enforcement unless it is a student who was expelled or suspended for a serious violation, if the person has already been warned and will not leave, or if there is a specified, clear threat.
Truancy	Do not call law enforcement.
U:
Unexcused Absence	Do not call law enforcement.
V:
Vandalism of Personal Property	Do not call the police because the victim must make the report, not the school.
Vandalism of School Property	Call unless the damage is under $250. The threshold can be higher if the school or district chooses. However, it cannot be lower; this is based on the criminal damage statute.
Verbal Provocation	Do not call law enforcement.
W:
Weapons (Billy Club, Brass Knuckles, Knife with blade of at least 2.5 inches, & Nunchakus)	This is a mandated report, and it needs to be reported. However, there are times that administrators take something like a knife from a student who did not intend to bring it to campus, does not plan to use it, and has reason to be in possession of that type of weapon (for work or recreational purposes). Law Enforcement agencies as well as the County Attorney do suggest considering intent. For these situations, an online report can be completed to document the incident, but it will not trigger police response to the school. The school can then give school based consequences and law enforcement will not come to campus for a situation that was never intended to be dangerous. If there is any doubt about the intent police should be called for police presence.

6 | Page

6/19/14

APPENDIX B. RECOMMENDED PROGRAMS

From the Town Halls held to date, the RStPP Task Force has selected four approaches showing proven experience and promise, which it finds likely to be readily replicable. In selecting these, the Task Force does not intend to diminish other work being done by colleagues in law offices, courts, schools, and juvenile justice locales across the country, but rather to highlight possible starting points for further work. This preliminary report provides a summary listing; more detail will be provided in the final report and in further Town Halls and training sessions to follow. The final report will also include an expanded listing of other programs discussed by Town Hall participants.

1. Implicit Bias Training (All)

Implicit bias and its impact on the school to prison pipeline were discussed at all of the Town Halls. The research on implicit bias continues to grow. As discussed in this report, the research is increasingly clear that implicit bias is part of being human, that such bias can be measured by both social and neuroscience, and that such bias may, without intent, contribute to the kinds of disproportionality discussed in the report.

Implicit bias is an unconscious response that often is disassociated from our consciously held beliefs. Because so many decisions that impact young people along the school to prison pipeline are discretionary, openings for implicit bias to influence those decisions, albeit decisions made in all good faith, are many.

As discussed previously, research now shows that motivation to change implicit biases can help bring about change. But to be motivated, we have to first be aware of what implicit bias is and how it might operate in decisions about young people in education and juvenile justice. Training can bring about this awareness and offer possible de-biasing techniques.

More information: Professor Sarah Redfield, sarah.redfield@gmail.com, or 207-752-1721.

2. Checklist Implementation (Pima County, Arizona)

In Pima County, Arizona, under the direction of Guenevere Nelson-Melby, various stakeholders formed the Court, School, and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force to discuss reducing the number student referrals to law enforcement. The Task Force developed guidelines for schools and law enforcement to implement that are aimed at (a) discouraging schools from referring students to law enforcement for offenses that educators can and should handle on their own and (b) reducing ambiguity in school conduct codes that can often times lead to racial disparities.

More information: Natalie Carrillo, Research & Evaluation Assistant, Pima County Juvenile Court Center, Tucson, AZ, natalie.carrillo@pcjcc.pima.gov; Guenevere Nelson-Melby, Pima County Public Defender, Nelsonmelby@yahoo.com

3. Law Student/Lawyer Intervention (Sufeo, Massachusetts Model)

Massachusetts

The Massachusetts legal community has undertaken a broad approach to the issues. It is described briefly here. More information is available from Marlies Spanjaard, Director of Education Advocacy, The EdLaw Project, mspanjaard@publiccounsel.net, 617-910-5841.

THE EDLAW PROJECT

Every year, the school-to-prison pipeline continues to ensnare more of our youth. This national trend of criminalizing rather than educating our nation's children is reaching a crisis point. Thousands of young people in Massachusetts become entangled in this dead-end process annually due to inadequate educational programs and zero tolerance policies and practices. Lack of educational equity can start children on a downward spiral that ends in court, or prison, and has a crippling economic effect on their families and our communities.

The EdLaw Project, a partnership between the Children's Law Center of Massachusetts and the Committee for Public Counsel Services – Children and Family & Youth Advocacy Divisions has spent the last 15 years developing expertise in providing excellent education advocacy for Massachusetts highest-risk youth. Since its formal inception in January 2000, the EdLaw Project staff of four attorneys has directly advocated for over 1,800 low-income children to receive the education they need to succeed.

The EdLaw Project is currently focusing our expertise on training, empowering, and supporting the statewide juvenile indigent defense bar to engage in effective education advocacy for court-involved youth. Long-term positive legal outcomes are difficult to achieve without a solid educational foundation and therefore we believe that representation of children on child welfare, delinquency and youthful offender cases requires effective education advocacy. We are actively building the knowledge and skills of nearly one thousand attorneys, already expert child advocates in their own right, to permanently transform the standard of practice for child advocacy in Massachusetts. This approach will dramatically improve educational and life outcomes for thousands of poor children annually. Our proposed model focuses on promoting healthy child and adolescent development as a means to divert highly vulnerable children from the school-to-prison pipeline, while improving public safety and saving taxpayers millions of dollars. Our three to five year plan includes the creation of a sustainable state-funded education advocacy unit within the public defender agency to ensure ongoing leadership, training, and support of education advocacy provided by the juvenile indigent defense bar.

The school to prison pipeline cannot be shut down unless schools educate all their students. Many Massachusetts public schools are unwitting feeder systems for the courts, the Department of Children and Families (DCF), the Department of Youth Services (DYS), and adult prisons. Ill-conceived school disciplinary policies are a serious problem and there is an endemic failure to meet the academic needs of poor children, especially children of color.

Consider these statistics:

- Eighty-five percent of all juveniles who interface with the juvenile court system are functionally illiterate.
- Two thirds of children who cannot read proficiently by the end of fourth grade, will end up in jail or on welfare.
- African-American students are 3.5 times more likely than their white classmates to be suspended or expelled. Black children constitute 18 percent of students, but they account for 46 percent of those suspended more than once.
- For secondary school children, the suspension rate for black male students with disabilities is 34%, compared to 16.2% for white male students with disabilities. Black female students with disabilities have a suspension rate of 26%, while white female students with disabilities are at 7.3%.

Failing to provide young people with an adequate education has serious long-term consequences for the individual, the family, the community, and the Commonwealth, including low-wage jobs, lack of income, and prison. Undereducated parents struggle to support their families economically and struggle to advocate for the academic development of their own children. Neighborhoods with high concentrations of undereducated, chronically court-involved individuals also can be toxic environments with high rates of domestic violence, substance abuse, mental health concerns, and the resulting over-policing and over-incarceration. In Massachusetts, a high school dropout costs taxpayers an average of nearly $275,000 over his or her lifetime. Sending a young person to a correctional facility costs taxpayers upwards of $60,000 annually, and it is estimated that each youth who grows up to be ensnared in the criminal justice system will cost the taxpayer $2 to $4 million dollars.

Research shows that school success is one of the most cost effective strategies for preventing lifelong court involvement. Expert child advocates working to help parents and schools identify and access the appropriate educational services for court involved kids is not just a moral imperative; it is also a far more effective approach to issues of systemic poverty, public safety and state budget deficits, than ignoring the source of the problem and building more prisons. With the support of the education law experts at the EdLaw Project, this dedicated and skilled juvenile bar can have a profound impact on the educational, legal, and life success of thousands of poor court-involved children and youth every year and in turn, help to address economic and social disparities affecting multiple communities throughout the Commonwealth.

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force: Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement

Violation	Guidelines			Explanations and Exceptions
	Call for Law Enforcement Presence	File Police Report (Online)	School based Consequence / Intervention
A:
Aggravated Assaults	☑
Air Soft Gun^ (dangerous item)			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless they use or threaten someone with it.
Alcohol Violation^	☑			Call law enforcement unless: • The alcohol was not consumed, and • The alcohol was not shared or sold, and • You have school security/personnel to handle the situation
Armed Robbery	☑
Arson, of a structure or property^	☑			Call law enforcement unless: • It does not cause damage, and • There are no safety concerns, and • There was no intent to cause harm
Arson, of an occupied structure	☑
Assault^	☑			If defined as unwanted physical contact with injury, then call for police presence. A violation that schools classify as sexual harassment with contact, law enforcement would classify as an assault. If the violation meets the guidelines for sexual harassment with contact, law enforcement should be contacted. (See Appendix A)
B:
BB Gun^ (dangerous item)			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless they use or threaten someone with it.
Billy Club (weapon)		☑		Always report, but place online report if police presence is not needed based on the intent and culpability.

 Mandated Report to Law Enforcement & ADE
^ Mandated Report to ADE
8/14/14

2

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force:
Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement

Violation	Guidelines: Call for Law Enforcement Presence	Guidelines: File Police Report (Online)	Guidelines: School based Consequence / Intervention	Explanations and Exceptions
Bomb Threat	☑
Brass Knuckles (weapon)		☑		Always report, but place online report if police presence is not needed based on the intent and culpability.
Bullying^				Bullying is not a legal term. Call law enforcement if there was a threat, harassment, intimidation, an assault or if the behavior is persistent. See notes in appendix A
Burglary/Breaking & Entering (2nd & 3rd Degree)^	☑			Explanation: • Being in a place you are not supposed to be • With intent of doing something you are not supposed to do See Appendix A or the definitions for more explanation
Burglary (1st Degree, with a deadly weapon or dangerous instrument)	☑			See Appendix A
C:
Cheating			☑
Chemical or Biological Threat	☑
Combustible			☑	Do not call for possession, but if it is lit, the violation then becomes a higher offense depending upon which type of combustible it was.
Computer and Telecommunications Device			☑	Do not call unless they commit another violation with the computer or telecommunications device. (e.g. bullying, pornography, threats, etc.) If so, document violation as the other offense.
Contraband			☑	If it is illegal contraband then it should be listed under the violation that corresponds (e.g. drugs, weapons, etc.). If it is legal but against school policy, list specifically what it is, but do not call law enforcement.

 Mandated Report to Law Enforcement & ADE
^ Mandated Report to ADE
8/14/14

3

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force: Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement

Violation	Guidelines: Call for Law Enforcement Presence	Guidelines: File Police Report (Online)	Guidelines: School based Consequence / Intervention	Explanations and Exceptions
D:
Defiance, Disrespect toward Authority, and Non-Compliance			☑	Do not call unless there is a specified, clear threat to the safety of students, staff or self.
Disorderly Conduct			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless there is a specified clear threat to the safety of students, staff or self.
Disruption			☑
Dress Code Violation			☑
Drug Paraphernalia	☑			Call law enforcement if the paraphernalia has residue.
E:
Endangerment^	☑			Call law enforcement unless: • Nobody was hurt, and • There was no intention to hurt anybody else Then the violation should be classified as recklessness.
Extortion			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless there is repeated threat or intimidation.
F:
Fighting^				Do not call law enforcement for mutual combat, although it must be reported to ADE. If there was injury or it was not mutual, then classify as assault or aggravated assault.
Fire Alarm Misuse	☑
Firearms (weapon)	☑
Forgery			☑

 Mandated Report to Law Enforcement & ADE
^ Mandated Report to ADE
8/14/14

4

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force: Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement

Violation	Guidelines			Explanations and Exceptions
G:
Gambling			☑
Graffiti or Tagging			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless: • Damage exceeds $250, then classify it as vandalism; or • If it contains hate speech or threats
H:
Harassment, Nonsexual			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless behavior is persistent.
Hazing^				Do not call law enforcement unless it is determined that a crime has been committed. See notes in Appendix A for further explanation.
Homicide	☑
I:
Indecent Exposure or Public Sexual Indecency^	☑			Call law enforcement if there is a victim. Consult with appropriate school personnel to assess the situation.
Illicit/Illegal Drugs Including: Ecstasy, cocaine, crack, hallucinogens, heroin, marijuana, methamphetamines, etc	☑
Inappropriate Language			☑
Inhalants^			☑	Do not call unless they have used the inhalant.
K:
Kidnapping	☑
Knife with blades of less than 2.5 inches^ (dangerous item)			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless they use or threaten someone with it.
Knife with blade length of at least 2.5 inches (weapon)		☑		Always report, but place online report if police presence is not needed based on the intent and culpability.

 Mandated Report to Law Enforcement & ADE
^ Mandated Report to ADE
8/14/14

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force: Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement

	Call for Law Enforcement Presence	File Police Report (Online)	School based Consequence / Intervention
L:
Laser pointer^ (dangerous item)			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless they use or threaten someone with it.
Leaving School Grounds without Permission			☑	Do not call unless there is a safety concern for the student or it is coupled with other violations that require police contact.
Letter Opener^ (dangerous item)			☑	Do not call unless they use it or threaten someone with it.
Lying			☑
M:
Mace^ (dangerous item)			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless they use or threaten someone with it.
Minor Aggressive Act (hitting)			☑	Do not call law enforcement; unless it causes injury, then it should be classified as assault.
N:
Negative Group Affiliation			☑
Network Infraction			☑	Do not call unless the student hacks into the network with intent to access sensitive information.
Nunchakus (weapon)		☑		Always report, but place online report if police presence is not needed based on the intent and culpability.
O:
Other Dangerous Item^			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless they use or threaten someone with it.
Over the Counter Drugs (Inappropriate Use of)			☑	Do not call for possession. It is not illegal to possess. If it is a medical emergency, then call 911. See Appendix
P:
Paintball Gun^ (dangerous			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless they use or threaten someone

 Mandated Report to Law Enforcement & ADE
^ Mandated Report to ADE
8/14/14

6

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force: Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement

Violation	Call for Law Enforcement Presence	File Police Report (Online)	School based Consequence / Intervention	Explanations and Exceptions
item)				with it.
Parking Lot Violation			☑
Pellet Gun^ (dangerous item)			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless they use or threaten someone with it.
Plagiarism			☑
Pornography^			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless: • The student is distributing pornographic material • Any of the people in the pornographic material are known to the student • The pornography is of a minor

Violation	Guidelines			Explanations and Exceptions
	Call for Law Enforcement Presence	File Police Report (Online)	School based Consequence / Intervention
Prescription Drugs  (Inappropriate Use of)	☑			Call law enforcement unless: • The student has a prescription in their name and • Prescription is current.
Public Display of Affection			☑
R:
Recklessness			☑	Do not call law enforcement. If the violation is serious enough to call police, then the violation should be classified as endangerment.
Robbery^	☑			Call law enforcement unless there is a low level of threat and force.
S:
Sexual Abuse/Sexual Conduct with a Minor/Child Molestation	☑

 Mandated Report to Law Enforcement & ADE
^ Mandated Report to ADE
8/14/14

7

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force: Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement

Violation	Guidelines: Call for Law Enforcement Presence	Guidelines: File Police Report (Online)	Guidelines: School based Consequence / Intervention	Exceptions
Sexual Harassment ^			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless: • Behavior is persistent, or • The victim feels threatened by the behavior
Sexual Harassment with Contact^	☑			See Appendix A
Sexual Assault (Rape)	☑
Simulated Firearm			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless: • They were using it to threaten others, and • It cannot be discerned whether it is real or not.
Substance Represented as Illicit Drug	☑			Call law enforcement, unless it can be determined that the substance is legal
T:
Tardy			☑
Taser or Stun Gun^ (dangerous item)			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless they use or threaten someone with it.
Tear Gas^ (dangerous item)	☑			It is not available for purchase, so law enforcement agencies want to be notified if anyone is in possession of it.
Theft (Petty)			☑	Do not call if items are valued at less than $100.
Theft	☑			Call law enforcement if value of the items is more than $100. If it is personal property, the owner needs to make the report, not the school.
Threat or Intimidation^	☑			Call law enforcement unless there is no intent of harm.
Tobacco Violation^			☑

 Mandated Report to Law Enforcement & ADE
^ Mandated Report to ADE
8/14/14

8

Court, School and Law Enforcement Collaborative Task Force: Guidelines for Schools in Contacting Law Enforcement

Trespassing			☑	Do not call law enforcement unless: • It is a student who was expelled or suspended for a serious violation, or • The person has already been warned and will not leave, or • There is a specified, clear threat.
Truancy			☑
U:
Unexcused Absence			☑
Unknown Drug	☑			Call law enforcement if substance cannot be identified.
V:
Vandalism of Personal Property^			☑	Victim must call the police, the school should not call for them.
Vandalism of School Property^	☑	☑		Call law enforcement unless damage is under $250. If no suspect, place an online report.
Verbal Provocation			☑

 Mandated Report to Law Enforcement & ADE
^ Mandated Report to ADE
8/14/14

SUFEO Stand Up For Each Other

This program was introduced at the first Town Hall and reviewed again at the New Orleans Town Hall. It is a program that has also been adopted in Chicago.

Stand Up for Each Other! (SUFEO) is an advocacy group led by law students at Tulane University Law School and Loyola University Law School in New Orleans, with an additional project at Loyola School of Law in Chicago. The New Orleans and Chicago groups collaborate with each other but operate separately. They are united by the goal of reducing suspensions and keeping students in school and out of the criminal justice system.

For students appealing a suspension or expulsion, SUFEO advocates assist with each step of the process. They advise parents and students on how to initiate an appeal of disciplinary action, conduct an investigation into the actions taken against students, and represent students in administrative hearings. Also, both sites operate an around-the-clock hotline for youth and parents who have questions or need assistance defending against school suspensions and expulsions.

The law students that run the SUFEO groups are aided by attorneys from organizations like the Louisiana Center for Children's Rights, which collaborates with the New Orleans SUFEO. The Center reports that SUFEO has worked with over 100 students in approximately fifty cases, most of which it says were successfully appealed. In addition to directly assisting students and parents, SUFEO's advocacy has drawn media attention to the staggering rates of suspension and expulsion at Louisiana schools and has brought the harsh effects of state legislation into the political conversation.

For references as quoted and more information, see STAND UP FOR EACH OTHER!, http://sufeo.org/ Suspension Advocacy Project, LOY. U. CHI. SCH. L.: CIVITAS CHILDLAW CTR. http://www.luc.edu/law/centers/childlaw/institutes/child_education/suspensionadvocacyproject/

Tavis Smiley, The "Community" Element of Education, PBS: TAVIS SMILEY REP. (last modified Apr. 11, 2013), http://www.pbs.org/wnet/tavissmiley/tsr/education-under-arrest/the-community-element-of-education/.

4. Restorative Justice (Texas)

In 2012, Institute for Restorative Justice and Restorative Dialogue (IRJRD), led by Dr, Marilyn Armour, partnered with Ed H. White Middle School in San Antonio, Texas, to implement a Restorative Discipline program aimed at reducing the use of exclusionary practices like suspension and expulsion to discipline sixth, seventh, and eighth grade students. Total student suspensions at the White Middle School dropped by 44% during the first year of the program and by 57% the second year. Teachers' and administrators' experience with, and training in, restorative practices seems positively correlated with lower suspension rates. Dr. Armour described the program as a "relational approach to building school climate and addressing student behavior that fosters belonging over exclusion, social engagement over control, and meaningful accountability over punishment." An evaluation of Restorative Discipline at White Middle School authored by Dr. Armour also reported "substantial gains" in academic performance; "African American students, in particular" showed improvement in both math and reading.

For the points quoted here and further information see MARILYN ARMOUR, ED WHITE MIDDLE SCHOOL RESTORATIVE DISCIPLINE EVALUATION: IMPLEMENTATION AND IMPACT 12 (2014), http://www.utexas.edu/research/cswr/rji/pdf/Year2-Final-EW-Report.pdf; Texas Schools Restorative Discipline Project, U. TEX. AUSTIN: SCH. SOC. WORK, https://socialwork.utexas.edu/projects/texas-schools-restorative-discipline-project.

Dr. Armour can be reached at marmour@utexas.edu.

APPENDIX C. ADDITIONAL PROGRAMMATIC RESOURCES

ACES CONNECTION, http://www.acesconnection.com/; CDC-KAISER PERMANENTE ADVERSE CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES (ACE) STUDY, http://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/acestudy/ (information on adverse childhood experience research and approaches)

PIPELINE TO PROSPERITY, VALLEJO UNIFIED SCHOOL DISTRICT, http://www.vallejo.k12.ca.us/cms/page_view?d=x&piid=&vpid=1308906523308 (YEAR) (for more information contact Patricia Lee, State Bar of California, Patricia.Lee@calbar.ca.gov).

It's My Stock and I'll Vote If I Want to: Conflicted Voting by Shareholders in (Hostile) M&A Deals

MATTEO GATTI*

ABSTRACT 183
I. INTRODUCTION 184
II. FRAMING THE ISSUE: CONFLICTED VOTING IN ACQUISITIONS 192
A. Shareholder Voting in Acquisitions 192
1. Voting as a Statutory Requirement 192
2. Tender Offers and Proxy Fights: Voting as a Safety Valve for Hostile Deals 194
B. The Rationales for Voting in Acquisitions 199
C. "Sincerity" as a Basic Element of Majority Voting 205
1. Sincerity of Shareholder Votes in Freeze-Out Transactions 209
2. Sincerity of Shareholder Votes in Deals for Contestable Companies 212
III. POLICING SHAREHOLDER CONFLICTS IN ACQUISITIONS: THE LAW OF THE LAND, IF ANY 217
A. Introduction 217
B. Lack of a Specific Regime (But Some Regimes in Related Areas Deal with the Issue Somehow) 218
C. Elements for a Positive Law Analysis 223
1. No Case Law, Very Little Scholarship 224
2. Some Key Questions 227
a. On What Basis Could Judges Limit the Freedom to Cast Votes? 228
b. What Are We Talking about When We Talk about Interests? 232
c. Do Specific Regimes in Similar Areas Have Any Bearing? 236
IV. ASSESSING POLICY APPROACHES AND THEIR POSSIBLE OBJECTIONS 240
A. Possible Policy Approaches 240

1. Bright-Line Rules: Approval by a Majority of "Disinterested Shares" 241
2. No-Conflict Standard 244
3. Unengaged Approach 248
4. Fitting the Three Approaches within Existing Delaware Law 249

B. Testing the Approaches 249

1. Clearly Bad Acquisition Going Through with the Pivotal Vote of the Bidder 252
   - a. Bright-Line Rules and Clearly Bad Acquisitions ... 252
   - b. No-Conflict Standards and Clearly Bad Acquisitions 256
   - c. Unengaged Approach and Clearly Bad Acquisitions 257
2. Clearly Good Acquisition Rejected with the Pivotal Vote of the Target Directors and Management 258
   - a. Bright-Line Rules and Clearly Good Acquisitions 258
   - b. No-Conflict Standards and Clearly Good Acquisitions 259
   - c. Unengaged Approach and Clearly Good Acquisitions 259
3. Preliminary Remarks 259
4. Less Clear-Cut Hypotheticals: Somewhat Bad Acquisitions and Somewhat Good Acquisitions 261
   - a. Bright-line Rules 262
   - b. No-Conflict Standard 264
   - c. Unengaged Approach 265
5. Relaxing the Assumptions 266

C. Policy Remarks 271

1. The Uneasy Case for an Unengaged Approach 271
2. Rules or Standard? 275
3. Rules and Standard? The Case for a Combined Approach 277

V. CONCLUSION 282

APPENDIX I 283

ABSTRACT

This article fills a vacuum in current takeover literature by organically analyzing instances in which shareholders' conflicts might lead to inefficient acquisition outcomes. While outside of the takeover field, Delaware courts have been wary of the perils for shareholder wealth maximization of misalignments in shareholder incentives, and while almost all jurisdictions that require a shareholder referendum as a precondition to conduct a hostile transaction have implemented disinterested shares regimes, Delaware takeover law has been silent. This article presents three possible approaches to address conflicted voting in acquisitions: a rule-based approach, a standard-based approach, and an unengaged approach. This article argues that none of these approaches can be expected to work better than the others under all circumstances—they each carry positives and negatives. A system of balanced bright-line rules (that is, applicable to both bidder and target incumbents) would contain conflicted voting in a series of circumstances, but its potential over-deterrence can put at risk a subset of deals in which the universe of disinterested shareholders might not get it right. Standards have the advantage that, if well adjudicated, only the prohibited, conflicted conduct will be detected and sanctioned, with no problems stemming from over- or under-deterrence. But the worrying aspect of a standard approach is judicial discretion and potential error: the policy would call for the judge to establish the inherent long-term value of the target as an independent entity. While the advantage of the unengaged approach is preserving the status quo, its clear problem is not offering protection when a conflicted vote distorts the voting and acquisition outcomes. This article suggests a combination of a rule-based approach and a standard-based one: the bidder and the incumbents would vote, but their shares would be presumed conflicted and thus not counted for determining the outcome of the vote/acquisition (rule-based element); however, each group could rebut the presumption by proving that its votes are not conflicted because they are directed to an outcome that maximizes shareholder value (standard-based element). This would constitute a less harsh version of a pure disinterested shares regime because a group initially labeled as interested could actually demonstrate the opposite: entrenchment-seeking directors and management will have to convince a judge they are casting their vote because rejecting the bid is the best course of action, while bidders will have to prove their offer is not a "low baller."

I. INTRODUCTION

Takeovers have historically kept corporate lawyers very busy. Some have recently argued that "the allocation of authority between shareholders and the board of directors to determine whether a hostile takeover bid would go forward" is "the most intense corporate law debate of the last thirty years and perhaps the entire history of corporate law."[1] Yet, surprisingly, some stones have been left unturned: this article makes the first attempt to organically address the thorny issue of conflicted voting by shareholders in connection with a hostile acquisition, an issue that few scholars have dealt with (and tangentially at best).

To be sure, shareholder voting comes in many forms in the M&A context: mergers and sales of assets are the traditional transactional structures requiring a shareholders' vote.[2] Since the mid-1980s, it became apparent that hostile takeovers could also require a vote. How so? In the 1980s, back when classic Delaware takeover law was crafted, the policy dilemma rested on whom to select as the appropriate actor to determine the success or demise of a hostile acquisition attempt. Policymakers had three high-level approaches to choose from: shareholder choice, board centrality, or courts.[3] Albeit the initial impression was that board actions would be subject to some higher standard than routine

---

* Associate Professor of Law, Rutgers School of Law. For helpful feedback, suggestions and discussions, I am grateful to Lucian Bebchuk, Blanaid Clarke, Stefano Cacchi Pessani, Doug Eakeley, Luca Enriques, Martin Gelter, Alan Hyde, John Laide, John Leubsdorf, Rose Liao, Carlo Marchetti, David Noll, Chrystin Ondersma, Fadi Shaheen, Matteo Tonello, and participants to the faculty colloquium at Rutgers School of Law; special thanks to my research assistants Denis Fatovic, Matt Gallagher, Jason Perez, and Spencer Richards. All errors and omissions are mine.

1. Ronald J. Gilson & Jeffrey N. Gordon, Agency Capitalism: Further Implications of Equity Intermediation 21 (Eur. Corp. Governance Inst., Law Working Paper No. 239/2014), http://ssrn.com/abstract=2359690.

2. See infra Section II.A.1.

3. See Ronald J. Gilson, Unocal Fifteen Years Later (And What We Can Do About It), 26 DEL. J. CORP. L. 491, 494–95 (2001).

business judgment, directors eventually won and won big.[4] Soon enough, their supremacy and discretion became broader: directors could defend against virtually all hostile deals;[5] the idea being that they know better than shareholders about the inherent, hidden value of a target company.[6] However, this power was never absolute, as courts left a caveat: if shareholders do not like how directors are responding to the given offer, they have, and cannot be taken away, the ability to vote to oust the board and get rid of the defense[7] (the so-called ballot box route).[8] Pure hostile deals remained possible only through such ballot box route in the form of joint tender offers and proxy fights.[9]

This compromise left many dissatisfied. Some criticized it because of an unmotivated preference for elections as opposed to pure tender offers.[10] Others pointed out that "[s]hareholder ability to elect new directors emerges as an uneasy compromise between the logic of hidden value and the need to limit agency costs":[11] it is quite contradictory to give directors the power to defend because shareholders are prone to valuation mistakes, but then allowing shareholders to decide "in the related proxy battle presenting the

---

4. In other words, the first impression was that Delaware courts gave themselves a policing role, which was ultimately de facto abdicated. See Gilson & Gordon, supra note 1, at 22–23.

5. See Paramount Commc'ns, Inc. v. Time Inc., 571 A.2d 1140, 1154–55 (Del. 1989) (endorsing a just say no response from directors).

6. See Bernard Black & Reinier Kraakman, Delaware's Takeover Law: The Uncertain Search for Hidden Value, 96 NW. U. L. REV. 521, 522–23 (2002) (criticizing the policy).

7. This nowadays means redeeming a poison pill. See infra notes 33–34 and accompanying text.

8. See Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946, 959 (Del. 1985) ("If the stockholders are displeased with the action of their elected representatives, the powers of corporate democracy are at their disposal to turn the board out.").

9. See infra notes 38–40 and accompanying text.

10. Ronald J. Gilson & Alan Schwartz, Sales and Elections as Methods for Transferring Corporate Control, 2 THEORETICAL INQUIRIES L. 783, 788 (2001) ("[A]n outcome as significant as privileging elections over markets should at least come with an explanation. Providing a reason for an outcome at least imposes the discipline of logic on the range of alternatives available to the court."); Gilson, supra note 3, at 500–01 (criticizing the choice by Delaware judges to prefer elections over market dynamics).

11. Black & Kraakman, supra note 6, at 538 (2002).

same issue."[12] Others believe that shareholder choice in the ballot box compromise can at times be more apparent than real:[13] as I explained in earlier work, shareholders may lack the actual power to determine the outcome of a takeover bid because of corporate law rules, principles, and/or practices acting as barriers to the power to oust the board.[14] In this regard, scholars, practitioners, and market players have identified staggered boards as the main culprit.[15] But staggered boards are hardly alone in altering the odds of a bidder's prevailing via the ballot box route: other factors include shareholders' inability to call special meetings or to act by written consent, supermajority rules, proxy rules, and—the topic of this article—the conflict of interest regime.[16]

---

12. Jeffrey N. Gordon, "Just Say Never?" Poison Pills, Deadhand Pills, and Shareholder-Adopted Bylaws: An Essay for Warren Buffet, 19 CARDOZO L. REV. 511, 530 (1997).

13. See, e.g., Randall S. Thomas, Judicial Review of Defensive Tactics in Proxy Contests: When Is Using a Rights Plan Right?, 46 VAND. L. REV. 503, 506–07 (1993).

14. Matteo Gatti, The Power to Decide on Takeovers: Directors or Shareholders, What Difference Does It Make?, 20 FORDHAM J. CORP. & FIN. L. 73, 109–21 (2014).

15. Staggered boards received a lot of attention in the aftermath of an influential study by Bebchuk, Coates, and Subramanian, in which they showed that the combined use of poison pills and staggered boards make unsolicited deals virtually impossible. When a target has a staggered board in place, because only one-third of its members are up for election every year, it takes two board elections, and hence at least twelve full months, to gain a majority of directors. At the first election, bidders would effectively give target shareholders a put option exercisable a year later: if between the two elections the stock has gone down, the bidder will have to close an acquisition where it is likely overpaying (the stock has gone down while the bidder cannot run the company because it only controls one third of the board); if, however, the target stock has gone up, shareholders would likely not vote for the bidder nominees unless the bidder increases the initial offer. Lucian Arye Bebchuk, John C. Coates IV & Guhan Subramanian, The Powerful Antitakeover Force of Staggered Boards: Theory, Evidence, & Policy, 54 STAN. L. REV. 887, 890, 928 (2002) (finding that not a single hostile bid won a ballot box victory against an effective staggered board in the five-year period from 1996–2000).

16. See Gatti, supra note 14, at 109–24.

So, in the first place, the judges' idea that bidders and shareholders might find solace via a proxy fight safety valve[17] cannot apply squarely to a big chunk of companies in the market for corporate control, as some pre-planning on the target's end would impair, to varying degrees, the shareholders' ability to effectively use "the powers of corporate democracy."[18] Second, and moving to the main focus of this article, even in the absence of explicit anti-takeover devices, such as staggered boards, the mechanics of shareholder voting might present two additional types of distortions preventing the vote from representing a true expression of corporate democracy: on the one hand, proxy rules are notoriously tilted in favor of incumbents,[19] and on the other hand, the voting (and therefore the deal) outcome can be tainted by a conflict of interests carried by one or more shareholders.

This article focuses on the latter problem: how does, and how should, the law address conflicts of interest by shareholders when they vote in hostile deals? Basic questions that ought to be considered, but have yet to be explored in the literature, are, at a minimum, the following: Are we comfortable from a policy perspective that the bidder freely votes its shares? What about directors and management—can they vote their shares? In the tender offer structure, the bidder is the contractual counterpart to the target shareholders and is thus in potential conflict with them: put simply, buyers want to spend less, while sellers want to receive more. Additionally, because of the well-known desire to maintain their respective roles, the votes cast by directors and management of the target, together with persons affiliated with them, are potentially in conflict with the interests of the other shareholders.

As shareholder voting is a key factor in determining the success of an acquisition, it is of paramount importance that conflicted voting does not alter the collective decision of shareholders. In fact, as the Delaware Supreme Court pointed out in a relatively recent case on vote buying, a misalignment of interests puts at risk the very ability of such collective decision to determine an out-

17. See Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946, 959 (Del. 1985).

18. Id. at 958–59.

19. Yair Listokin, Corporate Voting vs. Market Price Setting, 11 AM. L. ECON. REV. 608, 610–11 (2009).

come that is efficient for shareholders.[20] Such a concern was promptly echoed by the Chancery Court in a freeze-out case: "[e]conomic incentives matter, particularly for the effectiveness of a legitimizing mechanism like . . . a stockholder vote."[21]

This article takes the view that the negative influence of shareholders' conflicts of interest is circumstantial: the mere possibility of a conflict is not sufficient to taint the vote. The pathology, I argue, is pursuing a personal interest and casting a pivotal vote against the interests of the other shareholders: to make such determination, there is no way other than looking at facts and circumstances arising from the actual offer on the table. To simplify, if the offer is value maximizing, directors and managers voting against it (that is, voting to maintain the board and leave the pill in place) will be in conflict, but the bidder voting in favor will not. Conversely, if the offer is not value maximizing, the bidder voting in favor (that is, voting to replace the board and redeem the pill) will be in conflict, while directors and managers voting against will not. These conflicts are not exclusive to hostile acquisitions: all similar "final period" situations, for instance friendly deals, present similar risk (in such setting, the conflict is "shared" by the bidder and the target board who might collude to offer a lower price to shareholders).

Conflicted voting is no small issue even when compared to other well-known problems of the current regime, such as staggered boards: because the direction of whom the conflict is going to favor—whether the bidder or the incumbents—is not predictable ex ante when investing a given company (because the advantage can be determined only after the offer is presented and the vote takes place), conflicted voting can introduce a noisy element in the accuracy of pricing a given stock. This is not the same for most takeover defenses (staggered boards for instance), whose presence means there is less likelihood ex ante of a hostile deal: something that market participants can anticipate and incorporate in the stock price accordingly.

20. Crown EMAK Partners, LLC v. Kurz, 992 A.2d 377, 388 (Del. 2010) ("[W]hat legitimizes the stockholder vote as a decision-making mechanism is the premise that stockholders with economic ownership are expressing their collective view as to whether a particular course of action serves the corporate goal of stockholder wealth maximization.") (citation omitted).

21. In re CNX Gas Corp. S'holders Litig., 4 A.3d 397, 416 (Del. Ch. 2010).

After scoping how existing Delaware law addresses the issue,[22] this article investigates how to go about it from a normative perspective, and it does so through the angle of comparing the strengths and weaknesses of three strategies: a rule-based approach, a standard-based approach, and an unengaged approach. The first approach consists of bright-line rules that, because of the potential risk of a conflict, specifically disqualify ex ante certain shareholders by requiring that the resolution be approved by a majority of disinterested shares. The second standard-based approach would seek to invalidate ex post all votes that are actually cast in conflict and that are pivotal for the outcome of the election (I call this approach a "no-conflict standard"). Under the third unengaged approach, shareholders would have complete freedom to decide how to cast their votes.

This article argues that none of the approaches can be expected to work better than the others in all circumstances, and that they each carry positives and negatives. The advantage of the unengaged approach is leaving things as they (probably)[23] are now, meaning no additional litigation. The obvious problem is that it offers no protection when a conflicted vote distorts the voting and acquisition outcome. Not only is this dangerous because such an approach puts at risk the overall efficiency of the market for corporate control (in all deals that are determined by the pivoting vote of the conflicted party, efficiency would have called for the exact opposite outcome), but it also sends a sobering signal that the legal system, especially this legal system, whereby the ballot box route is considered the safety valve for the correct functioning of the market for corporate control, is structurally incapable of screening out inefficient outcomes for acquisitions (e.g., a bad acquisition not being defeated and a good acquisition not succeeding). Otherwise, if we surrender to the idea that legislating or enforcing conflicts would either be too cumbersome or create too much uncertainty, then we must once and for all accept that the ballot box route, which is considered a safety valve that supposedly keeps the efficiency of the market for corporate control in check, simply does not work or works in a potentially distorted way.

22. See infra Part III.
23. See infra Section IV.A.4.

If the idea is to intervene, we have to choose between rules, standards, or, what this article suggests as the most promising option, a combination of the two. A system of balanced bright-line rules would contain conflicted voting in a series of circumstances, but its potential over-deterrence can put at risk a subset of deals in which the universe of disinterested shareholders might not get it right.[24] Standards have the advantage that, if well adjudicated, only the prohibited conflicted conduct will be detected and sanctioned, with no problems stemming from over- or under-deterrence. In a standard-based regime, target incumbents would be able to vote and only subsequently would takeover contenders have to litigate whether the vote was conflicted. But the complex element in a standard approach is judicial discretion and potential error: the policy would ultimately call for the judge to establish the inherent long-term value of the target as an independent entity.[25]

This article suggests to combine a rule-based approach with a standard-based one: the bidder and the incumbents would vote, but their shares would be presumed conflicted and thus not counted for determining the outcome of the proxy fight/acquisition (rule-based element); however, each group could rebut the presumption by proving that in fact its votes are not conflicted because they are directed to an outcome that maximizes shareholder value (standard-based element). This would constitute a less harsh version of a pure disinterested shares regime because a group initially labeled as interested could actually demonstrate the opposite: entrenchment-seeking directors and management will have to convince a judge they are casting their vote because rejecting the bid is the best course of action, while bidders will have to prove their offer is not a "low baller."

A couple of qualifications are in order. First, this article purposely moves within the boundaries of existing understandings of Delaware law on takeover defenses. It is beyond the scope of my work to endorse or criticize views as to whether it might make better economic sense to adopt other policies, such as a more shareholder-centric approach that is not based on hidden value or substantive coercion (i.e., the underlying assumptions used by Delaware judges to justify the existing system),[26] or an opposite, more director-centric approach (for instance, validating a broader "just say no" defense to aggressively thwart proxy fights).[27]

24. See infra Section IV.A.1.
25. See infra Section IV.A.2.

Second, this article does not necessarily call for a policy reform. Rather, it illustrates what the implications are for the Delaware system of embracing any of the main policy avenues that are analyzed here, especially what are (a) the assumptions for each of the described solutions and (b) the implications of relaxing such assumptions. One of the main traits of this article is underscoring the partial nature of the current debate (which ignores the issue of conflicted voting) in the aim of fostering a new area of research.

This article is structured as follows. Part II surveys when (II.A) and why (II.B) shareholder voting is necessary in acquisitions, emphasizes the importance of voting sincerity from an efficiency standpoint (II.C), and describes how conflicted voting can 26. This is the critical view on Delaware takeover law recently expressed by Gilson & Gordon, supra note 1, at 21–24, noting that the system emerged in the market environment of the 1960–80 period, which differs significantly from our current age of "agency capitalism" that is characterized by large institutional ownership and diversification.

---

27. Such harsher types of defenses are currently considered not available to Delaware targets. The outer limits of the legitimacy of defenses tampering with the proxy machinery are laid out in Blasius Indus. v. Atlas Corp., 564 A.2d 651, 661 (Del. Ch. 1988) (stating that if the board acts "for the primary purpose of preventing or impeding [the exercise of stockholder voting power], . . . the board bears the heavy burden of demonstrating a compelling justification for such action.") and Unitrin, Inc. v. Am. Gen. Corp., 651 A.2d 1361, 1388–89 (Del. 1995) (determining that takeover defenses are legitimate so long as the bidder's chances to win an election to replace the board are not "mathematically impossible or realistically unattainable."). Note, incidentally, that Delaware Courts have progressively eroded the boundaries in which Blasius's higher standard applies in favor of some other tests. See Keyser v. Curtis, C.A. No. 7109-VCN, 2012 WL 3115453, at *12–14 (Del. Ch. July 31, 2012) (applying the less onerous duty of loyalty standard rather than the Blasius standard where both were implicated when a corporation's sole director issued super voting shares of stock to himself at a bargain price to prevent his own removal from office); Mercier v. Inter-Tel (Del.), Inc., 929 A.2d 786, 806–07 (Del. Ch. 2007) (applying the Blasius standard to a board decision not to delay a merger vote by twenty-five days when it became clear there were not enough votes in favor of the merger on the original meeting date but holding that such standard must be consistent with the Unocal framework).

alter efficient outcomes in acquisitions (II.C.1 and 2). Part III contains the positive law analysis: it focuses on tools available to the interpreter to tackle conflicted voting in acquisitions, concludes there is no easy answer (III.C.1), and highlights the most complex key questions (III.C.2). In Part IV, the article analyzes some policy initiatives that could be contemplated to address conflicted voting. In Section IV.A, I lay out three potential policy options: a rule-based, a standard-based, and an unengaged approach. In Section IV.B, I then compare each such approach by testing it with hypotheticals of acquisition attempts. In Section IV.B.5, I describe the assumptions under which one approach can be expected to fare better than the others. In Section IV.C, I evaluate such assumptions and formulate policy remarks while taking into account some potential objections to a reform. Part V concludes.

II. Framing the Issue: Conflicted Voting in Acquisitions

A. Shareholder Voting in Acquisitions

1. Voting as a Statutory Requirement

Shareholder approval is often a requirement for the consummation of corporate acquisitions. In the context of statutory mergers, this is almost always true for shareholders of target companies;[28] sometimes shareholders of acquiring companies get to vote as well.[29] Shareholder approval is also a prerequisite of asset

---

28. See Section 251(c) of the Delaware General Corporation Law ("DGCL"). DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 251(c) (2016). But see § 251(h) (stating that a shareholder vote is not necessary for a merger that follows a tender or exchange offer if, among other things, the acquirer owns at least the number of shares that would be sufficient to approve the merger); § 253(a) (stating that a shareholder vote is not necessary if the acquiring corporation already owns at least 90% of the shares of each class of stock of the target company).

29. Under Section 251(f) of the DGCL, a shareholder vote is not necessary if the certificate of incorporation of the surviving corporation is not changed and the number of shares does not increase more than twenty percent, meaning that cash mergers and medium-to-small mergers never trigger a shareholder vote in the acquirer. See Robert B. Thompson & Paul H. Edelman, Corporate Voting, 62 VAND. L. REV. 129, 140–41 (2009) (noting that, given the wide degree of freedom in structuring an M&A transaction, shareholder voting at the level of acquiring corporations is basically optional). For analysis, see also Afra Afsharipour, A Shareholders' Put Option: Counteracting the Acquirer deals involving a sale of all or substantially all the assets of a company.[30]

Target shareholders can also be called to vote in the context of tender offers—even if such a deal structure does per se not "naturally" require a shareholder resolution. Outside of Delaware, several states have enacted control share acquisition statutes,[31] which require a shareholder vote to authorize a tender offer or an acquirer to cross certain thresholds of stock ownership and therefore to obtain control of a corporation—such a vote, a prerequisite condition for the deal to go through, works as a referendum on the Overpayment Problem, 96 MINN. L. REV. 1018, 1044–49 (2012) (detailing the various ways to structure transactions in order to bypass voting of the acquirer shareholders of Delaware corporations); Marco Becht, Andrea Polo & Stefano Rossi, Does Mandatory Shareholder Voting Prevent Bad Acquisitions? 3 (Eur. Corp. Governance Inst., Finance Working Paper No. 422/2014), http://ssrn.com/abstract=2443792 (noting that shareholders of U.S. companies vote in limited circumstances and observing evidence supporting the proposition that value-reducing deals are more likely to be associated with acquisition structures designed to avoid shareholder approval).

---

30. Delaware courts have held different views with respect to determining what "substantially all the assets" means: one doctrine requires that certain quantitative thresholds are met, such as determining the percentage of total income the assets in question generate as well as their proportion to the company's overall size, while another doctrine focuses more on qualitative criteria by examining if the assets being sold represent a significant portion of the company's income or a deviation from its core business, even if the assets do not represent a large fraction of the company's total assets. Compare Gimbel v. Signal Cos., 316 A.2d 599, 606 (Del. Ch. 1974) (endorsing the quantitative approach, holding that a sale of 26% of assets generating 15% of income was insufficient to trigger a shareholder vote under DGCL § 271), with Katz v. Bregman, 431 A.2d 1274, 1276 (Del. Ch. 1981) (endorsing the qualitative approach, holding that a sale of assets triggered a shareholder vote under DGCL § 271 where the company would depart from its historically successful line of business by changing from steel drum to plastic drum manufacturing after the proposed sale). See also Hollinger, Inc. v. Hollinger Int'l, Inc., 858 A.2d 342, 377–78 (Del. Ch. 2004) (holding that the sale of an indirect subsidiary comprising approximately half of a company's total assets and revenues did not trigger DGCL § 271, reasoning that the company would still continue as a profitable entity in its historically successful line of business).

31. See Roberta Romano, The Political Economy of Takeover Statutes, 73 VA. L. REV. 111, 115–16 (1987). For a list of states that adopted such legislation, along with statutory references, see infra Appendix I.

acquirer.[32] More importantly, as the immediately following subsection shows, voting is a frequent feature in connection with hostile deals for Delaware target companies.

2. Tender Offers and Proxy Fights: Voting as a Safety Valve for Hostile Deals

In the mid 1980s, the evolution of the law governing tender offers and hostile deals in Delaware led to a system in which, if a bidder does not want to or cannot come to terms with the target board, the only way to override a target's resistance through various defensive devices (most notably, a poison pill)[33] became launching a proxy fight in order to replace the incumbent board of 32. See Lucian Arye Bebchuk, The Case Against Board Veto in Corporate Takeovers, 69 U. CHI. L. REV. 973, 985 (2002).

33. In short, a poison pill in its "flip-in" form gives subscription rights to purchase stock at a considerable discount if any person (alone or acting as a group) acquires a stake in the company in excess of a given threshold (normally, ranging from fifteen to twenty percent): such rights can be exercised by all shareholders with the exception of the person or group crossing the applicable threshold. Hence, a flip-in plan threatens a potential acquirer with significant economic and voting dilution unless the target's board redeems such subscription rights. See Jeffrey N. Gordon, An American Perspective on Anti-takeover Laws in the EU: The German Example, in REFORMING COMPANY AND TAKEOVER LAW IN EUROPE 541, 549 (Guido Ferrarini, Klaus J. Hopt, Jaap Winter & Eddy Wymeersch eds., 2004) ("[T]he flip-in pill operates through a discriminatory issuance of cheap shares that would massively dilute the hostile bidder's stake."). For the mechanics of the pill, see Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz, The Share Purchase Rights Plan, in RONALD J. GILSON & BERNARD S. BLACK, THE LAW AND FINANCE OF CORPORATE ACQUISITIONS 741–42 (2d ed. 1995). The pill is effective for two reasons. First, no shareholder action is needed either for its adoption (so long as the charter, as it always does, authorizes, essentially without any substantial limits, directors to issue shares of blank-check preferred stock, as well as common stock) or for its redemption. Second, the pill really works as a deterrent: the threat of dilution for an unsolicited acquirer is so effective that the triggering of the pill is virtually never needed. The mere fact that the pill is in place compels an acquirer to either try to negotiate a friendly deal with the board or to replace the board through a proxy contest to get rid of the pill. See John C. Coates IV, Ownership, Takeovers and EU Law: How Contestable Should EU Corporations Be?, in REFORMING COMPANY AND TAKEOVER LAW IN EUROPE, supra, at 677, 681 n.18; Jordan M. Barry & John William Hatfield, Pills and Partisans: Understanding Takeover Defenses, 160 U. PA. L. REV. 633, 643–44 (2012).

directors with new directors nominated by the insurgent/bidder who would in turn repeal the defenses (hence, redeem the poison pill).[34] Such a parallel structure[35] is the result of a series of pro-target decisions throughout the 1980s and 1990s, which clarified on many occasions the wide array of discretion a board has in rejecting a takeover proposal.[36] It was the Delaware Supreme Court itself that, after granting targets the power to defend, suggested bidders could still use the proxy fight avenue: as the Delaware judges pointed out in Unocal, no defensive device implemented by

---

34. Bear in mind that a board can always eliminate the effects of the pill ("redeem the pill") by canceling the rights plan to consent to a desirable acquisition by a friendly buyer. Id. at 643. However, the power to redeem gives hostile bidders a path to reversing a board's decision to resist precisely by ousting the incumbent board through a proxy fight and redeeming the pill.

35. One of the most important aspects of pills is that because they can be adopted very easily—in a matter of hours—by the board, all companies have a "shadow" poison pill plan to be approved quickly if and when circumstances so require. See John C. Coates IV, Takeover Defenses in the Shadow of the Pill: A Critique of the Scientific Evidence, 79 TEX. L. REV 271, 289 (2000) [hereinafter Coates, Takeover Defenses]. This means that ex ante a hostile bidder will—for any given target, whether it has a pill in place—always anticipate that if no agreement with the target management is realistically achievable, the only viable option to succeed in a hostile deal is to launch a proxy fight.

36. Delaware judges allow directors to adopt defensive measures so long as they can meet a two-prong test introduced in Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co. that requires that: (i) there are "reasonable grounds for believing that a danger [or a threat] to corporate policy . . . exist[s]" and (ii) the response taken by the company is "reasonable in relation to the threat posed" (the latter is often referred to as the Unocal proportionality test). Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946, 955 (Del. 1985). With the crucial decision in Unocal, the Delaware Supreme Court established an intermediate standard of review between the entire fairness test (the rigorous standard for duty of loyalty cases) and the business judgment rule, which, according to Delaware judges, cannot apply in its pure form in takeover cases "[b]ecause of the omnipresent specter that a board may be acting primarily in its own interests, rather than those of the corporation and its shareholders." Id. at 954 (footnote omitted). The most important practical implication of the Unocal decision was on poison pills: in a subsequent case, the Delaware Supreme Court used the Unocal test to validate the pill. See Moran v. Household Int'l, Inc., 500 A.2d 1346, 1351, 1353 (Del. 1985) (adopting a rights plan by the board of directors of a target as a prospective takeover defense meets the Unocal proportionality test, but the use of the pill in an actual takeover may be subject to specific scrutiny); see also infra note 44.

a target can be considered definitive because, "[i]f the stockholders are displeased with the action of their elected representatives, the powers of corporate democracy are at their disposal to turn the board out."[37] Ultimately, the judges put director elections at the center of attention, which, under existing law, work as a safety valve for the market for corporate control: in the words of the Delaware Supreme Court, "the emergence of the 'poison pill' as an effective takeover device has resulted in such a remarkable transformation in the market for corporate control that hostile bidders who proceed when such defenses are in place will usually 'have to couple proxy contests with tender offers.'"[38] Where tender offers 37. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 959; s*ee also Moran*, 500 A.2d at 1357 (upholding the validity of the pill because, among other things, it does not "fundamentally restrict[] proxy contests."). The availability of the ballot-box route and director elections are often cited as the safety valve for hostile deals in the presence of a pill. See, e.g., Michal Barzuza, The State of State Antitakeover Law, 95 VA. L. REV. 1973, 2005 (2009) (arguing that such safety valve is actually protected by the heightened standard of Blasius, which requires a "compelling justification" for directors who seek to thwart the shareholder franchise); Paul H. Edelman & Randall S. Thomas, Corporate Voting and the Takeover Debate, 58 VAND. L. REV. 453, 459–61 (2005); Barry & Hatfield, supra note 33, at 644; Bebchuk, Coates & Subramanian, supra note 15, at 907–09. But see Air Prods. & Chems., Inc. v. Airgas, Inc., 16 A.3d 48, 58 (Del. Ch. 2011) (holding that Unocal is not breached if an effective staggered board refuses to redeem a pill after an incumbent slate lost the first election).

---

38. Unitrin, Inc. v. Am. Gen. Corp., 651 A.2d 1361, 1379 (Del. 1995) (citation omitted). See generally William T. Allen, Jack B. Jacobs & Leo E. Strine, Jr., Function Over Form: A Reassessment of Standards of Review in Delaware Corporation Law, 26 DEL. J. CORP. L 859, 887 (2001) (noting that, particularly after Paramount Communications, Inc. v. Time, Inc. 571 A.2d 1140 (Del. 1989), "[r]eplacing the board became an essential part of a hostile offeror's strategy, because that was the only way to circumvent the otherwise preclusive effect of the poison pill that the target board would typically refuse to redeem.") (footnote omitted); Lucian Arye Bebchuk & Marcel Kahan, A Framework For Analyzing Legal Policy Towards Proxy Contests, 78 CALIF. L. REV. 1073, 1082 (1990) (acknowledging, in the aftermath of the mid-1980s Delaware decisions, that "proxy contests have reemerged as an important tool for acquiring control."); Gordon, supra note 12, at 522–23; Joseph A. Grundfest, Just Vote No: A Minimalist Strategy for Dealing with Barbarians Inside the Gates, 45 STAN. L. REV. 857, 858 (1993) ("Hostile bidders who proceed despite the[] heightened [legal and financial] barriers will likely have to couple proxy contests with tender offers. . . ."); Thomas, supra note 13, at 509, 524 ("[T]he target company board can force dissidents to rely completely on the pure proxy contest as a alone do not allow going over directors' heads to remove inefficient management, a proxy fight would do.[39] Again, if a deal escalates to the level of a proxy fight to redeem a pill, the vote to replace directors becomes a de facto prerequisite for the deal to go through.[40] It is no coincidence that most of the action moved to the means of pressuring the incumbent board to negotiate a transaction or to push through a change of control."). But see Gilson, supra note 3, at 500–01 (criticizing the choice by Delaware judges to prefer elections over market dynamics); Gilson & Schwartz, supra note 10, at 788 ("[A]n outcome as significant as privileging elections over markets should at least come with an explanation. Providing a reason for an outcome at least imposes the discipline of logic on the range of alternatives available to the court.").

---

39. It is important to qualify the acquisition pattern I have described so far, that is, hostile deals that can (only) be completed by launching (and, if the incumbent board does not capitulate earlier, winning) a proxy fight. In practical terms, such a pattern cannot be pursued by a hostile bidder when certain factors are at work that constrain its ability to vote the target board out: as I explained elsewhere, shareholders may lack the power to determine the outcome of a takeover bid because of corporate law rules, principles, and/or practices acting as barriers to the power to oust the board (think of staggered boards, limits to director removability, shareholders' inability to call special meetings or to act by written consent, supermajority rules, proxy, and, what is the topic of this article, conflict of interest regimes). Gatti, supra note 14, at 109–21. Of all the above factors, the presence of an effective staggered board can be easily considered the most potent and the one that has gotten the most attention by commentators. When a target has a staggered board in place, because only one-third of its members are up for election every year, it takes two board elections, and, hence, at least twelve full months to gain a majority of directors. See Bebchuk, Coates & Subramanian, supra note 15, at 890, who first highlighted the powerful effect of combining poison pills with staggered boards. At the first election, bidders would effectively give target shareholders a put option exercisable a year later: if between the two elections the stock has gone down, the bidder will have to close an acquisition where it is likely overpaying (the stock has gone down while the bidder cannot run the company because it only controls one third of the board); if, however, the target stock has gone up, shareholders (M&A arbitrageurs) would likely not vote for the bidder nominees unless the bidder increases the initial offer.

40. In his discussion on this topic, Lucian Bebchuck states:

> Because directors usually can maintain a pill as long as they are in office, a hostile takeover would require that the bidder first replace the directors through a ballot box victory with directors that would redeem the pill. The voting, again, would not be formally on the offer but rather on the election of directors. But the vote would be practically a referendum on the ballot box: Delaware case law on the legitimacy of takeover defenses has evolved, reflecting a tension between the idea that hostile bidders should be able, at least in theory, to resort to the weapon of the proxy fight[41] and the fact that "[m]anagers and their lawyers have sought . . . to neutralize the power of the shareholder vote."[42] In doing that, the Delaware judiciary has unsurprisingly been more responsive to management worries than bidders' aspirations:[43] today, a takeover defense would pass the Unocal standard so long as the target's response does not make "a bidder's ability to wage a successful proxy contest and gain control [of the board] . . . 'realistically unattainable[,]'"[44] which is arguably a pretty low bar.

> offer; the voting on directors would decide the fate of the offer, would be understood as such, and would be determined by shareholders' judgments concerning the offer.

Bebchuk, supra note 32, at 985.

41. See Gilson & Schwartz, supra note 10, at 787–88, for a critique ("Without confronting the issue directly, the Delaware Supreme Court appears to have assumed that the availability of a proxy fight renders the poison pill non-preclusive, thereby shifting attention to the circumstances under which the proxy fight could be conducted.").

42. Dale A. Oesterle & Alan R. Palmiter, Judicial Schizophrenia in Shareholder Voting Cases, 79 IOWA L. REV. 485, 493 (1994); see also Gordon, supra note 12, at 531 ("[R]elying solely on shareholder suffrage gives the board incentives to take various measures to evade elections."); Thomas, supra note 13, at 505.

43. See Steven M. Davidoff, A Case Study: Air Products v. Airgas and the Value of Strategic Judicial Decision-Making, 2012 COLUM. BUS. L. REV. 502, 505–07 (2012), for an account of interest group pressures faced by Delaware judges in the takeover field.

44. Versata Enters., Inc. v. Selectica, Inc., 5 A.3d 586, 601 (Del. 2010) (citing Carmody v. Toll Bros., Inc., 723 A.2d 1180, 1195 (Del. Ch. 1998)); see also Air Prods. & Chems., Inc. v. Airgas, Inc., 16 A.3d 48, 113 (Del. Ch. 2011) (following the Versata instructions). In Versata, the Delaware Supreme Court confirmed how courts should interpret the Unocal proportionality requirement. Versata, 5 A.3d at 605. Such requirement had been initially clarified, in terms of preclusiveness, by Unitrin. Unitrin, Inc. v. Am. Gen. Corp., 651 A.2d 1361, 1367 (Del. 1995). Under Unitrin, in order to fail the second prong under Unocal, that is, the proportionality test, the board's actions must be "draconian, by being either preclusive or coercive[,]" and, "[i]f the . . . response [is] not draconian, the Court must then determine whether it [falls] 'within a range of reasonable responses to the threat' posed." Airgas, 16 A.3d at 92–93 (quoting Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1367). The Versata Court explained that there is no impermissible preclusion if a successful proxy fight is still realistically attainable. Versata, 5

B. The Rationales for Voting in Acquisitions

All in all, shareholders of Delaware companies often get to vote in the context of corporate acquisitions: as some commentators put it, "shareholder voting's most important contribution in the corporate governance area is in the takeover arena."[45] This is in countertrend with the otherwise scarce instances of matters on which they generally vote under the DGCL.[46] The reasons behind the right to vote vary depending on whether the transaction is sell-side (where they generally have such a right)[47] or buy-side (where they rarely get it)[48] and, of course, depending on the actual structure of the transaction (merger, asset sale or tender offer).

From an historical and structural perspective, shareholder voting in mergers derives from the old rules channeling the principle of "inviolability of contract[,]" which required a unanimous approval to alter the initial terms of the investment made by the shareholders.[49] Over the 1800s, unanimity went out of favor because it promoted strategic hold-outs at the expense of consolidations that were considered necessary for technological innovation:[50] it first turned into supermajority and subsequently into ma-

---

A.3d at 604. It was the Unitrin decision itself that first introduced the concept that takeover defenses are legitimate so long as the bidder's chances to win an election to replace the board are not "mathematically impossible or realistically unattainable." Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1388–89.

45. Edelman & Thomas, supra note 37, at 460 (citing FRANK H EASTERBROOK & DANIEL R. FISCHEL, THE ECONOMIC STRUCTURE OF CORPORATE LAW 70 (1991)).

46. See generally Thompson & Edelman, supra note 29, at 130 ("Voting plays a limited role in corporate decisionmaking, much more limited than in the public sphere. Shareholders have binding votes on only two things: the election of directors and ratifying fundamental corporate changes such as mergers."). See also Oesterle & Palmiter, supra note 42, at 501 ("[S]hareholder suffrage in American public corporations is limited and largely perfunctory.").

47. See supra note 28.

48. See supra note 29.

49. William Carney, Fundamental Corporate Changes, Minority Shareholders, and Business Purposes, 1980 AM. B. FOUND. RES. J. 69, 79–92 (describing the evolution of rules governing fundamental changes and noting that the more liberal approach towards asset sales was progressively extended to consolidations).

50. Id. at 79 (citing, in particular, technological change to develop the long-line railroad).

jority of the shares outstanding.[51] Note, however, that one cannot read too much into the decisional powers by shareholders in a merger for the simple fact that the entire process depends for the largest part on directors' initiative.[52] In fact, the whole gatekeeper power rests on the board: "[i]f [the board] does not wish for a merger to happen, it is not obligated to put the matter before the shareholders, hardly an indication of shareholder primacy."[53] In any event, as Black and Kraakman point out, the "law supports bilateral decision-making by shareholders and the board on decisions that are fundamental to the corporation's identity and existence, especially decisions that place managers and directors in a final period problem, where agency costs are likely to be high."[54]

Voting in tender offers, when it happens, simply flows from the governance structure of a corporation in which shareholders have extremely limited decisional power, which nonetheless includes the right to remove and elect directors[55]—a power that

---

51. As stated by Gilson and Black:

> Prior to the 1960s, the great majority of states required a two-thirds vote. This pattern was broken in 1962 when the Model Business Corporation Act reduced the required percentage approval to a majority. . . . Delaware reduc[ed] the vote requirement in its statute from two-thirds to a majority in 1967.

GILSON & BLACK, supra note 33, at 642–43 (footnotes omitted). See Carney, supra note 49, at 95. The ease for approving mergers was counterbalanced with the added protection of appraisal rights. Id. at 70–71, 94–95. See also Robert B. Thompson, Exit, Liquidity, and Majority Rule: Appraisal's Role in Corporate Law, 84 GEO. L.J. 1, 3–4 (1995).

52. Thompson & Edelman, supra note 29, at 139.

53. Id.

54. Black & Kraakman, supra note 6, at 559 (noting that "[a] mandatory shareholder vote on mergers and sales of all or substantially all assets, and the appraisal remedy for mergers, belie the assumption that the law should always presume that the board knows best."); see WILLIAM T. ALLEN, REINIER KRAAKMAN & GUHAN SUBRAMANIAN, COMMENTARIES AND CASES ON THE LAW OF BUSINESS ORGANIZATIONS 462 (2012) (mentioning special agency problems when incumbents potentially face a final period).

55. Delaware law requires a shareholder vote only for certain types of acquisitions, namely mergers (subject to some exceptions), see DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 215(c) (West 2010), and sales of all or substantially all of the assets, see DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 271 (West 2010). As mentioned earlier, a shareholder vote can be triggered in the tender offer context, but not as an automatic requirement; rather it would naturally flow from basic corporate law rules on di-

Delaware judges exalted to show the non-definitive nature of takeover defenses and ultimately justify them.[56] So, when we answer the question as to why the lawmaker conferred voting power to shareholders in the context of acquisitions, we have all but a unitary explanation.

Still, if we look at shareholder voting in the context of acquisitions from a functional perspective, we observe something different and quite interesting. When shareholders vote in an acquisition, especially when they vote from a sell-side standpoint, the aggregation of their preferences works, either de jure[57] or de facto,[58] as a requisite approval for the transaction to go through. Such an approval is value-based: each shareholder has to determine whether he or she would be better off with or without the transaction. To that end, they compare the per-share consideration under the transaction with their own reservation price based on what they think the long-term value of the target will be if the transaction does not get approved.[59]

In the context of hostile deals, some scholars believe that shareholder voting is an effective way to solve the so-called pressure-to-tender problem affecting tender offers: the concern that shareholders might decide whether to tender their shares not on the basis of the merits of the offer but rather because they want to rector removability and election, see DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, §§ 141(k), 211(b), 216, which, to be sure, are subject to a whole host of bells and whistles, depending whether directors may be removed without cause, an effective staggered board is in place, shareholders can call special meetings or act by written consent, and so forth. See Gatti, supra note 14, at 109–21. Bear in mind that the inverse can also be true: there are tender offers that do not entail any vote, yet they share the same functional result of the transactions that do entail one. Just like many other major business and financial decisions, tender offers can happen without getting any shareholders' approval.

---

56. See supra notes 37–40 and accompanying text.

57. That is the case for mergers and asset sales. See supra notes 28 and 30 and accompanying text.

58. In hostile deals, sometimes winning the proxy fight to replace the board and redeem the poison pill is the only strategy a bidder can pursue. See supra notes 38–44 and accompanying text.

59. See, e.g., Lucian Arye Bebchuk, Toward Undistorted Choice and Equal Treatment in Corporate Takeovers, 98 HARV. L. REV. 1695, 1700–01 (1985) [hereinafter Bebchuk, Undistorted Choice]; Barry & Hatfield, supra note 33, at 661–62.

avoid failing to tender to an offer that is ultimately successful, in which case they would get stuck with minority shares that would trade at a much lower price.[60] By way of voting, the argument goes, shareholders are able to decide cohesively, as if they were a "sole owner."[61] The decision reached by shareholders is considered the best tool to obtain a statistical approximation[62] of what a

---

60. Lucian Bebchuk is the most prominent advocate of shareholder voting in connection with tender offers. See Lucian Arye Bebchuk, The Sole Owner Standard for Takeover Policy, 17 J. LEGAL STUD. 197, 198 (1988) [hereinafter Bebchuk, Sole Owner]; Bebchuk, Undistorted Choice, supra note 59, at 1747–54.

61. Lucian Arye Bebchuk, A Model of the Outcome of Takeover Bids 16, 22 (Harvard Law Sch., John M. Olin Ctr. Law, Econ. & Bus., Discussion Paper No. 11, 1985) (on file with author); see also Zohar Goshen, Voting (Insincerely) in Corporate Law, 2 THEORETICAL INQUIRIES IN L. 815, 835 (2001) [hereinafter Goshen, Voting (Insincerely)] ("These restrictions [including shareholder voting] allow security holders to arrive at the group preference by forcing people who wish to transact with the group to acquire its consent.").

62. See Zohar Goshen, The Efficiency of Controlling Corporate Self-Dealing: Theory Meets Reality, 91 CALIF. L. REV. 393, 399 (2003) [hereinafter Goshen, Controlling Corporate Self-Dealing]. On majority voting as the best approximation to determine a group preference, with particular regards to corporate law, Goshen states that "[t]he voting mechanism is based on the assumption that the majority opinion expresses the 'group preference,' that is, the optimal choice for the group as a whole. Id. Goshen also states:

> Voting is most commonly accepted as the best method for extracting the group preference from among the disparate and diverging subjective opinions of the group of security holders. The majority view of the security holders reflects the optimal choice for the group as a whole, providing the best approximation of the choice that would be implemented if a single individual, rather than a group, were making the decision. The presumed correlation between the group preference and the majority view rests on a statistical proposition: assuming each security holder is more likely to be correct than mistaken, the choice made by the largest number of voters will most probably be the "correct" one. Hence, it is certainly in the minority's interest, ex ante, that the majority view prevail.

Goshen, Voting (Insincerely), supra note 61, at 817–18 (citations omitted); see also GILSON & BLACK, supra note 33, at 643 ("[T]he majority requirement . . . [is] based on the simple assumption that if more shareholders favor a transaction than oppose it, the gains to those favoring it will exceed the losses to those opposing it and, therefore, the transaction will result in a net gain."). Clearly, majority voting in the corporate context has a pretty different meaning than the sole owner would have done in a two-person, buyer and seller negotiation.[63] In the absence of a vote, shareholders would fail to coordinate and might likely decide to tender because of pressure to do so. Since shareholders are able to tender their shares even if they voted against the bid, through a vote they can express their genuine opinion of the bid based on how they view the offer price versus the expected value of the target if it were to stay independent. Notably, the U.S. Supreme Court endorsed this rationale in the CTS Corp. v. Dynamics Corp. of America decision when it upheld the constitutionality of the Indiana anti-takeover statute, a control share acquisition statute.[64] numerical majority we are accustomed to in regular political elections. Here, "majority" means majority of shares cast in favor or against a given resolution: as each share generally carries one vote, larger shareholdings can carry more votes than shareholders that only won a few shares. But the validity of a majority proposition is assured by the fact that those who own more shares are deemed to have better incentives to make the right decision since they can reap the benefits (or alternatively bear the bad consequences) of their choice. See Frank H. Easterbrook & Daniel R. Fischel, Voting in Corporate Law, 26 J.L. & ECON. 395, 408–09 (1983); Stephen M. Bainbridge, The Case for Limited Shareholder Voting Rights, 53 UCLA L. REV. 601, 612–13 (2006).

---

63. See Lucian Arye Bebchuk, Pressure to Tender: An Analysis and a Proposed Remedy, 12 DEL. J. CORP. L. 911, 915–17 (1987) (discussing the actions of a sole owner in the sale of his or her assets and why the shareholder vote is the best mechanism to ensure undistorted choice and efficient allocation of assets in a tender offer); Goshen, Controlling Corporate Self-Dealing, supra note 62, at 399–400.

64. The United States Supreme Court in CTS Corp. v. Dynamics Corp. of America stated:

> The Indiana Act operates on the assumption, implicit in the Williams Act, that independent shareholders faced with tender offers often are at a disadvantage. By allowing such shareholders to vote as a group, the Act protects them from the coercive aspects of some tender offers. If, for example, shareholders believe that a successful tender offer will be followed by a purchase of nontendering shares at a depressed price, individual shareholders may tender their shares—even if they doubt the tender offer is in the corporation's best interest—to protect themselves from being forced to sell their shares at a depressed price. As the SEC explains: "The alternative of not accepting the tender offer is virtual assurance that, if the offer is successful, the shares will have to be sold in the lower priced, second step." Two-Tier Tender Offer Pricing and Non-

A system of shareholder referendums for takeovers is not without its critics, who come from opposite sides of the takeover debate. On the one hand, takeover champions like Gilson and Schwartz believe that tender offers combined with director elections (i.e., the byproduct of Unocal, Unitrin, and their progeny) perform worse than pure buyer/seller market transactions like stand-alone tender offers. One reason is because tender offers are cheaper to run and quicker, while "target managers have an incentive and the opportunity to pervert an election process."[65] Similarly, Gordon questions the overall logic of giving directors ample powers to say no to a deal in the aim of helping shareholders not make valuation mistakes[66] but then offer shareholders the ballot box route: "[i]f shareholders are prone to mistakes in evaluating a hostile bid, why are they suddenly wiser in deciding how to vote in the related proxy battle presenting the same issue?"[67] On the other hand, management advocates and takeover critics like Stephen Bainbridge and Martin Lipton believe that shareholders' final say on a takeover is a dangerous policy because, among other things, it would foster short termism and give arbitrageurs pivoting power

> Tender Offer Purchase Programs, SEC Exchange Act Rel. No. 21079 (June 21, 1984), [1984 Transfer Binder] CCH Fed.Sec.L.Rep. ¶ 83,637, p. 86,916 (footnote omitted) . . . . See Lowenstein, Pruning Deadwood in Hostile Takeovers: A Proposal for Legislation, 83 COLUM. L. REV. 249, 307–309 (1983). In such a situation under the Indiana Act, the shareholders as a group, acting in the corporation's best interest, could reject the offer, although individual shareholders might be inclined to accept it. The desire of the Indiana Legislature to protect shareholders of Indiana corporations from this type of coercive offer does not conflict with the Williams Act. Rather, it furthers the federal policy of investor protection.

CTS Corp. v. Dynamics Corp. of America, 481 U.S. 69, 82–83 (1987).

65. Gilson & Schwartz, supra note 10, at 791 (conceding that the issue is ultimately an empirical matter, yet in their theoretical model "transfer by vote appears . . . to be a less efficient mode than transfer by sale.").

66. This, in short, is the concern the court in Unitrin raised to justify the use of defensive measures. See Unitrin, Inc. v. Am. Gen. Corp., 651 A.2d 1361, 1385 (Del. 1995) (discussing how substantive coercion, that is, the showing that shareholders could accept an inadequate offer because of "ignorance or mistaken belief[,]" is sufficient for directors to show the existence of a threat under Unocal).

67. Gordon, supra note 12, at 530.

over acquisitions.[68] For purposes of this article, there is no need to take a position on this issue: I treat shareholder voting in hostile deals as a given.

In sum, albeit shareholder voting generally has a limited role in corporate governance, its gating importance in acquisitions cannot be understated. Put simply, without a shareholder vote, mergers and sales of all the assets cannot happen.[69] Even hostile takeovers require a vote, whether actual or operating in the shadow—that is, simply feared by the target because it is either threatened or launched and withdrawn following a target's decision to capitulate.[70]

C. "Sincerity" as a Basic Element of Majority Voting

Whether or not the right policy choice,[71] shareholders are entrusted with the power to determine the fate of an M&A deal, either by statute or the way the law of the market for corporate control has evolved.[72] To support shareholder choice, both state and federal law provide safeguards and protections of a various nature. These include mandatory disclosure, procedural rules for the meeting (including the applicable quorum and approval requirements),[73] as well as subjecting directors to extensive fiduciary

---

68. Short-term oriented investing as represented by event-driven, merger arbitrageurs is central to understanding pro-target advocates' support for anti-takeover measures like poison pills, staggered boards, and delayed shareholder elections. Since the inception of the 1980s takeover boom, Martin Lipton, the most prominent voice in management advocacy, has been citing investors' short-termism as a primary justification for empowering directors with veto power in the context of hostile acquisitions. Martin Lipton, Takeover Bids in the Target's Boardroom, 35 BUS. LAW 101, 104–05 (1979) (insulating boards of directors from shareholder pressure best serves the long-term interests of the corporation and its long-term shareholders); see also Stephen M. Bainbridge, Response to Increasing Shareholder Power: Director Primacy and Shareholder Disempowerment, 119 HARV. L. REV. 1735, 1744–51 (2006).

69. Unless it is a short-form merger or a tender offer combined with a merger under Section 251(h) of the DGCL. See supra notes 28 and 30 and accompanying text.

70. See Gatti, supra note 14, at 85 n.26.; infra note 242 and accompanying text (providing accounts where proxy fights operated "in the shadows").

71. See supra notes 65 and 68 and accompanying text.

72. See supra Section II.A.

73. Cf. DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 141(k) (West 2016) (detailing procedures for removing directors or an entire board); DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 251(c) duties in order to bolster the disclosure apparatus and the effectiveness of the franchise.

My focus is to establish whether in the context of M&A deals the majority rule is effective in aggregating shareholders preferences: in particular, I analyze whether the majority vote should be sincere, that is, not tainted by conflicts of interests by some shareholders. Sincerity is indeed considered a precondition for the efficiency of a majority vote, [74] and efficiency is a proxy (West 2016) (laying out the notice requirements as well as the procedure for signing a merger agreement); DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 271(a) (West 2010) (noting that stockholders or members with the right to vote must approve a sale, lease, or exchange of assets at a meeting); DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 211(b) (West 2009); DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 216(3) (West 2007) (noting that directors must be elected by a plurality of those present at a board meeting); see also Janet Fischer & Mary Alcock, Voting at Annual Meetings, in CLEARLY GOTTLIEB MERGERS & ACQUISITIONS REPORT CORPORATE GOVERNANCE REPORT 14, 16–17 (June/September 2007), http://web.archive.org/web/20151203063914/http:/www.cgsh.com/files/Publication/589d153f-cf1b-4ee0-ba93-d653470caa99/Presentation/PublicationAttachment/052f619c-f3dc-4af3-b36e-d7423556e6e0/CG%20M%26A%20and%20Corporate%20Governance%20Report.pdf (discussing "whether the quorum requirement is met and whether the proposal received enough 'for' votes to pass"); Richard W. Barrett, Note, Elephant in the Boardroom?: Counting the Vote in Corporate Elections, 44 VAL. U. L. REV. 125, 158–64 (2009) (for the account that understanding vote tabulating rules can be tricky and ministerial mistakes are not that rare).

74. Several works by Zohar Goshen study the interplay between majority voting and conflicts of interests under U.S. corporate law:

> [I]f the shareholders of a target company have a common interest—increasing share value—but differ on the question of whether or not they will benefit from a proposed reorganization, the proposed solution will allow us to ascertain the group preference. The majority opinion will be the best measure because majority choice is the most efficient alternative. On the other hand, the proposed solution will not be appropriate in cases where the parties have conflicting interests and differ not only regarding their judgment about the preferred alternative but also regarding the desired result . . . . When such a conflict of interest exists between voters, the majority's opinion is not necessarily the most efficient choice for the group.

Zohar Goshen, Controlling Strategic Voting: Property Rule or Liability Rule?, 70 S. CAL. L. REV. 741, 797 (1997) [hereinafter Goshen, Controlling Strategic Voting]; see also Goshen, Controlling Corporate Self-Dealing, supra note 62, at 399–400; Goshen, Voting (Insincerely), supra note 61, at 815. Cf. Iman Anab-that corporate scholars, by looking at any marginal improvement of aggregate shareholder wealth, have used to assess a voting system's effectiveness.[75] My work looks into whether shareholder voting in M&A deals can be considered to effectively and efficiently aggregate shareholder preferences. Does the system care if the vote is sincere? By sincerity, I mean that the vote be cast by an interested shareholder with the purpose of satisfying his or her own private preference[76] against the common preference of fostering tawi, Some Skepticism About Increasing Shareholder Power, 53 UCLA L. REV. 561, 575 (2006) ("Shareholders with private interests . . . might prefer the firm to pursue those interests at the expense of the interests they have in common with other shareholders."); Michael C. Schouten, The Mechanisms of Voting Efficiency, 2010 COLUM. BUS. L. REV. 763, 773, 802–03 ("When shareholders have heterogeneous preferences and some vote with a view to maximizing their private interests rather than their pro-rata share of the firm's future cash flows, the probability that a majority of the shares is voted for the correct option decreases dramatically.") (discussing conflicted insincere voting); Thompson & Edelman, supra note 29, at 174 (relying on votes to determine the decision of the group requires that voters' interest be aligned with the collective interest).

---

75. See, e.g., Bebchuk, Sole Owner, supra note 60, at 203; Goshen, Voting (Insincerely), supra note 61, at 816–17; Schouten, supra note 74, at 774–75. Although I am well aware that, as a principle to guide director actions, shareholder wealth maximization is far from being a settled concept, see infra Section III.C.2.b, using it for purposes of testing the effectiveness of a voting system is the correct methodological approach. When the corporate law system entrusts the very group of shareholder-principals with the power to make certain decisions and essentially allows the aggregated preferences of the majority to bind the dissenters and select the course of action for the corporation and/or the outcome of the deal (as in the case of a joint takeover and proxy fight), it only appears normal to expect (i) shareholders to pursue an improvement in their wealth and (ii) that the underlying voting procedure to serve as instrument for such quest and to thus reflect adequately and with fidelity such aggregated preferences. Now, few can dispute that shareholders invest in corporations to make money and increase their wealth, hence the choice to use shareholder value as a metric—what can be and is disputed with respect to shareholder preferences is that they may very well not be homogeneous because of diverse attitudes towards risk, liquidity constraints, investment strategy, investment horizon, and so forth. But as a starting point, it is safe and useful to establish that certain procedural preconditions need to be in place to ensure that through the vote shareholders can improve their wealth.

76. See GILSON & BLACK, supra note 33, at 649 ("[T]he term 'interested' is a shorthand for the fact that the shareholder is disproportionately affected by the proposed action."); see also Anabtawi, supra note 74, at 564 n.9 ("By 'pri-

the corporation's interests;[77] this is something that makes economic sense for the given shareholder whenever the private benefit is greater than the pro-rata loss qua shareholder.[78] Imagine, for instance, a given transaction with a negative net effect for a corporation (say a sale of assets at less than fair market value), in which the potential pro-rata loss that a shareholder might suffer is offset by the gain such shareholder would otherwise make because of her conflicting interest in the transaction (assume she is the acquirer of the asset at the below market price) and the vote cast by such shareholder is pivotal to approve the transaction.[79]

Delaware case law has shown sensitivity over the issue of misalignments of shareholder interests in general: not long ago, in 2010, quoting Professors Thompson and Edelman, in a vote-buying case the Delaware Supreme Court cautioned that a disconnect between voting rights and the economic interests of shares "'compromises the ability of voting to perform its assigned role'" as "a decisionmaking system that relies on votes to determine the decision of the group necessarily requires that the voters' interest be aligned with the collective interest."[80] However, as the subsecvate' interests, I mean those interests of a shareholder that are not shared by shareholders generally.").

---

77. See Goshen, Voting (Insincerely), supra note 61, at 815. Goshen believes that "the proper functioning of the voting mechanism is often endangered due to insincere voting" and that "[t]he mechanism cannot operate properly unless every security holder votes sincerely, that is, in accordance with his or her personal belief regarding the value of the transaction to the corporation as a whole." Id. Note that, in Goshen's view, insincere voting means two things: strategic voting and conflict of interest voting. The former occurs "[w]henever voters take into account how other members of the group will vote," while the latter, the topic of this article, is when shareholders "vote according to their assessment of the transaction's value to them personally outside of the group." Id. at 818. See also Goshen, Controlling Corporate Self-Dealing, supra note 62, at 400; Schouten, supra note 74, at 802.

78. See Anabtawi, supra note 74, at 575.

79. If it is not pivotal, the lack of sincerity would not alter the outcome and would thus be irrelevant. With respect to vote-buying, see Crown Emak Partners, LLC v. Kurz, 992 A.2d 377, 387 (2010) ("[V]ote buying merits judicial review if it is disenfranchising, i.e., if it actually affects the outcome of the vote.") (citation omitted).

80. Id. at 388 (quoting Thompson & Edelman, supra note 29, at 153, 174) (emphasis added); see Goshen, Voting (Insincerely), supra note 61, at 818 ("[C]onflict of interests voting undermines the voting system's ability to ascer-tions that immediately follow can tell, while M&A law has addressed the issue in certain situations such as freeze-out transactions, it has been silent on others such as proxy fights in connection with tender offers.

1. Sincerity of Shareholder Votes in Freeze-Out Transactions

Lack of sincerity due to a shareholder conflict can therefore trigger deviations from what would have otherwise been the optimal outcome of the vote for the corporation. The most discernible scenario is of course a parent/subsidiary freeze-out merger, in which the parent company, with sufficient votes to approve the merger at the shareholder meeting of the subsidiary, has a clear interest in saving costs in the buy-out transaction and not paying a sizeable price to shareholders.[81] The fact that a parent has enough votes to push the transaction arguably makes the voting exercise potentially futile; that is why the law does not seek to simply curb the conflicted vote but goes on to expand the breadth of fiduciary duties both directors of the subsidiary and the controlling shareholder are subject to. Indeed, under Delaware law this situation triggers an enhanced level of scrutiny of the underlying transaction, which goes under the name of entire fairness and requires the defendant directors and controlling shareholder to show both "fair dealing" and "fair price." [82] Subsequent case law clarified that the tain the group preference by shifting the focus away from the transaction's value to the group as a whole towards the voters' personal stakes in the deal.").

---

81. See generally Guhan Subramanian, Fixing Freezeouts, 115 YALE L.J. 2, 8–9 (2005) (noting that the levels of freeze-outs activity increased in the 1960s and 1970s when stock markets were not performing well and controlling shareholders took advantage of fire-sale prices for the subsidiary stock). S*ee also* Ronald J. Gilson & Jeffrey N. Gordon, Controlling Controlling Shareholders, 152 U. PA. L. REV. 785, 796 (2003) (A "method by which a controlling shareholder can extract private benefits of control is through freezing out minority shareholders at a market price that reflects a discount equivalent to the private benefits of control available from operating the controlled corporation.").

82. In Weinberger v. UOP, Inc., the Delaware Supreme Court stated:

> [Fair dealing] embraces questions of when the transaction was timed, how it was initiated, structured, negotiated, disclosed to the directors, and how the approvals of the directors and the stockholders were obtained. . . . [Fair price] relates to the economic and financial considerations of the proposed merger, burden of proving that the transaction meets such criteria, which the entire fairness standard initially puts on the defendants because of the conflicted nature of the transaction, can be shifted back to the plaintiff if certain procedural safeguards are followed: namely, that the transaction is either negotiated by an independent committee with broad negotiating powers (inclusive of the power to appoint separate counsel and financial advisor, as well as to say no to the transaction)[83] or that the transaction is approved by the majority of the minority of the subsidiary shareholders.[84]

Note again that the entire fairness scrutiny does not necessarily entail a limitation on the parent's voting rights at the shareholders' meeting of the subsidiary: Rosenblatt specified that approval by a majority of the minority is not "a legal prerequisite"[85] > including all relevant factors . . . . However, the test for fairness is not a bifurcated one as between fair dealing and price. All aspects of the issue must be examined as a whole since the question is one of entire fairness.

Weinberger v. UOP, Inc., 457 A.2d 701, 711 (Del. 1983) (footnotes omitted.).

83. The independent committee was actually a suggestion by the Weinberger court:

> Although perfection is not possible, or expected, the result here could have been entirely different if UOP had appointed an independent negotiating committee of its outside directors to deal with Signal at arm's length. Since fairness in this context can be equated to conduct by a theoretical, wholly independent, board of directors acting upon the matter before them, it is unfortunate that this course apparently was neither considered nor pursued. Particularly in a parent-subsidiary context, a showing that the action taken was as though each of the contending parties had in fact exerted its bargaining power against the other at arm's length is strong evidence that the transaction meets the test of fairness.

Id. at 709 n.7 (citations omitted).

84. Compare Kahn v. Lynch Commc'ns Sys., 638 A.2d 1110, 1117 (Del. 1994) (clarifying that an effective independent committee would only shift the burden of proof, which in the specific case did not happen because the independent committee faced a retributive threat by parent—to launch a tender offer at a lower price if the committee kept rejecting it terms—, thus impairing its judgment and negotiating abilities), with Rosenblatt v. Getty Oil Co., 493 A.2d 929, 937 (Del. 1985) ("[A]pproval of a merger . . . by an informed vote of a majority of the minority shareholders, while not a legal prerequisite, shifts the burden of proving the unfairness of the merger entirely to the plaintiffs.").

85. Rosenblatt, 493 A.2d at 937.

and so parent companies can get away with not subjecting the deal to a majority of the minority provision if they entrusted a well-functioning independent committee with broad negotiating powers.[86] Also, even if a voting limitation is put in place on a voluntary basis by way of subjecting the deal to a majority-of-the-minority condition, under some circumstances such a safeguard might not be enough to escape liability in the presence of procedural or disclosure flaws:[87] all the minority vote does is shift the burden of proof, but entire fairness remains the standard, [88] unless the transaction meets the recent and more onerous procedural requirements of the MFW safe harbor (in a nutshell, approval of the transaction by both an independent committee of directors and a majority of the minority of shareholders), in which case the transaction will be subject to simple business judgment review.[89]

All in all, the conflict in a parent/subsidiary freeze-merger is a well-known and amply explored issue in case law and legal literature—while this article does not purport to investigate it further, I note that, first, the law acknowledges the issue by regulating the transaction through, among other things, limiting the voting

---

86. See Subramanian, supra note 81, at 16 (showing evidence that transactions planners prefer independent committees to majority-of-the-minority approvals).

87. This is what happened in Weinberger when the Court held that the minority vote was insufficient because "[m]aterial information, necessary to acquaint those shareholders with the bargaining positions of Signal and UOP, was withheld under circumstances amounting to a breach of fiduciary duty." Weinberger, 457 A.2d, at 703–08 (using proprietary information of the subsidiary, two of its directors—who were also directors of the parent—conducted a study to determine the fair price to offer in acquiring the remaining stock, but they only shared the results with inside directors, and shareholders were never informed).

88. See supra note 84.

89. Kahn v. M & F Worldwide Corp., 88 A.3d 635, 645–55 (Del. 2014) (explaining that the business judgment standard of review applies if the controlling stockholder subjects the merger to the necessary approval of: (i) a special committee of independent directors with separate financial and legal advisors, fully empowered to reject the transaction and negotiating a fair price with due care and (ii) a majority of the unaffiliated stockholders, fully informed and not coerced).

rights of the controlling shareholder and, second, one of the devices the law uses is the majority-of-the-minority condition.[90]

2. Sincerity of Shareholder Votes in Deals for Contestable Companies

A less obvious, yet equally critical scenario occurs in connection with transactions for companies with control contestable in the market, especially in hostile deals. As mentioned earlier, if a bidder cannot come to terms with target management over an acquisition proposal, the only way to override anti-takeover devices is to mount a proxy fight and repeal them.[91] In other words, buyers in pure hostile deals (that is, deals that start and finish with the two sides antagonizing) must make use of a shareholder vote to replace directors, with the vote being a de facto prerequisite for the deal success.[92]

Now, similar to the parent in a freeze-out transaction, the bidder does sit opposite to the target shareholders and thus is in potential conflict with them. Still, it is not expected that a bidder will refrain from voting in the proxy fight since replacing the board of directors is ultimately the last resort a bidder has in order to succeed in a hostile deal.[93] And of course that is not the only conflict

---

90. Marcel Kahan & Edward Rock, The Hanging Chads of Corporate Voting, 96 GEO. L.J. 1227, 1232 (2008) ("Delaware case law, while not requiring shareholder approval of self-dealing transactions . . . provides a variety of inducements for it."). See Goshen, Controlling Corporate Self-Dealing, supra note 62, at 402, for a discussion on the majority-of-the-minority vote as a device to solve self-dealing problems.

91. See supra note 34 and accompanying text.

92. As noted infra note 242 and accompanying text, I reckon that not all hostile deals end up in an actual vote because many times the target or, as the case may be, the bidder will capitulate before even continuing with the vote: that happens whenever management or bidder believe they have little chance to prevail.

93. That bidders may and actually have to vote to win a proxy fight to redeem a pill is considered as a given in the literature, and it clearly happens in practice. For example:

> For a dissident shareholder group to win a proxy contest for corporate control, the shareholder group must either purchase enough voting shares to vote itself into office, or persuade enough other shareholders to vote for the dissident slate so that it obtains a majority of the votes cast in the election.

that might alter the voting outcome: because of the desire to maintain their respective roles, the votes cast by directors and management of the target, together with persons affiliated with them, are also potentially in conflict with the interests of the other shareholders.[94]

To be sure, as I explain further in Part IV,[95] shareholders' conflicts of interest are circumstantial: the mere possibility of a conflict (that is, the simple, positional conflict of bidders sitting on the other side of the transaction or the desire to stay in power for target directors and managers) is not per se sufficient to taint the

---

Thomas, supra note 13, at 512.

94. With particular regard to director elections in the context of an acquisition, see Gilson & Schwartz, supra note 10, at 792, for an argument that "a minority composed of target management and its associates may have sufficient intensity of preference to defeat an efficient takeover because the manager group will have a large, private stake in the outcome." See also Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946, 954 (Del. 1985) (mentioning "the omnipresent specter that a board may be acting primarily in its own interests, rather than those of the corporation and its shareholders . . . ."). The literature on directors' conflicts in tender offers is vast, to say the least. See, e.g., ROBERT C. CLARK, CORPORATE LAW 588 (1986) ("[I]n no other context is the conflict of interest as serious as in the takeover situation.") (emphasis in original); Allen, Jacobs & Strine, supra note 38, at 862 ("[T]he directors have no direct pecuniary interest in the transaction but have an 'entrenchment' interest, i.e., an interest in protecting their existing control of the corporation."); Black & Kraakman, supra note 6, at 557–58 ("If the possibility that a controlling shareholder might cash out minority shareholders without sharing hidden value with them disqualifies the hidden value model in change-of-control transactions, why does the risk that a target's board will be either disloyal or simply wrong in its claim of hidden value not have the same effect?"). Additionally, it is argued that:

> The lower stock price . . . is not . . . a moderate deterrent to board misbehavior in control contests. To entrenched managers, it is better to have a job with a capital-poor company than no job at all. The proxy fight changes their calculus, forcing managers to factor in the prospect of unemployment, even if they can mount successful tender offer defenses. Courts crafted the standards for tender offer defenses assuming the backstop of a proxy contest. To now absorb the proxy contest defenses into the forgiving judicial regime for tender offer defenses is conceptually and practically mistaken."

Oesterle & Palmiter, supra note 42, at 580.

95. For particular examples, see infra Sections IV.B.1, IV.B.2, and IV.B.4.a.

vote. It is in fact pursuing a personal interest and voting in the given resolution against the interests of the other shareholders that amounts to a pathology; determining what the interests of the other shareholders are depends on facts and circumstances arising from the actual offer on the table. In other words, assuming conflicts need to be analyzed under a shareholder wealth maximization norm,[96] if the offer is value maximizing, directors and managers voting against it (that is, voting to maintain the board and leave the pill in place) will be in conflict, but the bidder voting in favor will not. Conversely, if the offer is not value maximizing, the bidder voting in favor (that is, voting to replace the board and redeem the pill) will be in conflict, while directors and managers voting against will not. Interestingly, outside of Delaware, jurisdictions that have adopted a control share acquisition statute, and have therefore made hostile deals subject to a shareholder referendum,[97] have actually acknowledged and addressed the issue of conflicted voting through specific rules, which I come back to in Part III.[98]

All such potential conflicts are not peculiar to hostile acquisitions but appear in all similar "final period" situations. They can in fact be exacerbated in negotiated deals whereby acquirer and target management—in its aim to be "employed" by the former as future controlling shareholder or to otherwise get other favors[99]—might collude by agreeing to a subpar premium for the shareholders and have the merger approved thanks to their con-

96. See supra Section II.C and infra Section III.C.2.b.

97. See supra note 32 and accompanying text.

98. See infra notes 111–115 and accompanying text.

99. The Chancery Court in Paramount Communications, Inc. v. Time, Inc. noted:

> There may be at work [in a friendly deal] a force more subtle than a desire to maintain a title or office in order to assure continued salary or prerequisites. Many people commit a huge portion of their lives to a single large-scale business organization. They derive their identity in part from that organization and feel that they contribute to the identity of the firm. The mission of the firm is not seen by those involved with it as wholly economic, nor the continued existence of its distinctive identity as a matter of indifference.

Paramount Commc'ns, Inc. v. Time, Inc., Nos. 10866, 10670, 10935, 1989 WL 79880, at *7 (Del. Ch. July 14,1989), aff'd, 571 A.2d 1140 (Del. 1989).

flicted votes.[100] While in a hostile deal the position of target management and bidder is adversarial (and therefore, depending on whether the bid on the table is value maximizing or not, only one of the two sides can be in actual conflict with its fellow shareholders),[101] in a friendly deal, whenever the merger consideration is not value maximizing, both target management and the acquirer will be conflicted.[102] Moreover, in a friendly deal, if the merger requires a shareholders vote at the acquiring company as well,[103] conflicts of interests may also influence that vote.[104] In Part III, I

---

100. For an account of the many conflicts that may arise in friendly deals, see John C. Coates, IV, Mergers, Acquisitions and Restructuring: Types, Regulation, and Patterns of Practice 11 (European Corp. Governance Inst., Law Working Paper No. 260/2014), http://ssrn.com/abstract_id=2463251 (mentioning, among other things, that "[f]iduciaries may favor one bidder over another, not in return for an explicit quid pro quo (e.g., in the form of a payment) but to curry good will in the hope of obtaining post-deal employment, or perhaps out of malice towards a bidder or gratitude for some past favor."). Coates adds that "[f]iduciaries may seek to sell their company 'too early' or 'too cheaply' to trigger 'golden parachutes' or vesting under option plans or retirement plans, or in return for benefits from the buyer." Id.; see also STEPHEN M. BAINBRIDGE, MERGERS AND ACQUISITIONS 58–59 (3d ed. 2012):

> Although the tension between shareholders and managers is perhaps most obvious in hostile takeovers, . . . similar conflicts of interest arise in negotiated acquisitions . . . . To purchase the board's cooperation the bidder may offer side payments to management, such as an equity stake in the surviving entity, employment or non-competition contracts, substantial severance payments, continuation of existing fringe benefits or other compensation arrangements. Although it is undoubtedly rare for side payments to be so large as to materially affect the price the bidder would otherwise be able to pay target shareholders, side payments may affect management's decision making by causing them to agree to an acquisition price lower than that which could be obtained from hard bargaining or open bidding.

Id. (footnotes omitted).

101. See supra note 95 and accompanying text.

102. For a discussion of how conflicts are ultimately circumstantial, see infra Section IV.A.2.

103. See supra note 29.

104. A case in point is the failed acquisition of King Pharmaceuticals by Mylan Pharmaceuticals, which was subject to shareholder approval of both companies. Ianthe Jeanne Dugan, Hedge Funds Draw Scrutiny Over Merger Play, WALL ST. J. (Jan. 11, 2006), http://www.wsj.com/articles/

SB113695140652343511. With its sizeable premium, the transaction would have benefited the hedge fund Perry Corp., owner of about 4.3 million King shares. Id. However, the market view of the deal was that Mylan was overpaying and vocal investors like Carl Icahn campaigned against the deal to hinder Mylan shareholder approval. Id. To ensure that the deal would not fall through, Perry accumulated 9.9% of Mylan shares to vote in favor of the merger. Id. But it did so, via a hedging transaction: while buying all the stock, a brokerage firm working for Perry was shorting the same amount of stock and Perry had a right to sell its shares back to the brokerage firm, which in turn had a right to call the stock back to Perry thus generating a wash (the end result of this strategy is what Hu and Black call "empty voting," that is, holding greater voting power than the underlying economic ownership). Id.; Henry T. C. Hu & Bernard Black, Equity and Debt Decoupling and Empty Voting II: Importance and Extensions, 156 U. PA. L. REV. 625, 626 (2008) [hereinafter Hu & Black, Equity and Debt Decoupling]. So the practical effect of this transaction was for Perry to obtain voting rights at Mylan, without bearing any economic interest or risk associated with a decrease in the price of such shares. See Dugan, supra. The ensuing lawsuit to challenge Perry's voting strategy was eventually dropped after the Mylan/King merger agreement was terminated—however, the SEC subsequently sanctioned Perry for failure to make disclosures under Section 13(d) of the Exchange Act and Rule 13d-1 thereunder. In the Matter of Perry Corp. Respondent, Exchange Act Release No. 60351 (July 21, 2009).

Another case to consider in this regard is the merger between Hewlett-Packard and Compaq, which was approved by the Hewlett-Packard shareholders with a mere 51.4% of the votes and with allegations of vote-buying by Hewlett-Packard: four days before the Hewlett-Packard shareholder meeting, Deutsche Bank submitted its proxy, voting its shares against the merger. Kahan & Rock, supra note 90, at 1229. On that same date, Hewlett-Packard closed a credit facility to which Deutsche Bank was added as a co-arranger. Id. Allegedly, on the morning of the shareholder meeting, at the demand of Hewlett-Packard management, a telephone conference was held between Deutsche Bank and Hewlett-Packard, after which the bank changed most of its votes in support of the proposed merger. In the ensuing litigation, during the motion to dismiss phase, the court emphasized that it will maintain its focus on the "possible deleterious effects of a challenged vote-buying agreement on shareholders[,]" especially whether a vote-buying agreement was "sufficient to change the result of a vote," and shareholders were "defrauded or disenfranchised." Hewlett v. Hewlett–Packard Co., No. CIV.A. 19513–NC, 2002 WL 549137, at *5 (Del. Ch. Apr. 8, 2002). The case was eventually dismissed on the merits for the plaintiff's failure to prove that management improperly enticed or coerced Deutsche Bank into voting in its favor. Hewlett v. Hewlett-Packard Co., No. CIV.A. 19513–NC, 2002 WL 818091 (Del. Ch. Apr. 30, 2002).

briefly mention some recent developments in Delaware case law that have in fact addressed conflicted voting in friendly deals.[105]

Given the importance of voting sincerity, which is regarded as a prerequisite to the effectiveness and efficiency of shareholder voting overall, leaving the issue unaddressed can, in the long run, generate market failures in how corporate control ultimately gets allocated in all those instances in which the acquisition outcome is decided through a shareholder vote that is tainted by a conflict.[106] Additionally, if shareholders' conflicts having a determinant impact on the outcome of a vote were left undetected, using shareholder approval as a proxy to reflect what is best for the company (irrespective of whether we want to frame the issue in profitability, efficiency, fairness, or any other terms) would simply cease to work because a tainted vote cannot clearly operate as a device to reflect an aggregation of preferences.[107] True, as Part III will show, in parent/subsidiary mergers, conflicts are well recognized and receive a detailed and multifaceted legal treatment. However, Part III will also indicate how shareholder conflicts in deals concerning companies with control contestable in the market have in fact largely lacked attention from policymakers and legal commentators.

III. POLICING SHAREHOLDER CONFLICTS IN ACQUISITIONS: THE LAW OF THE LAND, IF ANY

A. Introduction

Part III focuses on the tools available to the interpreter to tackle conflicted voting in acquisitions. While the main focus of this article lies in how conflicted votes can affect proxy fights in connection with hostile acquisitions, this Part also broadens the 105. See infra notes 122 –124 and accompanying text.

---

106. On the importance that corporate control is allocated efficiently, see, for example, Bebchuk, Sole Owner, supra note 60, at 198, noting that "secur[ing] the efficient outcome of acquisition attempts . . . would provide appropriate incentives to investment in . . . companies."

107. For the long-term effects of conflicted voting on shareholder value, see Anabtawi, supra note 74, at 575, noting a "diminution in shareholder value that results whenever the rent seeker succeeds in persuading the firm's managers to make a decision that is privately beneficial to the rent seeker but detrimental to the common interests of shareholders."

spectrum to assess, on the one hand, instances of shareholder conflicts in connection with acquisitions that are not necessarily hostile and, on the other hand, situations in which the judiciary has intervened (or calls for a judicial intervention or statutory reform have been made) to address situations tainted by a shareholder conflict, such as vote buying and empty voting. Section B shows how, in Delaware, no specific regime for hostile deals exists but mentions specific "disinterested shares" regimes in some related fields, especially in the context of control share acquisition statutes in other states. Section C tackles the main question starting with the few indications we can grasp from existing scholarship (C.1) and then tentatively surveys all the complex interpretative questions a judge would likely face (C.2).

A preliminary qualification is in order. This article does not purport to identify the correct interpretative solution to existing law in Delaware: the many variables and contours that can emerge in a specific case would make such a task very hard, possibly naïve, and ultimately not useful given the wide discretion entrusted in equity courts like the Delaware Chancery Court and the Delaware Supreme Court.[108] However, this article will still seek to shed light on certain critical areas of the positive law of corporate voting not only to help facilitate any future interpretational effort but also to elucidate the possible policy approaches a system can adopt.

B. Lack of a Specific Regime (But Some Regimes in Related Areas Deal with the Issue Somehow)

The DGCL does not address the issue of shareholder conflicts in general terms: similar to the rest of corporate law codes in America, there is no regime to sanction conflicted voting in shareholder resolutions.[109] Also, with the exception of a portion of its

---

108. See generally Edward B. Rock, Saints and Sinners: How Does Delaware Corporate Law Work?, 44 UCLA L. REV. 1009, 1016–17, 1101–02 (1997) (analyzing the inner mechanics of how Delaware cases are adjudicated). Rock states that "the process that leads to reasonably precise standards proceeds through the elaboration of the concepts of independence, good faith, and due care through richly detailed narratives of good and bad behavior, of positive and negative examples, that are not reducible to rules or algorithms." Id. at 1017.

109. Some jurisdictions around the world actually do provide for regimes to generally address conflicted voting: for example, the Italian corporate law system provides that any resolution adopted with the pivotal vote of a share-business combination statute,[110] Delaware statutory law does not provide for any ad hoc regime for conflicted voting in acquisitions. This does not mean that domestic corporate laws completely refrain from dealing with the issue.

On the one hand, specific regimes for certain type of acquisitions do tackle conflicted voting. As far as hostile deals are concerned, all states that have adopted control share acquisition statutes ("CSAS"), which essentially require unsolicited acquirers of significant stakes to obtain a prior authorization before crossing certain ownership thresholds, contemplate bright-line rules restricting voting by certain shareholders. Such authorizations must be passed by a majority (sometimes a supermajority) of disinterested shareholders.[111] In the absence of such authorization, shareholders crossing the applicable threshold cannot generally exercise the voting rights attached to their shares exceeding the applicable threshold.[112] All existing CSAS disqualify the acquirer from voting in such referendums.[113] Almost all the statutes also disqualify officers and employees,[114] and a few disqualify directors who are nei-holder carrying an interest (on his or her behalf, or as instructed by a third party) in conflict with the corporation's interest can be annulled if the resolution may potentially damage the corporation. See CODE CIVIL [C.c.] [CIVIL CODE], art. 2373 (It.).

---

110. Compare section 203(a) of the DGCL, which prohibits a public company from entering into certain business combinations with a stockholder owning 15% or more of the corporation's voting stock (or with any of its affiliates or associates) for a three-year period following the crossing of the 15% threshold, unless, among other exceptions, the business combination is "approved by the board of directors and authorized at an annual or special meeting of stockholders, and not by written consent, by the affirmative vote of at least 66 2/3% of the outstanding voting stock which is not owned by the interested stockholder." DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 203(a) (2007) (emphasis added).

111. For references to statutory provisions, see infra Chart, Appendix I.

112. Each state has its own peculiar remedies regime. See infra Appendix I. For instance, while Hawaii denies the voting rights of an acquirer for one year should the acquisition not be approved by a majority of disinterested shares, other states disallow an acquirer to vote in shareholder matters if the acquirer has more than 20 percent of the voting rights. Id. Wisconsin restricts the voting power of an acquirer which holds over 20 percent of the voting power to one-tenth of the acquirer's shares. Id.

113. See infra Appendix I.

114. The only jurisdictions that have adopted a CSAS not limiting votes by officers and employees are Hawaii, Nebraska, and Pennsylvania. HAW. REV.

ther officers nor employees.[115] I will refer to these bright-line rules as "disinterested shares" regimes.

Similarly, as noted earlier,[116] analogous disqualifying provisions are present in the context of freeze-out mergers, whereby subjecting on a voluntary basis the shareholder vote to a majority-of-the-minority condition would either: (i) generally switch the burden of proof on the entire fairness of the transaction back to the plaintiff;[117] or (ii) together with the additional safeguard of the approval by a fully empowered independent committee, switch the standard of review to the much more lenient business judgment review as laid out by the Delaware Supreme Court in the recent MFW case.[118]

On the other hand, under Delaware case law there can be restrictions for votes cast as a result of a vote-buying transaction; a relatively recent Delaware Supreme Court decision actually puts conflict of interests at the center of the analysis on the validity of vote-buying: while generally not illegal, vote-buying is not permitted when the economic interests and the voting interests of the shares do not remain aligned.[119] In that decision, the Delaware

---

STAT. § 414E-2 (2008); NEB. REV. STAT. § 21-2441 (2012); 15 PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. § 2562 (West 2012).

115. See ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 10-2725(B) (2013); IDAHO CODE § 30-1601(11) (2013); NEV. REV. STAT. ANN. § 78.3787 (LexisNexis 2010).

116. See supra Section II.C.1.

117. See supra notes 82–88 and accompanying text.

118. See supra note 89.

119. Crown EMAK Partners, LLC v. Kurz, 992 A.2d 377, 387–90 (Del. 2010). Vote-buying at one time was per se illegal. Joe Pavelich, Note, The Shareholder Judgment Rule: Delaware's Permissive Response to Corporate Vote-Buying, 31 IOWA J. CORP. L. 247, 248 (2005). Many courts adopted the principle that reciprocal obligations among shareholders required each to use their independent judgment in determining how to vote their shares: as a consequence, it was held that the receipt by a shareholder of some personal consideration in return for the exercise of his or her powers as a shareholder operated as a fraud on other shareholders or otherwise violated public policy. See id. at 251−55 In 1982, the Delaware Chancery Court altered this line of thought in Schreiber v. Carney by generally permitting vote-buying, subject to certain exceptions on a case-by-case basis: the court determined that vote-buying agreements are to be invalidated on an individual basis if the purpose of the act is to defraud or disenfranchise other stockholders or if the agreement is against public policy. 447 A.2d 17, 25 (Del. Ch. 1982); Pavelich, supra note 119, at 251. This approach did not dissipate the debate on vote-buying, specifically on how vote-

Supreme Court echoed the concerns of then Vice–Chancellor Steele that "a shareholder who divorces property interest from voting interest[ ] fails to serve the 'community of interest' among all shareholders, since the 'bought' shareholder votes may not reflect rational, economic self-interest arguably common to all shareholders."[120] In the closely related field of empty voting (that is, holding greater voting power than the underlying economic ownership), some of the literature has suggested that certain vote decoupling transactions be scrutinized through the misalignment lens and screened out if the underlying motives of the empty voter are in conflict with the interests of the other shareholders.[121]

Moreover, a recent line of cases in M&A litigation originated by the Delaware Supreme Court decision in Corwin v. KKR Financial Holdings LLC[122] has established that under Delaware buying might potentially disenfranchise shareholders. See Thompson & Edelman, supra note 29, at 153 (noting that a disconnect between voting rights and the economic interests of shares "compromises the ability of voting to perform its assigned role"). In Crown EMAK Partners, while on the one hand the Delaware Supreme Court conceded that vote-buying needs close judicial scrutiny when the votes bought will swing the vote in the buyer's favor, potentially disenfranchising other shareholders, on the other hand, it held that there was no improper vote-buying in the specific case because the economic interest and the voting interest remained aligned (more precisely, no improper vote buying was found in obtaining votes from another shareholder to remove certain directors, because even though the acquiring shareholder did not obtain title to the shares, both the voting and economic interests were transferred from one shareholder to another under a purchase agreement). Crown EMAK Partners, 992 A.2d at 390.

---

120. Crown Emak Partners, 992 A.2d at 388 (quoting IXC Commc'ns, Inc. S'holders Litig. v. Cincinnati Bell, No. C.A. 17324, 1999 WL 1009174, at *8 (Del. Ch. Oct. 27, 1999)).

121. For more detail, see infra note 155 and accompanying text.

122. 125 A.3d 304 (Del. 2015). In Chief Justice Strine's words:

> When the real parties in interest—the disinterested equity owners—can easily protect themselves at the ballot box by simply voting no, the utility of a litigation-intrusive standard of review promises more costs to stockholders in the form of litigation rents and inhibitions on risk-taking than it promises in terms of benefits to them.

Id. at 313. Subsequent pronouncements by Delaware courts have expanded the boundaries of the Corwin decision. Compare Singh v. Attenborough, 137 A.3d 151 (Del. 2016) (finding when the business judgment rule applies, the only instance in which directors might be liable for damages is under the waste doctrine), with In re Volcano Corp. S'holder Litig., 143 A.3d 727, 747 (Del. Ch.

law the fully informed, uncoerced vote of a majority of the disinterested stockholders of a corporation approving an M&A transaction that is not subject to entire fairness restores the presumption of the business judgment rule in lieu of any other enhanced type of scrutiny.[123] While the absence of a conflict of interest in the majority approving the transaction is a necessary element in order to qualify for an easy dismissal of the litigation under the benevolent business judgment rule, none of the decisions rendered by the Delaware judiciary thus far has analyzed how a scrutiny over whether shareholders are conflicted or not will work in practice;[124] in particular, it is not clear whether plaintiffs can actually prove that certain shareholders (say directors, managers, or the acquirer) voting in favor in the specific resolution are in fact conflicted and as a result their vote must be disregarded.

All in all, conflicted voting does receive some legal treatment for some types of acquisitions: it is disregarded under unsolicited deals in jurisdictions adopting a CSAS, and it is discouraged in both freeze-out transactions and, more recently, in friendly deals in which directors seek an early dismissal of litigation under the business judgment rule. In addition, Delaware law distinguishes vote-buying cases on the basis of conflict of interests: so long as there is such a conflict in the specific case, the vote-buying transaction is illegal and sanctioned, otherwise vote-buying is generally permissible.

However, for a large chunk of M&A transactions, conflicted voting receives no statutory treatment; absent a vote-buying arrangement or the aim to qualify for the Corwin safe harbor to 2016) (extending the ruling of Corwin to two-step mergers under Section 251(h) of the DGCL: the acceptance of a first-step tender offer by a majority fully informed, disinterested, uncoerced shareholders has the same cleansing effect of a fully informed, uncoerced vote by disinterested shareholders in connection with a merger). Note that the emphasis on the absence of conflicts by the voting majority for the resolution to be effective is not a novelty. See Lewis v. Vogelstein, 699 A.2d 327, 335 (Del. Ch. 1997) (discussing ratification law in the context of director conflict transactions and mentioning that ratification may at times be "ineffectual . . . because a majority of those affirming the transaction had a conflicting interest with respect to it").

---

123. Corwin v. KKR, 125 A.3d at 308–11.

124. The presence of a conflict of interest of shareholders was not in dispute under any of the cases mentioned, see supra note 122.

have a deal scrutinized under the more lenient business judgment rule, there should be little expectation that the vote will be second guessed. Hence, there is a risk that deals can get approved or rejected not because the underlying decision is in the best interests of the corporation, but because of the votes cast by shareholders whose interest are in conflict with the corporation's. Traditionally, two main categories of transactions come to mind: (i) friendly deals for companies whose control is contestable in the market (which to be sure are now subject to the tenets of Corwin and its progeny); and (ii) hostile deals in which the target board refuses to redeem a poison pill and that escalate to a proxy fight to replace the sitting board and redeem the pill.[125]

This article mainly deals with the latter category. The reason for paying greater attention to hostile deals is that their analysis reveals more. Not only do bidders sit opposite to target shareholders at the acquisition table, but in hostile deals, bidders are also in an adversarial position with target management: hostile deals structurally come with two different layers of conflicts and thus provide a unique viewpoint to understand how shareholder conflicts inherently work (and, as I investigate in Part IV, how they can be impacted by bright-line rules, such as disinterested shares regimes, and by no-conflict standards). In the end, much of the analysis will nevertheless be useful to show how conflicts can appear in any type of deal, including negotiated ones where conflicts can in fact be exacerbated by the collusion of target management with its (presumably) new future boss, that is, the bidder.[126]

C. Elements for a Positive Law Analysis

The positive law question is pretty straightforward: absent vote-buying, in which a conflict is admittedly problematic, are shareholders completely free to cast their votes in M&A transactions even when they pursue interests that are not aligned with those of the corporation and of their fellow shareholders? In other words, can they vote given the risk that their "votes may not reflect rational, economic self-interest arguably common to all shareholders?"[127] The answer is not straightforward. The core tension is between the principle that shareholders can vote in whichever way they like (especially in the context of director elections)[128] and the idea that sincerity is a prerequisite for majority voting to work: if an electoral outcome is tainted by a pivotal vote of a shareholder pursuing his or her conflicting interest, shareholder voting would not reflect a genuine aggregation of preferences and the underlying result would lead to an inefficient outcome.

125. See supra Section II.A.2.
126. See supra notes 99–104 and accompanying text.

1. No Case Law, Very Little Scholarship

Not only is case law lacking, meaning no contested election that I am aware of resulted in a losing party legally challenging on grounds of an alleged conflict of interests the legitimacy of the votes cast by the winning proxy contender (whether insurgent or incumbent), but the issue has also drawn very little interest from scholars, none of whom, as far as I know, have expressly dealt with shareholder conflicts in the context of proxy fights to replace a target board and redeem a pill.

Further, the legal literature on shareholders conflicts in M&A deals is pretty limited. Among the few exceptions, there is a contribution by Lucian Bebchuk some thirty years ago: in advocating a policy to promote undistorted choice in corporate takeovers pursuant to which shareholders would hold a separate referendum on whether the offer should succeed,[129] Bebchuk warned that, 127. Crown Emak Partners LLC v. Kurz, 992 A.2d 377, 388 (Del. 2010); In re IXC Commc'ns, Inc. S'holders Litig. v. Cincinnati Bell, No. C.A. 17324, 1999 WL 1009174, at *8 (Del. Ch. Oct. 27, 1999); cf. supra notes 119 and 120 and accompanying text.

---

128. See, e.g., BAINBRIDGE, supra note 100, at 118 ("As a general matter, it remains the law that shareholders qua shareholders are allowed to act selfishly in deciding how to vote their shares."); Roberta S. Karmel, Should a Duty to the Corporation Be Imposed on Institutional Shareholders?, 60 BUS. LAW. 1, 13 (2004) ("[S]hareholders do not represent anyone but themselves and do not have any duties to either the corporation or other shareholders.").

129. Bebchuk proposed a referendum system whereby each shareholder would be allowed to tender either approvingly or disapprovingly; in case the latter tenders were more than the former, the acquisition would not be approved and would not take place. This way, pressure to tender would not play a role in takeovers because shareholders would not have to think in second-best terms for such a referendum to truly reflect the aggregate of each shareholder's preference on the bid, only disinterested votes should be counted, i.e., votes that are cast "solely by the effect that a takeover would have on the value of his shareholdings."[130] In fact, he acknowledges that some shareholders, including of course the bidder, can become interested whenever their preference is shaped by considerations other than the price on the table—the bidder's interest, for instance, would of course not be paying too much, which in some instances can lead to a subpar acquisition getting approved.[131]

More recently, Zohar Goshen addressed in general terms the issue of conflicted voting by shareholders, noting that while "the voting system is an acceptable mechanism for determining the group preference, it only functions as an indicator of transaction efficiency when every individual in the group 'votes sincerely.'"[132] Because it "distorts the voting mechanism by shifting the focus away from what is best for the group as a whole to what is best for each individual member[,]" conflicted voting "undermines the voting mechanism's ability to determine the group preference."[133] However, Goshen mostly focused on typical conflict situations, such as freeze-out mergers, dual-class recapitalizations, and interested directors.[134] He touched upon takeovers rather briefly without clarifying if his attention was on shareholder or director voting, but just admonished the complexity of a policy that would have to deal with a positional[135] conflict of interest where "it is hard to when considering whether or not to tender. Bebchuk, Undistorted Choice, supra note 59, at 1754–57.

---

130. Id. at 1760.

131. Id. at 1761 (characterizing target managers as a group of inevitably interested shareholders who, in order to maintain their private benefits of control in place, would resist acquisitions even when they are in the best interests of the other shareholders).

132. Goshen, Voting (Insincerely), supra note 61, at 818.

133. Id. at 828.

134. Id. at 828–30.

135. A positional conflict of interest occurs "when a director acts to preserve her own position in the company, while her self-serving action could be construed as promoting a different legitimate motive." Id. at 830.

ascertain which motive is the true one standing behind the action."[136]

Note incidentally that in the Seventh Circuit decision that ruled on the unconstitutionality of the Indiana control share acquisition statute,[137] a decision subsequently reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court in the famous CTS case,[138] Judge Posner criticized the disinterested shares referendum mechanism contemplated by the Indiana legislature,[139] although it is not clear on the face of his dicta whether it was the "disinterested shares" portion of the regime that Posner disliked or the referendum itself.

Aside from these contributions, there is nothing of particular relevance in the American literature. Even the formal literature on tender offers combined with a proxy fight, which includes economic models that aim at anticipating shareholders' strategies and pay-offs in such deals, does not address the possibility that some of the actors might be conflicted: those models stipulate that management and dissidents always cast their votes freely.[140]

To be sure, the situation does not improve significantly if one looks at shareholder conflicts that do not necessarily involve M&A cases.[141] Aside from considering those conflicts when ana-

---

136. Id. ("[W]hen resisting a takeover, directors could be guarding their own positions or protecting the corporation against exploitation or looting.").

137. IND. CODE §§ 23-1-42-1 to 23-1-42-11 (1986).

138. CTS Corp. v. Dynamics Corp. of Am., 481 U.S. 69 (1987).

139. Dynamics Corp. of Am. v. CTS Corp., 794 F.2d 250, 262–63 (7th Cir. 1986) ("[T]he Indiana statute . . . puts the acquirer at the tenderer mercies of the 'disinterested' shareholders . . . . The Indiana statute is a lethal dose. . . .").

140. See, e.g., Barry & Hatfield, supra note 33, at 646–55; Edelman & Thomas, supra note 37, at 465, 474; Lucian Bebchuk & Oliver Hart, Takeover Bids vs. Proxy Fights in Contests for Corporate Control 22–26 (European Corp. Governance Inst., Working Paper No. 04/2002, 2001), http://ssrn.com/abstract=290584. But see Gilson & Schwartz, supra note 10, at 792–99.

141. In fact, this should not surprise much if one considers the very few instances in which shareholders are called to vote under Delaware law. See, e.g., D. Gordon Smith, Matthew Wright & Marcus Kai Hintze, Private Ordering with Shareholder Bylaws, 80 FORDHAM L. REV. 125, 128, 186–88 (2011) (noting that under the current system, shareholders participate only on the margins and recommending changes to broaden shareholders' ability to participate in monitoring the corporation); Robert B. Thompson, Defining the Shareholder's Role, Defining A Role for State Law: Folk at 40, 33 DEL. J. CORP. L. 771, 778 (2008) ("Delaware's statute mandates that shareholders vote on only two sublyzing such issues as cleansing statutes for interested directors,[142] vote-buying,[143] and, more recently, empty voting,[144] the academic literature has remained silent on the very issue.

2. Some Key Questions

All in all, without any specifics from a case, it is extremely difficult to predict in a vacuum how a Delaware court would approach the issue, that is, under what circumstances an acquirer or, as the case may be, target management and directors can be considered conflicted and should be restricted from, or somehow limited in, voting their shares in a proxy fight in connection with a hostile deal. As mentioned earlier, the issue is essentially unexplored. Therefore, rather than seeking to predict an interpretative outcome, I address some of the core questions and conceptual hurdles a judge would likely have to face under current law.

---

jects: election of directors and fundamental corporate changes such as mergers.") (footnotes omitted); Paul H. Edelman, Randall S. Thomas, & Robert B. Thompson, Shareholder Voting in an Age of Intermediary Capitalism, 87 S. CAL. L. REV. 1359, 1365–69 (2014) (noting that under current law shareholders play a subordinate governance role and state corporate law reflects this by limiting the areas shareholders can vote to electing directors, sometimes amending the bylaws, and approving certain fundamental changes, but only after directors have consented to the action.); cf. Edelman & Thomas, supra note 37, at 458 (noting that, before the surge in hostile deals in the 1980s and with the exception of the wave of proxy fights in the 1950s and 1960s, "[h]istorically, shareholder voting rarely attracted much attention.").

142. See generally FRANKLIN A. GEVURTZ, CORPORATION LAW 361–66 (2000) (discussing whether Delaware requires that shareholders approving a transaction whereby one or more directors have a conflicting interest be disinterested or not); see also Claire Hill & Brett McDonnell, Sanitizing Interested Transactions, 36 DEL. J. CORP. L. 903, 910–14 (2011) (describing different ways by which interested transactions could survive a legal challenge as well as the procedure and scrutiny applicable to such transactions); Craig W. Palm & Mark A. Kearney, A Primer on the Basics of Directors' Duties in Delaware: The Rules of the Game (Part II), 42 VILL. L. REV. 1043, 1098–1106 (1997) (detailing the level of judicial scrutiny given to interested transactions and how the burden on interested directors can be reduced or shifted to the party challenging he transaction).

143. See supra notes 119 and 120 and accompanying text.

144. See infra note 155 and accompanying text.

a. On What Basis Could Judges Limit the Freedom to Cast Votes?

Absent any express statutory provisions, on what grounds could Delaware judges intervene, either at a preliminary injunction phase or subsequently, to prevent or invalidate resolutions passed because of votes cast by shareholders that are in conflict? Delaware judges are not a priori reluctant to intervene on a voting outcome if not doing so would lead to an inequitable setting for the franchise: an indication in this direction can be drawn by judicial decisions on situations where the shareholder franchise is endangered, including vote-buying cases.[145] Judges have done so since the foundational Schnell v. Chris-Craft[146] to the more recent Hewlett-Packard[147] via Blasius,[148] which still is the leading case

145. See supra notes 119 and 120 and accompanying text.

146. Schnell v. Chris-Craft Industries, Inc., 285 A.2d 437 (Del. 1971) (invalidating a director action, on its face permitted by the DGCL, which anticipated the date of the annual meeting and moved its location in order to dampen turnout and fend-off an insurgent campaign). The Delaware Supreme Court stressed that "inequitable action does not become permissible simply because it is legally possible." Id. at 439. Effectively, Schnell treated tampering with the voting process by incumbents as inequitable and presumably a violation of fiduciary duties. See generally Leo E. Strine, Jr., If Corporate Action Is Lawful, Presumably There Are Circumstances in Which It Is Equitable To Take That Action: The Implicit Corollary to the Rule of Schnell v. Chris-Craft, 60 BUS. LAW. 877, 881 (2005) (noting that "the Delaware Supreme Court emphatically rejected the proposition that compliance with the DGCL was all that was required of directors to satisfy their obligations to the corporation and its stockholders"). However, the Delaware judiciary has, over the years, interpreted the boundaries of the Schnell heightened review quite narrowly. For a critical analysis, see Oesterle & Palmiter, supra note 42, at 494–95.

147. Hewlett v. Hewlett-Packard Co., No. CIV.A. 19513–NC, 2002 WL 549137 (Del. Ch. Apr. 8, 2002). The Delaware Chancery Court stated:

> Shareholders are free to do whatever they want with their votes, including selling them to the highest bidder. Management, on the other hand, may not use corporate assets to buy votes in a hotly contested proxy contest about an extraordinary transaction that would significantly transform the corporation, unless it can be demonstrated, as it was in Schreiber, that management's vote-buying activity does not have a deleterious effect on the corporate franchise.

Id. at *4 (emphasis added) (footnotes omitted).

148. Blasius Indus., Inc. v. Atlas Corp., 564 A.2d 651, 661 (Del. Ch. 1988) (stating if the board acts "for the primary purpose of impeding the exercise of for protecting shareholder voting power in connection with acquisitions.

Now, there is one conceptual issue that judges would need to overcome in legal challenges to director elections that run parallel to a hostile deal: unlike in Schnell and in the Blasius lines of cases in which judges have resorted to fiduciary duties to sanction any directorial attempt to hamper the franchise,[149] there can be circumstances in which fiduciary duties would probably not seem viable, at least prima facie. Consider cases in which the allegedly conflicted voter is the bidder:[150] by definition, someone who is not (yet) a controlling shareholder, let alone a director or an officer, is, according to the leading view, not subject to fiduciary duties towards other shareholders.[151] In such cases, the judiciary would have to find, within its array of equitable powers, some devices to provide protection to shareholders.

This, however, should not pose an insurmountable task. On the one hand, there are sufficient indications under case law that fiduciary duties are not the only devices a judge can adopt to constrain the actions of corporate players for purposes of shareholder protection. Consider, for instance, that judges have been policing stockholder voting power . . . the board bears the heavy burden of demonstrating a compelling justification for such action"). But see Allen, Jacobs & Strine, supra note 38, at 884–90 for a reductionist read of Blasius on grounds that the Unocal/Unitrin standards are sufficient to protect the franchise.

---

149. Cf. MM Cos., Inc. v. Liquid Audio, Inc., 813 A.2d 1118, 1127 (Del. 2003). MM Companies seems to suggest that in the eyes of the court that judicial protection of the franchise only runs one-way, which is to punish attempts perpetrated by management: "This Court and the Court of Chancery have remained assiduous in carefully reviewing any board actions designed to interfere with or impede the effective exercise of corporate democracy by shareholders, especially in an election of directors." Id. (footnote omitted).

150. Compare, for example, the hypotheticals laid out in Sections IV.B.1 and IV.B.4.a.

151. See, e.g., Weinstein Enters., Inc. v. Orloff, 870 A.2d 499, 507–08 (Del. 2005) (noting that while non-controlling shareholders may vote as they please, controlling shareholders are subjected to fiduciary duties). But see Iman Anabtawi & Lynn Stout, Fiduciary Duties for Activist Shareholders, 60 STAN. L. REV. 1255, 1269–72 (2008) (criticizing conventional shareholder fiduciary duties that are only applied to a shareholder with stable control and proposing an extension to minority shareholders who carry swing votes in specific resolutions).

vote-buying via disenfranchisement and public policy theories, not fiduciary duties.[152] On the other hand, judges have enough equity powers to extend fiduciary duties in certain circumstances.[153] This is something scholars have proposed to address challenges coming from abuses in shareholder activism and empty voting: to contain potential abuses by activist investors, Iman Anabtawi and Lynn Stout have suggested extending fiduciary duties to any shareholder whenever he or she can influence the outcome of a particular decision because of a personal conflict of interest;[154] similarly, accord-

152. See Schreiber v. Carney, 447 A.2d 17, 24 (Del. Ch. 1982) ("[V]ote-buying is illegal per se if its object or purpose is to defraud or disenfranchise the other stockholders."). Because the agreement in Schreiber benefited the public shareholders, the court decided there was no fraud or disenfranchisement. Id. at 25–26. See also Hewlett v. Hewlett-Packard Co., Civ. A. No. 19513-NC, 2002 WL 818091, at *15 (Del. Ch. Apr. 30, 2002) (failing to find vote buying where management convinced an institutional shareholder to vote for a proposed merger on a promise of future business.); Weinberger v. Bankston, Civ. A. No. 6336, 1987 WL 20182, at *2–4 (Del. Ch. Nov. 19, 1987) (failing to find impermissible vote buying where an out of court settlement to calm an insurgent where the corporation agreed to pay the insurgent's proxy expenses in exchange for the insurgent granting an irrevocable proxy to management because the purpose was to benefit the public shareholders); Kass v. E. Airlines, Inc., Civ. A. Nos. 8700, 8701, 8711, 1986 WL 13008, at *4 (Del. Ch. Nov. 14, 1986) (finding that an agreement to vote was not contrary to public policy where an agreement was made to an entire class and was fully disclosed); cf. Flaa v. Montano, Civ. A. No. 9146-VCG, 2014 WL 2212019, at *8–9 (Del. Ch. May 29, 2014) (discussing vote buying but not deciding if the agreement disenfranchised other shareholders, thereby making it impermissible. Instead, the court sidestepped the question and struck down the agreement for failing to make proper disclosure on proxy materials).

153. One might also wonder to what extent the equity powers of the judiciary are (or should be) ultimately constrained by the boundaries of a fiduciary relationship. In other words, why should fiduciary duty theories represent the only options to protect stakeholders? Otherwise, if such theories are all we have to fight corporate abuses, in situations like conflicted voting in acquisitions fiduciary duties would show their inadequacy as a protective device: indeed, it does not take a controlling position (whether de jure or de facto) for a shareholder to harm other shareholders. See Anabtawi & Stout, supra note151, at 1269–72.

154. See id. at 1295–96; see also Anabtawi, supra note 74, at 593–97; Andrea Zanoni, Hedge Funds' Empty Voting in Mergers and Acquisitions: A Fiduciary Duties Perspective 3–4 (2009), http://ssrn.com/abstract=1285589 (arguing that M&A deals approved through empty voting devices should carry ing to Hu and Black, existing equitable powers entrusted to courts could be used to tackle the most egregious empty voting practices, such as voting with negative economic ownership, that is, when the decoupling of voting and economic rights is done in a way that creates economic incentives for voting against the interests of other shareholders:[155] "even without a legislative amendment, one can imagine courts using their equitable powers to disallow voting by shareholders with negative economic ownership."[156]

All in all, whilst not straightforward conceptually, the scope of equity powers of the Delaware judiciary appears to be wide enough to contain, one way or another, conflicted voting in acquisitions.[157] the approval by a majority of disinterested shareholders and be subject to fiduciary duty review).

---

155. Hu & Black, Equity and Debt Decoupling, supra note 104, at 703. More specifically, negative economic ownership occurs whenever a shareholder creates a net short position (i) through equity derivatives, (ii) by "soft parking" (where one party holds shares that are fully hedged but agrees to vote those shares according to instructions received from another party with a negative economic interest in the company), or (iii) by acquiring shares before the record date and subsequently selling them after the record date but before the shareholder meeting. See id. at 637–38. In all such cases, economic ownership goes in "the opposite direction from the return on shares." Id. at 637. To be sure, disallowing votes by empty voters is not the only solution proposed address the issue. Some authors call for an outright ban on the practice. See Shaun Martin & Frank Partnoy, Encumbered Shares, 2005 U. ILL. L. REV. 775, 787–804 (2005). Some others call for "enhanced disclosure." See Henry T. C. Hu & Bernard Black, The New Vote Buying: Empty Voting and Hidden (Morphable) Ownership, 79 S. CAL. L. REV. 811, 819 (2006) [hereinafter Hu & Black, New Vote Buying]; Kahan & Rock, supra note 90, at 1277–78.

156. Hu & Black, Equity and Debt Decoupling, supra note 104, at 703.

157. The formal distinction that the shareholders vote on a director election and not on the outcome of the acquisition should not be overstated. True, one might in theory argue that the conflict really relates to the actual redemption or non-redemption of the pill and not the director election in itself. However, this overly formalistic approach would short-circuit the Unitrin line of cases that does not engage in any substantive review of the director refusal to redeem a pill so long as (and precisely because) the ballot box route remains "realistically attainable." Indeed, if judges refuse to look not only at the lack of redemption by the board but also at how the ballot box route works (especially when it is in no position to work properly as a result of a conflict), we would be left with no effective legal safeguards against corporate actors trying to exploit the system. See Unitrin, Inc. v. Am. Gen. Corp., 651 A.2d 1361, 1381, 1388–89 (Del. 1995)

b. What Are We Talking about When We Talk about Interests?

To understand what one means with expressions such as conflict of interests and misalignment of interests, it is crucial to have a clear sense of what interests are being put at risk by the conflicted shareholder. Generally, Delaware courts refer somewhat loosely to the concept of the "interests of the corporation and its stockholders" as the primary goals directors need to pursue and protect,[158] and mainstream law and economics literature in the cor-

---

(holding that the board's refusal to redeem a poison pill is not preclusive under Unocal unless a proxy fight is "mathematically impossible or realistically unattainable"); see also Versata Enters., Inc. v. Selectica, Inc., 5 A.3d 586, 601–04 (Del. 2010) (noting that although a combination of defensive measures makes it more difficult for an acquirer to obtain control of a board, it does not make such measures "realistically unattainable" because there is still the availability of a shareholder vote); Air Prods. & Chems., Inc. v. Airgas, Inc., 16 A.3d 48, 111–13 (Del. Ch. 2011) (holding that a poison pill with a 15% trigger, a staggered board, continued protection of Delaware's anti-takeover statute, and supermajority merger approval provisions was permitted under Unocal because a successful proxy contest was still "realistically attainable").

158. In the seminal case of Revlon, Inc. v. MacAndrews & Forbes Holdings, Inc., 506 A.2d 173, 181–82 (Del. 1986), the Delaware Supreme Court established an enhanced standard of conduct that compels directors to maximize value for the benefit of shareholders in the sale of the company above the protection of interests of other stakeholders, including maintaining the independence of the corporate entity. Specifically, under Revlon the role of directors was transformed "from defenders of the corporate bastion to auctioneers charged with getting the best price for the stockholders at a sale of the company." Id. at 182. Revlon duties are triggered in certain limited circumstances (e.g., if a company is put on sale [either in a stock or in an asset deal] or if a break-up is inevitable). Id. In the words of Justice Moore, "[a]lthough such considerations [those of other constituencies] may be permissible, there are fundamental limitations upon that prerogative. A board may have regard for various constituencies in discharging its responsibilities, provided there are rationally related benefits accruing to the stockholders." Id. (citation omitted); cf. Ivanhoe Partners v. Newmont Mining Corp., 535 A.2d 1334, 1345 (Del. 1987) ("[The board of directors duty of loyalty] embodies not only an affirmative duty to protect the interests of the corporation, but also an obligation to refrain from conduct which would injure the corporation and its stockholders or deprive them of profit or advantage."); In re Fort Howard Corp. S'holders Litig., CIV.A. No. 9991, 1988 WL 83147, at *14 (Del. Ch. Aug. 8, 1988) (noting that courts must review the board's adherence to its fiduciary duties with an eye toward promoting shareholder interests, the court then turned to the scope of these duties and stated that porate field embrace the shareholder primacy norm,[159] even though some scholars disagree.[160] Delaware courts themselves, in the Unocal line of hostile takeover cases (but outside of Revlon),[161] took the view that directors may pursue interests of corporate constituencies other than shareholders when resisting an unsolicited deal.[162]

"the validity of the agreement itself cannot be made to turn upon how accurately the board did foresee the future").

159. Shareholder primacy dictates that corporate management's decision making should focus on the advancement of shareholder interests, even if those interests are in conflict with the interests of non-shareholder constituencies and represents an idea of corporate governance which allows for significant shareholder influence. D. Gordon Smith, The Shareholder Primacy Norm, 23 J. CORP. L. 277, 282 (1998). Compare Bernard Black & Reinier Kraakman, A Self-Enforcing Model of Corporate Law, 109 HARV. L. REV. 1911, 1913, 1921 (1996) (arguing that the principal goal of corporations should be to provide governance rules that maximize value for investors), with Stephen M. Bainbridge, In Defense of the Shareholder Wealth Maximization Norm: A Reply to Professor Green, 50 WASH. & LEE L. REV. 1423, 1423–25 (1993) (arguing that corporations should be committed to the shareholder wealth maximization norm).

160. See Margaret M. Blair & Lynn A. Stout, A Team Production Theory of Corporate Law, 85 VA. L. REV. 247, 253 (1999) (observing that boards should not only serve shareholders but also the enterprise-specific investments such as managers, rank and file employees, creditors, and the local communities); see also Einer Elhauge, Sacrificing Corporate Profits in the Public Interest, 80 N.Y.U. L. REV. 733, 745 (2005) (stating that managers should have some "discretion to temper" their duty to make profits "to comply with social and moral norms").

161. Delaware law mandates that when a sale, break-up, or change of control of the company is imminent, the board of directors has a duty to maximize shareholder value. Paramount Commc'ns, Inc. v. QVC Network, Inc., 637 A.2d 34, 38–39, 48 (Del. 1994). The Court in Revlon states, "concern for non-stockholder interests is inappropriate when an auction among active bidders is in progress, and the object no longer is to protect or maintain the corporate enterprise but to sell it to the highest bidder." Revlon, 506 A.2d at 182

162. See Unitrin, Inc. v. Am. Gen. Corp., 651 A.2d 1361, 1369 (Del. 1995) (accepting that the effect on constituencies other than shareholders is an acceptable factor in considering defensive measures); Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946, 955 (Del. 1985) (stating that while reviewing the reasonableness of a target's defensive measures against a hostile bidder, the courts may consider such concerns as the "inadequacy of the price offered, nature and timing of the offer, questions of illegality, the impact on 'constituencies' other than shareholders (i.e., creditors, customers, employees, and perhaps even the community generally)"). But see Roberta Romano, The States as a Laboratory:

Of course, one thing is what (and whose) corporate interests directors must pursue and protect and another thing is how the common interests of shareholders might limit one or more shareholders' free exercise of the right to vote. The two issues are and must be kept distinct. Because only the second one is relevant for the purposes of this article, and because it is safe to assume that in the context of shareholders resolutions shareholders cannot be expected to pursue interests other than theirs, I will not consider interests of other constituencies.[163]

Legal Innovation and State Competition for Corporate Charters, 23 YALE J. ON REG. 209, 235 (2006) (arguing that other stakeholders' interests can never trump those of the shareholders: "Delaware . . . has rejected the broad discretion accorded directors under other constituency statutes, by requiring any consideration of non-shareholder interests to provide a benefit to the shareholders, and by rejecting the propriety of such considerations in a takeover auction."). See generally Amir N. Licht, The Maximands of Corporate Governance: A Theory of Values and Cognitive Style, 29 DEL. J. CORP. L. 649, 702 (2004) (discussing constituency statutes and noting that more than half of all states have statutes that permit directors and officers to consider the interests of other constituencies); Eric W. Orts, Beyond Shareholders: Interpreting Corporate Constituency Statutes, 61 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 14, 26 (1992) (observing that some states have statutes allowing directors of public corporations to consider other interests and constituencies when making decisions.); Barzuza, supra note 37, at 1989, stating:

> Thirty-five states have adopted directors' duties statutes, also known as "other constituency" statutes. Typically, these statutes allow directors to take into account the interests of constituencies other than shareholders and/or the long-term value of the firm. Sometimes, in addition, they apply weaker fiduciary duties on managers' use of defensive tactics.

Id.

163. I do not consider the interests of other constituencies: neither for current purposes nor where I address normative aspects of conflicted voting infra in Part IV. Note incidentally that it is quite common in the takeover literature to consider only the interests of shareholders. See, e.g., Luca Enriques, Ronald J. Gilson & Alessio M. Pacces, The Case for an Unbiased Takeover Law (with an Application to the European Union), 4 HARV. BUS. L. REV. 85, 91 (2014):

> [T]akeovers are merely one way in which corporations respond to changes in economic conditions . . . . [T]he scope and the features of the safety net protecting individuals and communities against the effects of economic and regulatory change are only relevant to the takeover debate if takeover regulation is the best (or the only) protection tool available.

Now, even if focusing just on shareholder interests, the interpreter would still have to deal with complex conceptual issues: Are the interests of the corporation and those of its shareholders distinct or the same?[164] If they are the same, do they coincide with the maximization of shareholder value? But if they are distinct, can they be in conflict with each other? How do we interpret when we relate such interests to the interests of the conflicted shareholder? But most importantly, shareholders' interests qua shareholders are not necessarily homogeneous: different investment strategies and different investment horizon can hardly be reconciled into one all-encompassing interest that suits the entirety of the shareholder population.[165] In particular, the takeover arena intensifies the heterogeneity of shareholder interests because of the evident opportunity to cash in the takeover premium, whether or not such a premium truly reflects the potential value of the target. Such a short-term opportunity is the basis for investment strategies carried out by merger arbitrageurs who, after the announcement of a transaction, proceed to buy a huge portion of the shares of the target betting on the fact that the deal will eventually close so they will be able to tender the shares and profit from the difference between the tender offer price and the price they paid on the market right after the deal was announced. In such a scenario, holding out in the hope of capturing an even higher price resulting from the long term value of the target is too volatile and makes no sense for such type of investors.[166] Unsurprisingly, merger arbitrageurs normally constitute a significant chunk of the shareholder base once a transac-

---

> Because we have not seen that position carefully presented in the takeover debate, our discussion of takeover regulation in the following does not further consider it.

Id. (footnote omitted.)

164. Cf. Martin Gelter & Geneviève Helleringer, Lift Not the Painted Veil! To Whom Are Directors' Duties Really Owed?, 2015 U. ILL. L. REV. 1069, 1098–99 (2015).

165. See, e.g., Edelman & Thomas, supra note 37, at 463 ("Different shareholders may hold different views about . . . how to cast their votes on different issues.").

166. As the Delaware Chancery Court put it in the Airgas case, short-term arbitrageurs are "happy to tender their shares at [the offer] price regardless of the potential long-term value of the company." Air Prods. & Chems., Inc. v. Airgas, Inc., 16 A.3d 48, 111 (Del. Ch. 2011).

tion is announced[167]—a judge would face the tough job of factoring in the arbitrageurs' interests and reconciling them with the interests of those who pursue a long-term investment proposition.

c. Do Specific Regimes in Similar Areas Have Any Bearing?

Specific regimes to police conflicted voting already exist. On the one hand, in deals subject to entire fairness, majority-of-the-minority clauses can either help defendants shift the burden of proof on entire fairness back to the plaintiff (in the Weinberger and Kahn v. Lynch line of cases)[168] or make the whole transaction subject to the more lenient business judgment review if other precon-

---

167. A notable case can be traced in the Airgas transaction. Following the announcement of the takeover by Air Products, arbitrageurs and other event-driven investors started to purchase significant stakes in the target stock that ultimately allowed them to own approximately 46% of the company. Id. at 118. Such dramatic change in the shareholder base had an impact in the actions undertaken by management and was an important factor in the ultimate decision:

> Airgas's board members testified that the concepts of coercion, threat, and the decision whether or not to redeem the pill were nonetheless "implicit" in the board's discussions due to their knowledge that a large percentage of Airgas's stock is held by merger arbitrageurs who have short-term interests and would be willing to tender into an inadequate offer.

Id. at 105; see also Mark J. Roe, Corporate Short-Termism—In the Boardroom and in the Courtroom, 68 BUS. LAW. 977, 990 (2013) (detailing then-Chancellor Chandler's analysis regarding the role of short-termism and deal arbitrageurs in Airgas). Note incidentally that the decision by the Airgas board to resist the Air Products offer (which the Chancery Court permitted) eventually proved to be a correct one from a long-term value perspective, according to Martin Lipton who states:

> [I]n vindication of the Airgas board's judgment and confirmation of the wisdom of the Delaware case law (particularly the Delaware Chancery Court's 2011 Airgas opinion validating the use of the poison pill), Airgas agreed to be sold to Air Liquide at a price of $143 per share, in cash, nearly 2.4x Air Products' original $60 offer and more than double the final $70 offer, in each case before considering the more than $9 per share of dividends received by Airgas shareholders in the intervening years.

Martin Lipton, The Long Term Value of the Poison Pill, HARV. L. SCH. F. ON GOVERNANCE & FIN. REG. (Dec. 18, 2015), https://corpgov.law.harvard.edu/2015/12/18/the-long-term-value-of-the-poison-pill/#more-72224.

168. See supra notes 82–88 and accompanying text.

ditions to the MFW safe harbor are met.[169] Similarly, an informed, uncoerced vote by disinterested shareholders is a precondition to apply the business judgment rule under the Corwin line of cases.[170] On the other hand, CSAS have all implemented rules requiring approval from a majority of disinterested shares, excluding from the count the votes of bidders, officers, and employees (and sometimes outside directors).[171] Delaware itself has implemented a "disinterested shares" regime in the context of its business combination statute.[172]

Make no mistake: these regimes are not likely to be applied by mere extension anytime soon. For starters, the most relevant regime for our purposes, disinterested shares in the context of a CSAS, is clearly not applicable in Delaware: it is the law in other states. Moreover, Delaware judges are generally reluctant in M&A cases to extend statutory regimes to promote substance-over-form justice. In fact, in several instances, including cases with plaintiffs challenging transactions on the basis of de facto mergers theories (in the context of asset deals structured as to avoid appraisal rights),[173] cases in which plaintiffs allege de facto liquidation theories (in the context of cash-out mergers whereby preferred stock is retired at a price below the liquidating preference)[174] or de facto amendments to the charter (in the context of mergers denying a class vote to the preferred stockholders),[175]

169. See supra note 84.

170. See supra notes 122–25 and accompanying text.

171. See supra notes 111–15 and accompanying text.

172. See supra note 110; infra text accompanying note 197.

173. See generally Hariton v. Arco Elecs., Inc., 188 A.2d 123, 125 (Del. 1963) (noting that although an asset sale has achieved the same result as a merger, the asset sale rules have equal dignity under the DGCL as the merger rules and the former should apply).

174. See generally Rothschild Int'l Corp. v. Liggett Grp., Inc., 474 A.2d 133, 1236–37 (Del. 1984) (explaining that the right to be paid the liquidating preference is triggered only in the event specified under the preferred stock terms and a merger does not constitute a liquidation).

175. Warner Commc'ns, Inc. v. Chris-Craft Indus., Inc., 583 A.2d 962, 970 (Del. Ch. 1989) (explaining that because under independent legal significance, "satisfaction of the requirements of Section 251 is all that is required legally to effectuate a merger[,] . . . the language of Section 242(b)(2)" of the DGCL alone, which in the specific case was paralleled by the charter of the corporation, "does not entitle the holders of a class of preferred stock to a class judges have embraced the exact opposite doctrine of independent legal significance, according to which "action taken under one section of the [DGCL] is legally independent, and its validity is not dependent upon, nor to be tested by the requirements of other unrelated sections under which the same final result might be attained by different means."[176] According to independent legal significance, which a Delaware court once labeled as a "bedrock doctrine" in the state,[177] each statutory acquisition method has equal dignity and a court cannot "gainsay the legislative decisions to provide different acquisition forms carrying different levels of shareholder protection."[178] Similarly, the tortured evolution of freeze-out law also shows that Delaware courts for quite some time had used a formalistic approach that applied different standards of review to going private transactions depending on how a freeze-out is structured: before the CNX and MFW decisions introduced a unified standard,[179] a negotiated merger between a controlling stockholder and its subsidiary was reviewed for entire fairness,[180] while under In re Siliconix Inc. Shareholders Litigation,[181] a parent/subsidiary unilateral tender offer followed by a short-form vote in a merger, even if . . . the interests of the class will be adversely affected by the merger").

---

176. Orzeck v. Englehart, 195 A.2d 375, 378 (Del. 1963).

177. Warner, 583 A.2d at 970.

178. BAINBRIDGE, supra note 100, at 112; see also Strine, supra note 146, at 879 n.10 ("The courts have long respected th[e] ability to choose among the various methods for accomplishing a business transaction through judicial recognition of the doctrine of independent legal significance."). But see D. Gordon Smith, Independent Legal Significance, Good Faith, and the Interpretation of Venture Capital Contracts, 40 WILLAMETTE L. REV. 825 (2004) (criticizing the doctrine).

179. See Kahn v. M & F Worldwide Corp., 88 A.3d 635, 645–54 (Del. 2014) (explaining that the business judgment standard of review applies if the controlling stockholder subjects the merger to the necessary approval of: (i) a special committee of independent directors with separate financial and legal advisors, fully empowered to reject the transaction and negotiating a fair price with due care and (ii) a majority of the unaffiliated stockholders, fully informed and not coerced); In re CNX Gas Corp. S'holders Litig., 4 A.3d 397, 400 (Del. Ch. 2010).

180. Kahn v. Lynch Commc'n Sys., Inc., 638 A.2d 1110, 1115 (Del. 1994).

181. In re Siliconix Inc. S'holder Litig., No. CIV.A. 18700, 2001 WL 716787 (Del. Ch. June 19, 2001).

merger was reviewed under a standard less demanding than entire fairness.

Still, even without formally applying any disinterested shares or majority of the minority regime by extension, such regimes contain indicators of the perils raised by conflicted voting and offer a judge, especially when using his or her equity powers, some substantive support to justify an intervention on the basis of a conflict. Moreover, aside from such regimes, the principles stemming from the Corwin line of cases,[182] from case law on vote buying (most notably, Crown Emak Partners),[183] as well as indications from the empty voting literature, could make a judge eager to use some of their implications in a challenge to alleged conflicted votes in the context of a takeover deal. In the context of conflicted voting, this has in fact already occurred for challenges to freeze-out transactions: in the CNX case, a pivotal shareholder had stock ownership in both the bidder-parent and the target-subsidiary and Vice-Chancellor Laster, quoting a passage from the vote buying decision Crown Emak Partners on the importance of economic incentives when casting votes, questioned the effectiveness of the majority-of-the-minority clause.[184] Similarly, in the context of the

182. See supra notes 122–25 and accompanying text.

183. Cf. supra notes 119– 20 and accompanying text.

184. As Vice-Chancellor Laster stated:

> [T]he plaintiffs have raised sufficient questions about the role of T. Rowe Price to undercut the effectiveness of the majority-of-the-minority tender condition. Economic incentives matter, particularly for the effectiveness of a legitimizing mechanism like a majority-of-the-minority tender condition or a stockholder vote. See Crown EMAK Partners, LLC v. Kurz, 992 A.2d 377, 388 (Del.2010) ("[W]hat legitimizes the stockholder vote as a decision-making mechanism is the premise that stockholders with economic ownership are expressing their collective view as to whether a particular course of action serves the corporate goal of stockholder wealth maximization.") (citation and internal quotation omitted). In Pure Resources, the holders of shares subject to put agreements were excluded from the majority-of-the-minority calculation because "it is clear that the Put Agreements can create materially different incentives for the holders than if they were simply holders of Pure common stock." 808 A.2d at 426. . . . T. Rowe Price's has materially different incentives than a holder

Zale merger litigation, the Chancery Court discussed, yet based on facts dismissed, whether a shareholder, which stood to earn an additional $3.2 million in prepayment fees on a loan they had previously made to the target Zale, was conflicted in casting its 23.3% stake (amounting to approximately $225 million in value at the merger consideration) in favor of the merger.[185]

IV. ASSESSING POLICY APPROACHES AND THEIR POSSIBLE OBJECTIONS

While Part III suggests that current law is all but easy to grasp, in this Part IV, I analyze some policy initiatives to address conflicted voting. In Section IV.A, I lay out three approaches: a rule-based, a standard-based, and an unengaged approach. In Section IV.B, I compare each such approach by testing it with hypotheticals of acquisition attempts. I then describe the assumptions under which one approach can be expected to fare better than the others (Section IV.B.5). In Section IV.C, I evaluate such assumptions and formulate policy remarks while taking into account some potential objections to reform.

A. Possible Policy Approaches

In this Section IV.A, I analyze three approaches that can be conceived to address conflicted voting in the context of hostile > of CNX Gas common stock, thereby calling into question the effectiveness of the majority-of-the-minority condition. . . . This case is not about "holdings in competitor corporations" or "directional sector bets." It is about a direct economic conflict that at best renders T. Rowe Price indifferent to the allocation of value between [the parent] CONSOL and [the subsidiary] CNX Gas and at worst gives T. Rowe Price reason to favor CONSOL.

---

In re CNX Gas Corp. S'holders Litig., 4 A.3d 397, 400, 416−17 (Del. Ch. 2010).

185. In re Zale Corporation Stockholders Litigation, C.A. No. 9388-VCP, 2015 WL 5853693 (Del. Ch. Oct. 1, 2015). The alleged conflict was based on the fact that the merger triggered the $3.2 million payment, which the Court ultimately did not consider material because it only amounted to less than 1.5% of the payment the shareholder was expecting from its consideration under the merger. Id. at *9 (noting that under Delaware law "there are cases in which a plaintiff's allegations of a large stockholder's need for liquidity have been sufficient to defeat a motion to dismiss").

acquisitions: first, a rule-based reform, similar to the disinterested shares regimes applicable in the context of control share acquisition statutes consisting of bright-line rules that, because of the abstract risk of a conflict, ex ante specifically disqualify certain shareholders—say the bidder and target directors and management—by requiring that the resolution be approved by a majority of disinterested shares (IV.A.1); second, a standard-based reform that would seek to invalidate ex post all votes that are actually cast in conflict and that are pivotal for the outcome of the election—I label this approach the "no-conflict standard" (IV.A.2); [186] third, an unengaged approach, in which the system, expressly or by inertia, whether deliberate or not,[187] does not intervene in any way—I label this as "unengaged approach" (IV.A.3). In Section IV.A.4, I mention briefly how each of these approaches fit, or would fit, within Delaware law.

1. Bright-Line Rules: Approval by a Majority of "Disinterested Shares"

A familiar bright-line rule approach to address shareholder conflicts consists of requiring the relevant resolution to be approved by a majority of disinterested shares. Such a rule would explicitly exclude from the count votes by certain categories of shareholders who are presumptively considered conflicted: the bidder, or directors and managers of the target (hereinafter target incumbents), or both categories.[188] This represents an ex ante ap-

---

186. Note that these first two approaches are not too different from those suggested by Zohar Goshen in his works on conflicts of interest, see supra notes 61 and 74 and accompanying text, which analyze solutions based on the well-known property versus liability distinction. See generally Guido Calabresi & A. Douglas Melamed, Property Rules, Liability Rules, and Inalienability: One View of the Cathedral, 85 HARV. L. REV. 1089 (1972). Similar to his methodology is the ex ante versus ex post lens that obviously also comes with a rule versus standard analysis. See infra note 189. However, instead of relying on the more remedy-focused property/liability dichotomy, I prefer to frame the policy discussion in terms of trade-offs between certainty and under-inclusiveness, which is typical of a rules/standards comparison.

187. That could occur deliberately or as a consequence of insufficient enforcement of general standards, because the judiciary may be reluctant to second-guess the resolution, especially in less than clear-cut situations.

188. For more detail, see infra Section IV.B.1.a.

proach that has the advantage of clarity and thus of limiting litigation costs and uncertainty.[189] However, like any other rule-based approach, it would come with two main problems. First, it would likely be over- or under-inclusive depending on the circumstances:[190] sometimes a shareholder that is not conflicted may be prevented from voting (e.g., a bidder wishing to vote in favor of a value-increasing transaction or target incumbents wishing to vote against a value-decreasing transaction), and, other times, a conflicted shareholder may cast its vote (e.g., any person who is not picked by the rule but is an ally of one of the excluded catego-

189. See, e.g., Louis Kaplow, Rules Versus Standards: An Economic Analysis, 42 DUKE L.J. 557, 562–63 (1992) ("Rules are more costly to promulgate than standards because rules involve advance determinations of the law's content, whereas standards are more costly for legal advisors to predict or enforcement authorities to apply because they require later determinations of the law's content."); see also Avery Wiener Katz, The Economics of Form and Substance in Contract Interpretation, 104 COLUM. L. REV. 496, 515 (2004) ("[R]ules and procedures are more formalistic, and thus provide more certainty and protection at lower cost, than those that would be applied by generalist courts . . . ."); Duncan Kennedy, Form and Substance in Private Law Adjudication, 89 HARV. L. REV. 1685, 1690 (1976) ("[A] regime of general rules should reduce to a minimum the occasions of judicial lawmaking."); Prasad Krishnamurthy, Rules, Standards, and Complexity in Capital Regulation, 43 J. LEGAL STUD. S273, S276 (2014) ("The presence of aggregate risks, regulatory uncertainty, and agency costs each imply the superiority of rules over standards . . . ."). For a recent account that uses a rules versus standards taxonomy for framing a general corporate law reform, see Ronald J. Gilson, A Model Company Act and a Model Company Court 6-11 (Stan. L. Sch., Working Paper No. 489, 2016), http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2750256.

190. On over- and under-inclusiveness of rules, see generally Isaac Ehrlich & Richard A. Posner, An Economic Analysis of Rulemaking, 3 J. LEGAL STUD. 257, 268 (1974); Frederick Schauer*, Rules and the Rule of Law,* 14 HARV. J.L. & PUB. POL'Y 645, 647–51 (1991); see also Gilson, supra note189, at 7 ("A single rule applying to all companies regardless of industry or circumstances will lack context and flexibility. Nor is there an easy way to make the ex ante rule more context-related. Precisely because drafters cannot predict a company's future circumstances, rough categorization . . . is about the best that can be done ex ante."). But see Kaplow, supra note189, at 565 (noting that "the suggestion is misleading because typically it implicitly compares a complex standard and a relatively simple rule, whereas both rules and standards can in fact be quite simple or highly detailed in their operation.").

ries).[191] Second, this rule-based approach would create the potential for circumvention—smart lawyers would quickly grasp the rule and know how to avoid it, which would, of course, exacerbate the risk of under-inclusiveness.[192]

Such rules might also generate disincentives to blockholding: if shares owned by the bidder and/or target directors and management were never to be counted in the outcome of a vote to determine the fate of a heated battle for corporate control, accumulating significant levels of ownership in a target company would matter less than it does currently—at the very least, the contending

---

191. To be effective, a rule-based regime has to avoid easy evasion: it must have some ability to capture votes cast by shareholders who are not formally disqualified yet act on behalf of a disqualified one. One well-known way to extend the reach of a prohibition that would otherwise apply solely to one person is to use expansive definitional tools; for example, the group definition under the Williams Act, see Rule 13(d)-3 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, § 16(b) (codified at 15 U.S.C. § 78p(b) (2012) [hereinafter the Securities Exchange Act], or the acting in concert concept under the EU Directive on Takeover Bids, see Article 1(d) Directive 2004/25/EC, of the European Parliament and of the Council of 21 April 2004 on Takeover Bids, 2004 O.J. (L 142) 19:

> '[P]ersons acting in concert' shall mean natural or legal persons who cooperate with the offeror or the offeree company on the basis of an agreement, either express or tacit, either oral or written, aimed either at acquiring control of the offeree company or at frustrating the successful outcome of a bid . . . .

Id. For a description of how, in the current market environment, the group definition under the Securities Exchange Act has become incapable of aggregating purchases by hedge funds acting via wolf packs, see John C. Coffee Jr. & Darius Palia, The Wolf at the Door: The Impact of Hedge Fund Activism on Corporate Governance 28–39 (Colum. L. and Econ., Working Paper No. 521, 2015), http://ssrn.com/abstract=2656325, which suggests that companies might consider adopting a poison pill that "could broadly define its coverage so as to apply to any persons 'acting in concert' or 'in conscious parallelism' with the leader of the 'wolf pack'"; such a pill would require "defin[ing] 'group' for purpose of the poison pill much more broadly than the case law under the Williams Act." Id. at 97.

192. Cf. Luca Enriques, The Mandatory Bid Rule in the Takeover Directive: Harmonization Without Foundation?, 1 EUR. CO. & FIN. L. REV. 440, 445–46, 452 (2004) (noting how, in order to avoid onerous bright-line rules, like the mandatory bid rule in the European Union, corporate lawyers are often prompted to figure out alternative acquisition structures that do not fall squarely under the legal command).

parties would presumably not make extra purchases of stock right before a record date if such stock were not to be counted for voting purposes.[193]

As noted earlier, bright-line rules to contain conflicted voting in connections with acquisitions already exist in the corporate laws of several states.[194] The most salient cases are in the context of CSAS, which require a shareholder vote to authorize a tender offer or an acquirer to cross certain thresholds of stock ownership and therefore to obtain control of a corporation.[195] All existing statutes disqualify the acquirer from voting in such referendum, almost all the statutes also disqualify officers and employees who are directors of the target corporation and some disqualify outside directors as well.[196] Even Delaware, which of course has never enacted a control share acquisition statute, is no stranger to similar disqualifying rules in its anti-takeover statute: if we look at the exemptions under Section 203 of the DGCL, the three-year moratorium for entering into a business combination with an interested stockholder does not apply if, among other things, such combination is authorized by "at least 66 2/3% of the outstanding voting stock which is not owned by the interested stockholder" (emphasis added).[197]

2. No-Conflict Standard

A no-conflict standard is an ex post command in which "efforts to give content to the law are undertaken . . . after individuals

193. However, holding a significant stake would still matter for purposes other than casting the vote: for instance, having a significant stake would be relevant for purposes of (i) both the bidder and the target directors and managers, tendering to the winning bidder and making a substantial return; (ii) the bidder, reaching the minimum thresholds for the tender offer to be effective; and (iii) the target directors and managers, to accumulate a large enough level of shares for holdout purposes.

194. See supra notes 111–15 and accompanying text.

195. See Bebchuk, supra note 32, at 985 (labeling such shareholder vote "a referendum on the offer"). For a description of such statutes, see generally GILSON & BLACK, supra note 33, at 1333–58.

196. See supra notes 111–15 and accompanying text.

197. DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 8, § 203(a)(3) (2007).

act."[198] Consider a standard that would (i) generally prohibit any shareholder to cast a vote if, given all the circumstances, his or her vote happens to be in conflict with the common interests of the other shareholders and (ii) provide for sanctions if such conflicted vote is pivotal for determining the outcome of the resolution. In this example, the actual legal command can only be formulated ex post after a judge considers all the specifics of the resolution. In other words, the standard nature of the command stems from the open-endedness of the factual and legal determinations of when, in the specific case, a vote by a shareholder is in actual conflict with the other shareholders' interests: the details of the conflict can only be analyzed after the vote is cast and in light of several circumstances, such as whether or not the pivotal vote by the given shareholder was directed toward pursuing the common interests of shareholders, which also requires determination in light of all the circumstances. For example, a standard in the context of a resolution deciding the outcome of an acquisition can (be either formulated or interpreted to) reflect that, if the offer is in the best interests of the shareholders (imagine an offer of $100 per share when the expected value of the target under current management is in the $70 to $80 range), potentially conflicted shareholders such as directors and managers voting against the acquisition (i.e., voting to maintain the board and the pill in place) will be in actual conflict, but other potentially conflicted shareholders such as a bidder voting in favor will not. Conversely, if the offer is not beneficial (imagine an offer of $60 per share when the expected value of the target under current management is in the $70 to $80 range), a bidder voting in favor of the acquisition (i.e., voting to replace the board and redeem the pill) will be in actual conflict, while directors and managers voting against will not.[199]

Standards have the advantage that only the prohibited, conflicted conduct will be detected and sanctioned, with no problems stemming from over- or under-deterrence. That however assumes that standards are well enforced and adjudicated. In other words,

---

198. Kaplow, supra note189, at 560*; see* also Gilson, supra note 189, at 7 ("[E]x post review of the terms of a particular . . . transaction by reference to a standard has the obvious advantage of being contextual.") (footnote omitted).

199. This of course assumes conflicts need to be analyzed under a shareholder wealth maximization norm. S*ee supra* Section III.C.2.b.

standards get it right . . . but only when they get it right. The approach has two main drawbacks: on the one hand, uncertainty and the ensuing costs of obtaining legal advice, especially when the standard is a complex one,[200] because who may or may not vote is not specified ex ante, and, on the other hand, possibly insufficient or misguided enforcement because the judiciary may be reluctant to second-guess the resolution, especially in less than clear-cut situations, and because judicial error is easier when courts' discretion is wide.[201]

As mentioned earlier, based on today's Delaware case law, absent any statutory hint, precise adjudication would be quite difficult (and extremely difficult to predict). The hardest issue would be establishing when a shareholder is actually in conflict with the other shareholders. In that regard, policymakers and/or judges would have several issues to clarify: (i) whether shareholders are required to pursue any specific corporate interest when voting (put differently, whether there are limits to their freedom to cast their vote in director elections); (ii) what level of misalignment is necessary to trigger a response from the judiciary (after all, shareholders pursue different investment strategies); (iii) whether there is anything peculiar in director elections aimed at removing a takeover defense to help an acquisition go through;[202] (iv) on remedies, if an injunction is not granted, whether the resolution is voidable or damages are the only route. But of all these complexities, the big-200. Kaplow, supra note 189, at 566, 569.

---

201. See, e.g., Russell B. Korobkin, Behavioral Analysis and Legal Form: Rules vs. Standards Revisited, 79 OR. L. REV. 23, 38–39 (2000) ("[B]ecause of unsystematic imperfection or rational concern with the cost of adjudication, adjudicators might fail to apply a standard precisely in particular cases. Consequently, standards can be over- or under inclusive as applied."); Gilson, supra note 189, at 8 ("[T]he standard cannot be more effective than the courts that enforce it and the underlying procedural rules through which enforcement takes place."); Troy A. Paredes, A Systems Approach to Corporate Governance Reform: Why Importing U.S. Corporate Law Isn't the Answer, 45 WM. & MARY L. REV. 1055, 1133 (2004) ("[B]right-line rules generally are more straightforward and clearer than standards and are therefore more predictable.").

202. In a vacuum, electing a given director instead of another can hardly be considered in conflict (the election per se is a preparatory event to future managerial decisions), so a judge would have to consider the election, the imminent pill redemption, and the underlying price offered in the acquisition as a unitary action. See supra note 157.

gest hurdle is probably the following:[203] to establish an actual misalignment of interests between the bidder or the target directors or managers, on the one hand, and the best interests of all their fellow shareholders, on the other hand, a judge would ultimately need to perform a valuation exercise to ascertain whether the inherent value of the target company is higher or lower than the price of the bid on the table.[204]

All in all, who is and who is not conflicted depends on the specifics of the case, which in turn calls for establishing the underlying value of the target company; case law and scholarship on appraisal rights remind us that ascribing a precise value to a company is far from being an easy task: some would in fact consider it impossible, if not even pointless,[205] and a recent trend of the Chan-

---

203. In this suggested policy approach, going through a valuation exercise represents the most sensible way to ascertain when a shareholder is in conflict with the others' interests: first, it is in line with commonly accepted shareholder primacy principles, see supra note 159; second, although admittedly not easy, it is the only quantitatively verifiable way to make a no-conflict standard work (absent an independent value reference, it is not clear how a judge can ascribe a conflict of interest to a shareholder).

204. In other words, if the inherent per share value of the company is lower than the bid price, managers voting to perpetuate the current board would be conflicted (whereas a bidder trying to unseat them would not). If vice-versa, the inherent value were higher than the bid price, a bidder would be in conflict when trying to replace the board and get rid of the pill; in such a case, the incumbents vote to maintain the board in power would be aligned to the other shareholders' best interests.

205. Indeed, some of the most skeptical views on the judicial valuation exercises come from Delaware judges. Here are Vice-Chancellor Strine's views on the task, as he put it in Andaloro v. PFPC Worldwide, Inc.,:

> The real world nitty-gritty use of [corporate finance] principles brings to the fore problems of measurement and theory that academics, and frankly, even real world business people, have no rational reason to solve because they seek to use [such] principles to reach a reliable approximation of a range of values from which rational investment decisions can be made. The process of appraisal calling for the court to derive a single best estimate of value based on the "expert input" of finance professionals paid to achieve diametrically opposite objectives tends, regrettably, to surface minor, granular issues of this kind, which are not well addressed in the academic literature. The trial record in this case has more than its share of these minute disputes and the literature cited to me has done cery Court has been to solely rely on the actual merger price under certain circumstances.[206] I address this and a few additional objections to a non-conflict standard in Section IV.C.

3. Unengaged Approach

Finally, given the complexity of the issue and the potentially unsatisfying solutions discussed above, a jurisdiction might simply decide to not intervene. This can happen explicitly, by clarifying that no limits are posed to a shareholder right to vote in replacing directors or, more likely, by simply not enforcing a plausibly dormant no-conflict standard—for example, judges may be uncomfortable to enter the unchartered territory of second-> little to convince me that there are clear-cut answers to most of them.

No. CIV.A. 20336, 2005 WL 2045640, at *2 (Del. Ch. Aug. 19, 2005); see also Chancellor Chandler's view in Cede & Co. v. Technicolor, Inc.:

> Experience in the adversarial, battle of the experts' appraisal process under Delaware law teaches one lesson very clearly: valuation decisions are impossible to make with anything approaching complete confidence. Valuing an entity is a difficult intellectual exercise, especially when business and financial experts are able to organize data in support of wildly divergent valuations for the same entity. For a judge who is not an expert in corporate finance, one can do little more than try to detect gross distortions in the experts' opinions. This effort should, therefore, not be understood, as a matter of intellectual honesty, as resulting in the fair value of a corporation on a given date. The value of a corporation is not a point on a line, but a range of reasonable values, and the judge's task is to assign one particular value within this range as the most reasonable value in light of all of the relevant evidence and based on considerations of fairness.

No. Civ.A. 7129, 2003 WL 23700218, at *2 (Del. Ch. Dec. 31, 2003).

206. See Jason M. Halper, Fair Price and Process in Delaware Appraisals, HARV. L. SCH. F. ON GOVERNANCE & FIN. REG. (Nov. 6, 2015), http://corpgov.law.harvard.edu/2015/11/06/fair-price-and-process-in-delaware-appraisals/ (commenting on Merion Capital LP v. BMC Software, Inc., No. 8900-VCG, 2015 WL 6164771 (Del. Ch. Oct. 21, 2015) and mentioning that the case is one of many decisions by the Chancery Court in 2015 "finding that merger price (following an arm's length, thorough and informed sales process) represented the most reliable indicator of fair value in the context of an appraisal proceeding.").

guessing an election and/or entertaining a valuation exercise, especially in less than clear-cut situations. This unengaged approach has the advantage of leaving unaltered the current understanding of the legal landscape by M&A players and therefore of not creating additional lawsuits in the already litigation-clogged takeover field—but the advantages end here. In fact, the risk of an unengaged approach is that a lack of protections for non-conflicted shareholders might lead, depending on the circumstances, to inefficient acquisitions or to the unfair demise of efficient ones.

4. Fitting the Three Approaches within Existing Delaware Law

Given the lack of ad hoc statutory provisions, even in the absence of actual case law on conflicted voting in proxy fights to repeal poison pills, it is safe to guess that today's Delaware law is positioned somewhere in between the second approach of a no-conflict standard (potentially looming but yet to apply to a specific case) and the third, an unengaged approach.

B. Testing the Approaches

I now test each of the three approaches with some hypothetical scenarios. First, I address some scenarios in which the misalignment of interests is sharp: a clearly bad acquisition and a clearly good acquisition, each adopted with the pivotal vote of a conflicted party (the bidder and the incumbents, respectively). I then assess less apparent cases, therefore not as "easy" for an adjudicator to rule on, which I label somewhat bad acquisitions and somewhat good acquisitions.

By bad acquisition, I mean an acquisition whereby the offer price is lower than the per-share price of the target if it stayed independent.[207] As Lucian Bebchuk illustrated, rejecting such an 207. See Bebchuk, Undistorted Choice, supra note 59, at 1701 ("When the shareholders judge the offered acquisition price to be lower than the independent target's value . . . then the acquisition offer should be rejected; in such a case, efficiency would likely be served by having the target remain independent.").

---

I am well aware of some influential views in the literature according to which, for purposes of assessing the efficiency of an acquisition, one should not look solely at the value of the target, but at the value of both bidder and target post-acquisition: if they are worth more combined rather than separate, the acquisition is efficient, regardless of the fact that sometimes some acquisition gains are redistributive in nature as they come at the expense of target shareholders. The underlying intuition is that shareholders hold or at least can hold diversified portfolios and do not care losing some pennies from one position (their stake in the target) if they can make more pennies with the other position (their stake in the bidder). See generally Frank H. Easterbrook & Daniel R. Fischel, Auctions and Sunk Costs in Tender Offers, 35 STAN. L. REV. 1, 7–9 (1982) (stating that because shareholders can diversify their securities portfolios, they are expected to own both bidder and target stock: as a result, shareholders should prefer a policy that maximizes the combined gains, with no regard as to how those gains are being shared between bidder and target). But see Lucian Arye Bebchuk, The Case for Facilitating Competing Tender Offers: A Reply and Extension, 35 STAN. L. REV. 23, 29–30 (1982), noting that (i) "many shareholders do not own portfolios, or at least not portfolios sufficiently diversified for the argument to hold" and (ii):

> Shareholders who hold only the shares of a company that is more likely to be a target than an acquirer do value an increase in expected takeover premiums. That these shareholders could have diversified and that their view would then have changed is of little relevance when one considers which rule is desirable from their perspective.

Id.; John C. Coffee Jr., Regulating the Market for Corporate Control: A Critical Assessment of the Tender Offer's Role in Corporate Governance, 84 COLUM. L. REV. 1145, 1217–21 (1984) [hereinafter Coffee, Regulating the Market] (noting that Easterbrook and Fischel's argument proves too much, as they "come dangerously close to claiming that directors cannot pursue a gain whenever its realization would also impose greater costs on society . . . . Their rule means that a potential gain should be foregone when it would come simply from [the bidder's] shareholders.").

Even though the diversification argument has some bite, I prefer testing the desirability of an acquisition just by looking at the target value. From a positive law angle, there are no indications that current Delaware law would protect anything other than the best interests of the target: the Unocal line of cases steers away from considering the bidder's interest or the interest of greater society generally. While this reasoning might be doctrinal, it in fact represents a sensible way to approach the issue from a system-coherence standpoint, if only we consider that, through the proxy fight safety valve, it is solely the target shareholders who get a say on the ultimate outcome of the deal. Therefore, the desirability of the deal will have to be looked at from the perspective of the group who gets to vote. Otherwise, we would have an inconsistent system that, on the one hand, empowers directors to resist takeovers in the name of the best interests of the corporation (whatever that means—but clearly not the interests of the bidder or of efficiency generally) and, on the other hand, gives shareholders a say where their counterpart's influence could swing the outcome in their favor if conflicted votes remained undetected. More importantly, even from a wider normative perspective, the value of the target alone represents the optimal acquisition is a desirable outcome from an allocational-efficiency standpoint because a lower-valuing user would otherwise acquire the firm.[208] However, if a bidder is left free to vote, it could force an inefficient acquisition to go through if it has enough shares to cast a pivotal vote, replace the board, and redeem the poison pill. Conversely, by good acquisition, I mean an acquisition whereby the offer price is greater than the per share price of the target as an independent company. The desirable outcome of such a value-creating transaction is that it succeeds; any obstacle to it, such as a conflicted (and pivotal) vote by the target incumbents to maintain the pill in place would therefore be detrimental. In each of these scenarios, I will thus hypothesize that passing the resolution leads to an inefficient outcome, which would not have otherwise occurred but for the pivotal vote by a shareholder whose interest is contrary to the other shareholders' common interest (that is, the replacement of the board in the bad acquisition and the defeat of the insurgent slate in the good acquisition).

While this is hardly the first contribution in the M&A literature that analyzes the law and suggests exploring new policy avenues by looking at how the law can, to quote Professor Coffee, "encourage efficient transactions while chilling inefficient benchmark. First, as Bebchuk pointed out, there are few elements to believe that investors are in general sufficiently diversified for the opposite argument to hold: in some circumstances, there is just no way for them to diversify. Bebchuk, supra, at 29–30. Consider for instance when the acquirer is a private equity firm, a hedge fund or a closely held competitor—all plausible scenarios. Moreover, market participants take long positions on stocks they think are more likely to become subject to an acquisition: their expectation is to grab a large premium and their market activity is propaedeutic to capturing such premium; introducing the interests of the bidder and its shareholders into the equation, would penalize such expectations and propaedeutic activity. Further, the diversification argument might just prove too much: absent a workable proxy to establish if the offer is value-increasing or not, exploitative low ball offers could get a pass in the name of diversification even when the combined entity is worth less. See Coffee, Regulating the Market, supra, at 1218–19.

---

208. Bebchuk, Undistorted Choice, supra note 59, at 1765 ("While the acquisition of some companies might produce efficiency gains, there are many other companies whose assets are employed most efficiently under their existing, independent mode of operation.").

ones,"[209] nobody to my knowledge has applied this lens when analyzing conflicted voting by shareholders in hostile deals.

1. Clearly Bad Acquisition Going Through with the Pivotal Vote of the Bidder

Assume an $80 offer with a small premium (say 10–15%) that target management is resisting on the grounds that it significantly undervalues the target. Assume the market consensus is that the target will have a long term $110 to $130 trading range. Assume further that the bidder has accumulated a significant stake that would allow it to win a vote to replace the incumbent board of directors and redeem the poison pill, in which case the offer is expected to succeed. However, without counting the bidder shares, the incumbent board would not be unseated, the pill would not be redeemed, and the offer would not go through. Just to make an admittedly simplistic numerical example, the bidder wins 53% vs. 47% after voting 9.99%[210] of the shares; without such conflicted votes, incumbents would prevail 52.2% vs. 47.7%. In the former case, an inefficient deal goes through, while in the latter it does not.

In this hypothetical, the defeat of the offer is a socially desirable outcome, which would not be achieved if the bidder were left free to cast its conflicted votes to support a low premium acquisition. Below, I assess how each of the three approaches would address the issue.

a. Bright-Line Rules and Clearly Bad Acquisitions

What would happen if a regime expressly limited certain shareholders in casting their votes in the context of acquisitions, including of course in proxy contexts aimed at redeeming a poison

209. John C. Coffee Jr., Transfers of Control and the Quest for Efficiency: Can Delaware Law Encourage Efficient Transactions while Chilling Inefficient Ones?, 21 DEL. J. CORP. L. 359, 395 (1996) [hereinafter Coffee, Transfers of Control]; see also Lucian Arye Bebchuk, Efficient and Inefficient Sales of Corporate Control, 109 Q.J. ECON. 957 (1994; Bebchuk, Undistorted Choice, supra note 59, at 1701); Einer Elhauge, The Triggering Function of Sale of Control Doctrine, 59 U. CHI. L. REV. 1465 (1992).

210. See infra note 221 and accompanying text.

pill? Such rules could be shaped in different ways, which for sake of clarity I will just condense into three main types: (i) rules limiting[211] a bidder's right to vote its shares ("bidder-disqualifying rules"),[212] (ii) rules limiting the right to vote of the shares held by directors and managers of the target ("target-disqualifying rules"), and (iii) rules limiting voting rights in shares held by the bidder and in shares held by the target directors and managers ("balanced rules").[213]

Bidder-disqualifying rules would help fend off low-value offers that would otherwise go through with the pivotal vote of the bidder. In dealing with these types of acquisitions, target-disqualifying rules would instead be irrelevant unless the voting limitation itself would help the bidder win the vote in the first place, in which case they would actually represent bad policy.[214] If bright-line rules were balanced, both the votes of both bidder and target incumbents would be disregarded.

Whether such balanced rules could help in our hypothetical would depend on the actual ownership structure of the given target:[215] what happens after we also disregard the shares voted by target incumbents so that the remaining, disinterested shareholders ultimately make the decision? One would guess that, given the wide gap between the offer price and the potential value of the tar-

---

211. By limiting a shareholder's right to vote, I mean a system whereby such shareholder's vote is either not counted (because, for instance, the law calls for an approval by a majority of disinterested shares) or, if counted, the resolution may be subsequently voided.

212. Hawaii, Nebraska and Pennsylvania are examples of control share acquisition statutes where only an acquirer is disqualified from voting. See supra note 114.

213. In CSAS, that is the most common rule, but see the exceptions mentioned supra note 212.

214. Imagine a situation in which, if all shareholders voted, a low-ball offer would be rejected, but because only the votes of the target incumbents are disqualified, a bidder actually prevails with its inefficient acquisition.

215. Of course, M&A activity itself (including its planning and execution) is shaped by the uniqueness of each company's stock ownership; some scholars consider the actual ownership pattern of the company as one of the most important variables in the field. See generally John C. Coates IV, The Powerful and Pervasive Effects of Ownership on M&A (Harv. L & Econ., Discussion Paper No. 669, 2010), http://ssrn.com/abstract=1544500. See also Edelman & Thomas, supra note 37, at 464.

get, a majority of such shareholders should be able to identify that their value-maximizing course of action is a vote to confirm the incumbent board in office and therefore reject the acquisition.[216] However, there can be no assurance that this type of inefficient acquisition—passed because of the conflicted and pivotal vote of the bidder—would be screened out through balanced bright-line rules because there might be circumstances in which the (non-conflicted)[217] votes of the incumbents are necessary to determine the efficient outcome. To use the initial numerical example (a 53% vs. 47% vote in favor of bidder, which becomes a 52.22% vs. 47.8% vote in favor of target after disregarding the bidder's 10% stake), if the stake held by incumbents were greater than 2.22%, a bidder would manage to win even if its offer was not value maximizing. So the question thus turns to the determinants of a "correct" voting outcome by the disinterested shareholders, which is something that depends on the underlying ownership structure and on how easy it is for disinterested shareholders to understand what is the right course of action: all else being equal, the greater the pool of disinterested shareholders[218] and the wider the gap between the offer price and the value of the target as an independent company, the more likely that a disinterested shares regime consisting of balanced rules will result in the correct outcome.

In sum, a clearly bad acquisition would call for either bidder-disqualifying rules or balanced rules (assuming in this latter case that rejecting the offer does not depend on the votes by target incumbents) but never for target-disqualifying rules. However, because we are about to see that bidder-disqualifying rules would not work in the context of good acquisitions (for reasons that mirror why target-disqualifying rules do not work here) and because it is obviously not realistic to anticipate that only bad acquisitions will emerge,[219] we are left with balanced rules.

216. This largely depends on management's ability to convince enough shareholders that the offer undervalues the company. If management fails in delivering such message, the outcome of the deal will be an inefficient one, irrespective of the rules to contain conflicted voting: the remaining shareholders would just get the decision wrong, which is something no policy solution on conflicted voting, whether rule- or standard-based, can help fixing.

217. Because of the circumstantial nature of conflicts, see supra Section IV.A.2, the votes of the incumbents are not conflicted in the specific case because they seek to fend-off an acquisition that is not value-maximizing.

218. See infra note 234.

Note incidentally that a disinterested shares regime would contribute to level the playing field between bidders and target directors and management—something that is arguably not happening at the moment because bidders are constrained by poison pill thresholds (normally ranging from 10 to 20 percent), the 15 percent threshold contained in Section 203 of the DGCL,[220] and the 10 percent limit to toehold accumulation of Section 16(b) of the Securities and Exchange Act.[221]

---

219. See, e.g., Sandra Betton, B. Espen Eckbo & Karin S. Thorburn, Corporate Takeovers, in HANDBOOK OF CORPORATE FINANCE: EMPIRICAL CORPORATE FINANCE 291, 356–72 (B. Espen Eckbo ed., 2d ed. 2008) (finding that the combined returns of target and acquiring companies are positive on average); Michael Bradley, Anand Desai & E. Han Kim, Synergistic Gains from Corporate Acquisitions and Their Division Between the Stockholders of Target and Acquiring Firms, 21 J. FIN. ECON. 3, 39 (1988) (arguing that premiums paid in takeovers reflect real efficiency gains); see also Bernard S. Black, Bidder Overpayment in Takeovers, 41 STAN. L. REV. 597, 599–601 (1989) (confirming that generally target shareholders gain value from takeovers and noting that many takeovers lead to efficiency gains while exploring the reasons behind such gains). Cf. Afsharipour, supra note 29, 1027–34 (2012) (discussing the development of empirical literature in merger returns and noting the ongoing debate stemming from numerous studies on whether acquiring companies generally benefit from mergers); Ulrike Malmendier, Enrico Moretti & Florian Peters, Winning by Losing: Evidence on the Long-Run Effects of Mergers 1–2 (April 2012), http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1787409 (discussing the difficulties in measuring if a merger has led to value creation or destruction). But see Klaus Gugler, Dennis C. Mueller, Michael Weichselbaumer & B. Burcin Yurtoglu, Market Optimism and Merger Waves, 33 MANAGERIAL & DECISION ECON. 159 (2012) (providing evidence that the long-term effects of takeovers are negative on average).

220. See supra note 110.

221. Under Section 16(b) of the Securities Exchange Act any shareholder may sue to recover "short swing" profits for the corporation that are based, among other things, on a purchase and sale of the stock of a reporting company within a 6-month period. Securities Exchange Act of 1934, § 16(b) (codified at 15 U.S.C. § 78p(b) (2012)). For the view that 10% is generally a threshold large investors do not want to cross to avoid being subject to short-swing profits limitations, see Coffee & Palia, supra note 191, at 30, noting that the "typical activist will not cross the 10% threshold, probably because at that point it will become subject to Section 16(b) of the Securities Exchange Act, which may force

b. No-Conflict Standards and Clearly Bad Acquisitions

A no-conflict standard is more malleable in dealing with the peculiarities of the case, such as the economics of the deal (how the offer price compares with the expected value of the target as an independent entity that determines who is in conflict and who is not), and the actual ownership structure of the target (a standard that would only disallow votes if they are both conflicted and pivotal).

If well adjudicated, such an approach has the advantage that a judge can determine the legal command after the voting conduct has taken place and in light of all the circumstances:[222] in the hypothetical scenario of a clearly bad acquisition, a judge should detect the misalignment between the interest of the bidder to pay a low premium with its $80 offer and the interests of the other shareholders to reject the offer and capture the long-term value of the target (in the example, ranging from $110 to $130).

However, this is obviously based on important assumptions relating to adjudication. For starters, a judge is more likely to get to the right result if, as is stipulated in the hypothetical, the discrepancy between offer price and long-term value of the target as an independent company is significant: in other words, less clear-cut cases might be trickier. Second, adjudication costs have to be manageable: a standard would likely result in more litigation in the field, which might well mean more uncertainty; also, judges themselves might not be too eager to entertain valuation exercises to establish what would be the value of the target as an independent entity.[223] Third, standards work well in the presence of several cases generating decisions that over time get fine-tuned to an identifiable, easy to grasp command: confusion and uncertainty might otherwise ensue "when there are too few cases from which to triangulate the norm . . . ."[224] Available data on shareholder voting in it to surrender any 'short swing' profits to the corporation on shares acquired in excess of 10%."

222. See supra Section IV.A.2.

223. See supra note 205.

224. Rock, supra note 108, at 1063. Cf. also Roberta Romano, The Shareholder Suit: Litigation Without Foundation?, 7 J.L. ECON. & ORG. 55, 85 (1991) ("As few suits produce a legal rule (only two in this sample), this [public hostile acquisitions, which derives from a FactSet SharkRepellent database listing the universe of attempted hostile deals with a Delaware target from 2003 to July 2015,[225] suggests that, currently, there are probably not enough cases to establish a solid norm (but this would not necessarily be the case for voting in friendly deals).[226]

c. Unengaged Approach and Clearly Bad Acquisitions

The analysis so far suggests that adopting any of the two main approaches to a clearly bad acquisition that is about to succeed because of the conflicted vote of the bidder—a hypothetical that, because of the staggering difference between the offer price and the much higher long term value of the target on a stand-alone basis, one may well consider an "easy case"—raises several practical questions. In this type of acquisition, rules are over-inclusive when they prohibit target incumbents from voting and may well be under-inclusive if they do not extend the prohibition to somebody voting on behalf of the bidder, thus a standard looks somewhat hard to administer. The complexity of the policy choices could lead a jurisdiction to decide to not intervene after all. As mentioned earlier, such a decision can be either silent (i.e., prior to any litigation, a refusal to intervene), or express. In the latter case, it can be embedded in the legislation or, more realistically, stem from case law.[227]

However, an unengaged approach might turn out to be ill-fated when dealing with a clearly bad acquisition because an undetected conflicted vote would end up determining the success of a goods] explanation of lawsuit efficacy turns on the need for a large number of lawsuits in order to obtain a ruling.").

---

225. Fact Set, SHARKREPELLENT.NET (July 29, 2015) (on file with author).

226. In such a period there were a total of 60 attempted hostile takeovers targeting Delaware companies. While twenty-eight of these attempts went through the ballot box route, in that the bidder formally launched a proxy fight, only seven deals resulted in an actual vote: in all other cases the proxy fight was abandoned because either the bidder or the target determined to cease the fight before going to the vote count. Id. But see infra note 242 and accompanying text.

227. See supra Section IV.A.4.

suboptimal acquisition, which would go through even if it is not beneficial to other shareholders. In the long run, this could mean an undue presence of suboptimal acquisitions.

2. Clearly Good Acquisition Rejected with the Pivotal Vote of the Target Directors and Management

I now assume an opposite scenario: a $120 offer with a sizeable premium (say 25–35%) that target management resists by incorrectly alleging that it undervalues the company significantly. Assume here that the market consensus is that with current management the target will have a long term trading range not to exceed $100. Assume, further, that the level of ownership of target directors and managers is such that they are in a position to reject a vote to replace the incumbent board of directors: with the veto power of the pill unaffected, the offer is then expected to fail. Assume finally that without counting the vote from directors and managers of the target, the incumbent board would be unseated, the pill would be redeemed and the offer would go through. In this hypothetical, the success of the offer is a socially desirable outcome, which cannot be achieved because of the incumbents' voting to reject the acquisition.[228] Again, I assess below how each of the three approaches would address the departure from the socially desirable outcome. Unsurprisingly, the results mirror the remarks made for clearly bad acquisitions that go through with the pivotal vote of the bidder.

a. Bright-Line Rules and Clearly Good Acquisitions

I apply to this hypothetical the three types of voting prohibitions I analyzed earlier, namely bidder-disqualifying rules, target-disqualifying rules and balanced rules. Bidder-disqualifying rules either would not matter or have a negative impact, in that they may help the target directors and managers win the vote. Target-disqualifying rules would be beneficial here because they would preclude incumbents from determining the defeat of a good acquisition. Whether balanced rules would work in this hypothet-

228. See Thomas, supra note 13, at 526 ("Who controls the corporation is important both to its shareholders and to society because the value of its assets depends significantly on the skill with which they are managed.").

ical would again depend on the voting outcome after disregarding the votes from both the target directors and managers and from the bidder. Still, because in the market for corporate control there can be both good and bad acquisitions, unilateral approaches are too rigid and likely to over-deter (consider bidder-limiting rules in good acquisitions) or under-deter (consider target-limiting rules in bad acquisitions), balanced rules would be the only sensible option if the policymaker opted for a rule-based approach.

b. No-Conflict Standards and Clearly Good Acquisitions

Similar to clearly bad acquisitions, in the hypothetical scenario of a clearly good acquisition, a judge should not find it too hard to detect the misalignment between the interest of the directors and managers to fend-off a high premium offer ($120 versus $100 of long term value of the target if it stays independent) and the interests of the other shareholders to capture such value by replacing the incumbent directors with appointed new ones who would redeem the poison pill. Again, a standard would work well if it can rely on the same critical assumptions I laid out earlier in Section IV.B.1.b, namely that (i) the discrepancy between offer price and long-term value of the target as an independent company is sizeable and (ii) because of a potential increase of litigation in the field and therefore more uncertainty, the adjudication costs are manageable (including a judiciary not reluctant to second guess a resolution by entertaining a valuation exercise).

c. Unengaged Approach and Clearly Good Acquisitions

If a jurisdiction decided to pull away from tackling conflicted voting, an undetected conflicted vote would end up determining the defeat of an acquisition that would have been clearly beneficial to other shareholders. In the long run, this could stifle an efficient market for corporate control.

3. Preliminary Remarks

Thus far, a few insights can be drawn from the opposite hypotheticals I have described. First, as far as bright-line rules are concerned, they work only if balanced, that is, if they neutralize votes from both the bidder and the target's directors and managers:

without any proof that attempted hostile bids tend to systematically be only clearly bad or clearly good, it would be a mistake to inhibit voting from one side only.[229] However, even when balanced, rules carry the flaws of one-size-fits-all inflexibility (that is, over- and under-deterrence, depending on the specifics of the case), which also creates potential for circumvention as those whose votes are not counted will try to find ways to put shares in the hands of allies to whom the voting limitation is not directed.[230] Not to mention that, from a public choice angle, limiting the right of shareholders to vote can be considered a hard sell for policymakers: especially because the suggested rules would equally inhibit the voting prerogatives of both insurgents and incumbents, the legislative measure cannot be expected to receive support from either side (given that ex ante, each side is equally likely to win or lose because of the limitation). Finally, a rule-based approach assumes that unaffiliated shareholders are not only capable of understanding what they should vote for, but that they are also of a sample size that would lead to an outcome adequately reflecting the aggregation of the underlying preferences by shareholders.

Second, a no-conflict standard can be quite an effective response assuming good enforcement and low adjudication costs, which for "easy cases" like a clearly bad acquisition or a clearly good acquisition may well be negligible: this approach would have the advantage of getting it right without being over- or under-inclusive. But since there is no assurance that judges will hear only "easy cases" (quite the contrary actually), one needs to reassess the soundness of the approach after considering less clear-cut cases.

Third, the decision to not engage in regulating conflicted voting (either by the legislative or the judiciary branch) in cases with a wide discrepancy (in one direction or the other) between the offer price and the value of the target as an independent entity is unsound because it would encourage unfair voting practices and leave market failures potentially undetected. This could result in negative ripple effects in the long term, especially in a system that

---

229. That would represent a big advantage for the side who is not prohibited from voting, which may well from time to time exploit the remaining shareholders by forcing the outcome of the deal in its favor.

230. See supra note 191.

elevates shareholder voting to a safety valve for the overall functioning of the market for corporate control.[231]

In any event, the preliminary insight stemming from these hypotheticals, which I labeled as "easy cases," should be taken with a grain of salt. On the one hand, these cases are conceivably not too worrisome from a practical standpoint, especially clearly bad acquisitions, which might have been common in the era of two-tier tender offers of the 1970s and early 1980s, but not so much today because of all the regulatory and private law constraints bidders have become subject to over the years: consider the Williams Act and related SEC regulations, Section 203 of the DGCL and of course Unocal and its progeny, which made the poison pill possible.[232] On the other hand, unless the stake held by the conflicted shareholder is truly substantial, which, of course, depends on the very ownership structure of the target, it is less likely that a conflicted vote will be pivotal because the remaining shareholders can be expected to identify the correct voting strategy.

4. Less Clear-Cut Hypotheticals: Somewhat Bad Acquisitions and Somewhat Good Acquisitions

Moving from these relatively "easy cases," I now focus on other, not so clear-cut hypotheticals, such as what I call a somewhat bad acquisition and a somewhat good acquisition.

As to the former, I assume a $100 offer with a mid-size premium (say 15–20%) that target management is resisting on grounds that it undervalues the target and further assume the market consensus for long-term value is somewhere around $110 to $115. A vote by the bidder can again determine the outcome in its favor.[233] For a somewhat good acquisition, I assume a $120 offer with a 15–20% mid-size premium that target management is resisting because it allegedly undervalues the company. I assume here that the market consensus is that with current management the target will have a long term trading range not to exceed $110 to $115 and that, with their ownership level, directors and managers can reject a vote to replace the incumbent board and therefore can make the offer fail.

---

231. See supra note 37; see also Marilyn B. Cane, The Revised SEC Shareholder Proxy Proposal System: Attitudes, Results and Perspectives, 11 J. CORP. L. 57, 79 (1985) (discussing the role of shareholders in corporate governance, the centralized management system that authorizes board influence necessitates shareholder voting that acts as a "safety valve"); Thomas, supra note 13, at 526–32 (discussing the wide recognition by corporate law theorists of the importance of shareholder voting in change-of-control situations).

232. See generally Lucian Arye Bebchuk & Allen Ferrell, Federalism and Corporate Law: The Race to Protect Managers from Takeovers, 99 COLUM. L. REV. 1168, 1177–80 (1999).

a. Bright-line Rules

The prior analysis on the impact of bright-line rules on "easy cases" (clearly good and clearly bad acquisitions) remains essentially valid for more ambiguous cases as well. Again, bidder-disqualifying rules would help fend-off a suboptimal acquisition,

---

233. A fact pattern similar to this hypothetical has emerged under case law in Stahl v. Apple Bancorp Inc., 579 A.2d 1115 (Del. Ch. 1990). Stahl, a 30% stockholder of Apple Bancorp, launched a joint tender offer and proxy fight with a mere 17% premium, which the target board considered, based on an opinion by its financial advisor, unfair to the stockholders from a financial point of view. Id. at 1118–19. After being advised that adequate exploration of alternatives would require more time than was available before the scheduled meeting, the board determined to withdraw the record date in order to pursue alternatives to the offer (no date for the actual meeting had been set). Id. at 1119–20. Litigation ensued based on an alleged violation of the Blasius standard whereby the board is required to present a compelling justification for withdrawing a record date, see supra note 37, to which the company replied that its rescission of the record date was not a response to a proxy contest by Stahl, but rather as a response to Stahl's tender offer (and as such its actions fell under the Unocal proportional standard of review, compare supra note 36). Id. at 1120. Ultimately, Chancellor Allen dismissed the lawsuit on grounds that the directors' action did not constitute a breach of the standards of review of either Blasius (which did not apply because the directors' primary purpose was not to hamper the franchise) or Unocal (postponing the meeting was a mild, proportional response to the threat that target shareholders would not be sufficiently informed with respect to the pending transaction). Id. at 1124. The interesting takeaway is that with a system that leaves open the ballot box route for joint tender offers and proxy fights and apparently leaves all shareholders free to cast their vote in the proxy fight (including a 30% stockholder who launches a low-ball bid), targets face the risk of succumbing to value-decreasing transactions and hence need to resort to disruptive defenses in the aim of avoiding the shareholder vote in the first place.

yet they would either be irrelevant or dangerous (if screening out the bidder votes help the target incumbents win) in the context of the somewhat good offer. Similarly, target-disqualifying rules would, with respect to somewhat bad offers, either be irrelevant for changing the outcome or, if such voting restriction itself helps the bidder win the vote in the first place, represent bad policy. Because target incumbents and the bidder may or may not be conflicted depending on the very circumstances surrounding the actual offer, namely its price as compared to the expected long-term value of the target if it stays independent, a viable route to mitigate the risk that bright-line rules are either an over- or under-deterrent is again to introduce balanced rules. In other words, voting limitations applying to both bidders, on the one hand, and target management and directors, on the other hand, seem the only sensible way to introduce an ex ante, one-size-fits-all body of rules. Such parallel limitations would quite probably determine, with respect to a somewhat bad acquisition, a vote that confirms the incumbent board in office and fends-off the acquisition, and, with respect to a somewhat good acquisition, a vote that elects the insurgent slate, which in turn redeems the pill for the acquisition to go through.

However, this obviously does not imply that balanced rules will always help reach the efficient outcome; that would in fact depend on how the remaining, non-affiliated shareholders will actually vote. Indeed, the end result is contingent on some additional factors, including, most notably, on the one hand, the actual ownership structure of the target company, the sample size of the remaining, unaffiliated shareholders,[234] and whether there are allies

234. Cf. Goshen, Controlling Corporate Self-Dealing, supra note 62, at 402 (noting that "when the minority is composed of a small group, the threat of strategic voting increases."). On the risks of non-consummation because of strategic voting by arbitrageurs and hedge funds in deals that are subject to majority-of-the-minority provisions, see Sunjeela Jain, Ethan Klingsberg & Neil Whoriskey, Examining Data Points in Minority Buy-Outs: A Practitioners' Report, 36 DEL. J. CORP. L. 939, 950 (2011), noting that even after CNX, companies involved in going private transactions did not take advantage of the safe harbor, the application of the business judgment rule, because of risks that a majority-of-the-minority provision would give some investors incentives to build a position and threaten to veto the deal. See also Leonard Chazen, Did the Dell Minority-of-the-Majority Clause Go Too Far?, LAW360 (July 22, 2013, 6:41 PM), http://www.law360.com/articles/459110 (warning on risks of non-to either side that the bright-line rule does not disqualify from voting, and, on the other hand, the ability of the two contending groups to convince, and attract the votes of, the non-affiliated shareholders, which might ultimately be less a "what would a rational investor do" issue than a PR one.[235] Note that a no-conflict standard, which I address immediately below, could help obviate only the first of those factors, that is, over- or under-inclusiveness based on ownership structure (as it would identify and inhibit ex post only the conflicted votes). The latter problem of unaffiliated shareholders sometimes getting it wrong because they do not believe management's—factually correct—story that the offer is low (or, as the case may be, the bidder's story that the target is grossly mismanaged by the incumbent group) is something no policy solution can fix.

b. No-Conflict Standard

The advantage of this approach is to provide a legal command after the voting conduct has taken place and in light of all the circumstances of the case. If enforcement is good and adjudication costs are low, a standard does a better job at tackling only resolutions that are actually affected by a conflicted vote, while leaving all other resolution out of the law's reach—thus letting the parties freely cast their votes.

However, if well conducted, a conflict analysis for a somewhat bad acquisition (or a somewhat good acquisition) should consummation when majority-of-the-minority clauses are drafted in an over-inclusive manner: "[t]he type of majority-of-minority clause used in the Dell agreement, which requires approval by a majority of the outstanding unaffiliated shares, instead of a majority of those voting on the transaction, makes the failure to cast a vote the equivalent of a vote against the deal."); Sharon Terlep, Dell Buyout Group Calls for Change in Voting Rules, WALL ST. J. (July 24, 2013, 7:28 PM), http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424127887323610704578625550322614778.html.

---

235. For instance, for targets with a bad track record in terms of governance and sensitivity with shareholder concerns, one would expect institutions to not trust management and to rather side with a bidder, even when rejecting the offer is the efficient thing to do. See generally Lee Harris, The Politics of Shareholder Voting, 86 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1761, 1763 (2011) ("[T]he process of shareholder voting in corporate elections is not dissimilar to citizen voting in elections for public office.").

result in a judicial valuation of the target that is much closer to the price offered by the bidder: a close call on valuation means a more troubling decision for a judge to make. In other words, the main uncertainty surrounding a standard applied to a "not so easy" case, such as the hypothetical scenario of a somewhat bad acquisition, is how likely a judge would be to identify the conflict and intervene. If the misalignment between bidder and other shareholders is not quite as obvious as in the case of a clearly bad acquisition ($80 offer versus $110 to $130 long term value), then it is legitimate to doubt a judge would be keen on detecting the conflict between the interest of the bidder to pay a low premium and the interests of the other shareholders to capture the long-term value (in the new example, a $100 offer versus $110 to $115 long term value). A similar question would of course arise in the opposite case of a somewhat good acquisition that directors and managers could defeat with their votes. To be sure, lack of intervention would not be the sole issue here—judicial error can, of course, be more likely in close calls.

In sum, while bright-line rules might at times be too rigid and be either over- or under-inclusive, adopting a standard-based approach runs the risk that in non-clear-cut cases the judiciary would at times make valuation mistakes or ultimately take a hands-off approach and not intervene. All this would create uncertainty and more litigation in the M&A market.

c. Unengaged Approach

Not engaging at all to detect a conflicted vote in a somewhat bad or somewhat good acquisition that determines the distorted outcome of the vote and thus of the acquisition is dangerous. Not only is it dangerous because such an approach puts at risk the overall efficiency of the market for corporate control (in all deals that are determined by the pivotal vote of the conflicted party, efficiency would have called for the exact opposite outcome), but it also sends a sobering signal that the legal system, especially this legal system whereby the ballot box route is considered the safety valve for the correct functioning of the market for corporate control, is structurally incapable of screening out inefficient outcomes for acquisitions (e.g., a bad acquisition not being defeated and a good acquisition not succeeding). True, the overall effects on society of such an unengaged approach would be less severe than with respect to distorted outcomes in clearly bad or clearly good acquisitions. Nevertheless, since an unengaged approach would affect all deals across the board (that is, also the clear-cut hypotheticals), such a policy would leave conflicted shareholders free to cast their vote on all occasions, thus potentially creating incentives for parties to taint voting outcomes even in the most extreme situations. In other words, with such an approach in place, there may well be more clearly bad acquisitions going through and clearly good acquisitions being rejected than there otherwise would be if the legal system sought to tackle conflicted voting.

5. Relaxing the Assumptions

Tables I and II summarize how the different approaches (and related assumptions) address the four hypotheticals described thus far. Given the stipulated assumptions described below, the expected outcomes for clear-cut cases and for more difficult cases match—this is why I paired the two types of bad acquisitions and good acquisitions.

Table I

<table>
<tr><td colspan="5">Clearly Bad Acquisition
$80 Offer v. $110–30 Target Value under Current Management
Somewhat Bad Acquisition
$100 Offer v. $110–15 Target Value under Current Management

Assumptions: (i) bidder vote is pivotal, (ii) majority of unaffiliated shareholders can identify, and vote according to, best course of action, (iii) trivial enforcement/adjudication costs (judge can determine target value as independent company and hence that bidder is conflicted).</td></tr>
<tr><td></td><td>Bidder Votes/ Vote Counted</td><td>Incumbents Vote/Vote Counted</td><td>Outcome</td><td>Efficient</td></tr>
<tr><td>A1) Bidder Disqualifying Rules</td><td>No</td><td>Yes</td><td>Board and Pill Stay</td><td>Yes</td></tr>
<tr><td>A2) Target Disqualifying Rules</td><td>Yes</td><td>No</td><td>Board Ousted and Pill Redeemed</td><td>No</td></tr>
<tr><td>A3) Balanced Rules</td><td>No</td><td>No</td><td>Board and Pill Stay</td><td>Yes</td></tr>
<tr><td>B) No-conflict Standard</td><td>No</td><td>Yes</td><td>Board and Pill Stay</td><td>Yes</td></tr>
<tr><td>C) Unengaged Approach</td><td>Yes</td><td>Yes</td><td>Board Ousted and Pill Redeemed</td><td>No</td></tr>
</table>

Table II

Clearly Good Acquisition $120 Offer v. $100 Target Value under Current Management Somewhat Good Acquisition $120 Offer v. $110–15 Target Value under Current Management Assumptions: (i) incumbents' vote is pivotal, (ii) majority of unaffiliated shareholders can identify, and vote according to, best course of action, (iii) trivial enforcement/adjudication costs (judge can determine target value as independent company and hence that incumbents are conflicted).
	Bidder Votes / Vote Counted	Incumbents Vote / Vote Counted	Outcome	Efficient
A1) Bidder Disqualifying Rules	No	Yes	Board and Pill Stay	No
A2) Target Disqualifying Rules	Yes	No	Board Ousted and Pill Redeemed	Yes
A3) Balanced Rules	No	No	Board and Pill Stay	No
B) No-conflict Standard	Yes	No	Board Ousted and Pill Redeemed	Yes
C) Unengaged Approach	Yes	Yes	Board and Pill Stay	No

The above tables show how different approaches can determine efficient or inefficient outcomes, based on a set of factual assumptions: (i) the bidder's or the incumbents' vote is pivotal (as the case may be); (ii) a majority of unaffiliated shareholders can identify, and vote according to, the best course of action (that is, towards the efficient outcome); and (iii) enforcement/adjudication costs are trivial. The judge can determine target value as independent company and hence that the bidder or the incumbents, as the case may be, are in fact conflicted.

Table III summarizes the interrelations between the various approaches and their underlying assumptions (when present and when relaxed). An explanation and various implications ensue.

Table III

	Vote PIVOTAL (Conflict Is an Issue)	Vote NOT PIVOTAL (Conflict Is Not an Issue)
Both Disinterested Shareholders (DSHs) and Adjudicator right	(All assumptions are met) Rules and standard work, unengaged approach does not.	All approaches work.
Both DSHs and Adjudicator wrong	No approach works, yet rules are either counterproductive (if over-inclusive in the specific) or irrelevant (if all shareholders are wrong).	(No assumptions are met) Unengaged approach works, standard does not. Rules are either counterproductive (if over-inclusive in the specific) or irrelevant (if all shareholders are wrong).
DSHs right Adjudicator wrong	Rules work, standard and unengaged approach do not.	Rules and unengaged approach work, standard does not.
DSHs wrong Adjudicator right	Standard works, unengaged approach does not. Rules are either counterproductive (if over-inclusive in the specific) or irrelevant (if all shareholders are wrong).	Standards and unengaged approach work. Rules are either counterproductive (if over-inclusive in the specific) or irrelevant (if all shareholders are wrong).

a) When all assumptions are met, the unengaged approach does not work, while all the other approaches (rules and standard) do. More importantly, if any of the assumptions under (ii) (disinterested shareholders are right) or (iii) (adjudicator is right) hold, an unengaged approach is never warranted (its only advantage is doing nothing in cases in which nothing needs to be done).

b) When a conflicted vote is pivotal, the unengaged approach never works. When it is not pivotal, the unengaged approach always works because there is no need to intervene; but if the adjudicator is right, also a standard-based approach works because the adjudicator does not intervene when it is not necessary.[236] In any event, the assumption that the conflicted vote is pivotal is based on both the ownership structure of the company on the record date and the voting outcome (that is, how the other shareholders vote). But since there is no reliable way to predict how frequently a conflicted vote might become pivotal (because it is something that can be ascertained only after the resolution takes place),[237] this peculiar strength of the unengaged approach is hard to test. However, it is safe to believe that potentially conflicted votes are more likely to become pivotal when the voting outcome is close.[238]

c) When disinterested shareholders are right, rules always work, irrespective of all other assumptions.[239] When they are wrong, rules are either: (x) counterproductive if, because of the

---

236. If there is no pivotal vote by the potentially conflicted actor, the outcome of the deal is not affected by a conflicted vote. In all such cases, no regime would be necessary because there is no issue to address. When the votes by the potentially conflicted actor are not pivotal, an unengaged approach would actually work: it would not show its typical defect of under-deterrence (because there is nothing to deter here). If the potentially conflicted vote is not pivotal, a no-conflict standard would not even be triggered and therefore would be harmless: in other words, the risk of uncertainty and of excessive litigation that is peculiar of a standard-based regime might not arise whenever the vote cast does not determine the outcome. So an advantage of the unengaged regime could also be an advantage of the no-conflict standard but only to the extent that the potentially conflicted shareholder has not instructed allies to vote in its favor (think of the Deutsche Bank vote in the HP/Compaq merger): because this latter point depends on additional facts, uncertainty and litigation might indeed not disappear with a standard.

237. Even assuming past empirical data were available (currently it is extremely scarce, see infra notes 241 and accompanying text), its implications to spot future trends are dubious since such data combines elements deriving from the merits of actual offer on the table and the underlying ownership structure, which are both peculiar to the given deal.

238. See Kahan & Rock, supra note 90, at 1229 (mentioning a couple of mergers of the mid-2000s (the AXA/MONY and the Transkaryotic mergers) that were "closely fought," with voting outcomes nearing the 50/50 split).

239. However, though easier to grasp and naturally less prone to generate disputes, even rules can carry a litigation risk because of evasion attempts by the relevant players. Shareholders who are disqualified by the bright-line rules might in fact enter into arrangements with complacent allies (who are not formally disqualified) to have the latter cast a vote in their favor. This is of course an enforcement issue, arising out of bright-line rules that are clear to understand and hence easy to avoid. See supra note 191.

voting prohibition, a potentially (yet not actually) conflicted vote that is not counted would have determined a different, efficient outcome; or (y) irrelevant, when even without the rules in place, the same inefficient voting outcome would have been reached anyway. In other words, if disinterested shareholders cannot tell whether the offer is good or bad and a majority of their votes are cast against their interests, but a majority of all shareholders, thus including the potentially conflicted ones, could have steered towards the efficient outcome, then a balanced disinterested shares regime would be over-inclusive. But note that the likelihood that a potentially conflicted shareholder might correct the error of the disinterested shareholders and determine the efficient outcome depends again on the actual voting outcome and on the underlying ownership structure. The issue therefore boils down to what system we are better off with. Under one, we give a key voice to disinterested shareholders who might make mistakes (but never because of a conflict, which by definition they are not affected by). Under the other, a potentially conflicted stockholder may well sometimes fix the error that would otherwise be made by the disinterested stockholder; however, in other circumstances that same shareholder might actually be conflicted and skew (inefficient) outcomes in his or her favor (because in a standard he or she would not be automatically disqualified from voting). So the question is, how likely is it that a majority of disinterested shareholders will approve the wrong outcome?

d) When the adjudicator is right, a standard always works, irrespective of all other assumptions (either because it steers the outcome to an efficient one or because it does not intervene when it is not necessary). However, if adjudication does not work properly, a standard-based approach would suffer: a judge might err and alter the outcome of an election if he or she (x) erroneously sanctions a vote that would have otherwise been determinant in reaching an efficient outcome or (y) fails to detect a vote that determines the inefficient one. In the former scenario (x), an unengaged approach (and maybe even a rule-based approach if the assumption that the disinterested shareholders are right holds) would fare better, whereas in the latter (y), only a rule-based approach would (again, provided that the said assumption holds).

C. Policy Remarks

What emerges from the above analysis is that none of the approaches can be expected to work better than the others under all circumstances: each carries positives and negatives.

1. The Uneasy Case for an Unengaged Approach

The unengaged approach means no new regulation and no additional litigation. Both can be considered to come at a premium, especially the latter given the ever-litigious M&A world.[240] But this is where its advantages end. The downside of the unengaged approach is that it offers no protection in situations in which a distorted outcome might arise. The gating, overarching policy

240. M&A activity is already clogged with litigation, see, for example, ROBERT M. DAINES & OLGA KOUMRIAN, SHAREHOLDER LITIGATION INVOLVING MERGERS AND ACQUISITIONS 1 (2013) (noting that ninety-three percent of M&A deals valued over $100 million were the subject of a shareholder challenge), https://www.cornerstone.com/Publications/Reports/2012-Shareholder-Litigation-Involving-M-and-A; Gideon Mark, Multijurisdictional M&A Litigation, 40 IOWA J. CORP. L. 291, 292 (2015), stating that:

> In 1999–2000, 11.9% of announced M&A offers with a value of at least $80 million generated litigation. In 2005, approximately 39.3% of deals with a minimum value of $100 million attracted a lawsuit. In 2013, shareholders challenged 97.5% of all M&A transactions with a value greater than $100 million involving U.S. public company targets.

Id. (footnotes omitted); Matthew D. Cain & Steven M. Davidoff, Takeover Litigation in 2012 1, 2 (Feb. 1, 2013) (noting continued increase of litigation over takeovers, with lawsuits brought in 92% of all transactions in 2012), http:// papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2216727; Oesterle & Palmiter, supra note 42, at 494. But see C.N.V. Krishnan, Ronald W. Masulis, Randall S. Thomas & Robert B. Thompson, Shareholder Litigation in Mergers and Acquisitions, 18 J. CORP. FIN. 1248, 1264 (2012) (noting that while M&A deals that are litigated suffer an increased risk of non-completion, the premiums associated with such deals are much higher and offset such a risk); Randall S. Thomas, What Should We Do About Multijurisdictional Litigation in M&A Deals?, 66 VAND. L. REV. 1925, 1948 (2013) ("[S]hareholder litigation has an important monitoring function to play in detecting and punishing parties that violate their fiduciary and contractual duties to target company shareholders."); Anabtawi & Stout, supra note 151, at 1303–04 (noting that enforcement and adjudication costs in connection with an increased policing of self-dealing "are more than worthwhile, even though the result is more litigation than if there were no such [fiduciary] duties.").

question is thus how many undetected conflicts can yield inefficient acquisitions or block inefficient ones. The answer is that, unfortunately, we do not know. Available data on proxy fights combined with hostile tender offers for Delaware companies is completely inconclusive because of the extremely low number of contested elections that resulted in an actual vote: only seven in the 2003–2015 period.[241] However, this low number should not suggest the overall issue is moot. As I noted elsewhere, a bidder does not necessarily have to launch and win a proxy fight to complete a hostile deal: proxy fights can operate "in the shadow."[242] If the ownership structure of the given target is such that its directors can anticipate that they will lose a proxy fight, it is not uncommon that they would let the acquisition go through if a bidder's threat to start a proxy fight and replace the board is credible.[243] The opposite scenario of a bidder launching and withdrawing a proxy fight when it realizes that it has no chance to prevail is also true. This explains the meager number of recent cases in which the proxy contenders ultimately went to a vote count. Needless to say, outcomes (and possibly the overall number of proxy fights) might very well pan out differently if conflicts were policed by any of the above regimes: to make a blatantly simple (and unrealistic) example, if a disinterested share regime restricting only target incumbents were put in place, one can expect more hostile deals, possibly via tender offer combined with a proxy fight. In

---

241. Out of 60 hostile deals for a Delaware target announced between 2003 and July 2015, while a total of 28 proxy fights were launched, only seven cases ended with an actual vote (a mere 11.6 percent of all hostile deals and 25 percent of deals where a proxy fight was launched). Fact Set, SHARKREPELLENT.NET (July 29, 2015) (on file with author).

242. See Gatti, supra note 14, at 85 n.26.

243. This is, for instance, what happened in 2012 with the GlaxoSmithKline's acquisition of Human Genome Sciences and in the Cypress Semiconductor's acquisition of Ramtron International (for more detail and references, see Gatti, supra note 14, at 85 n.26); see also Bebchuk, Coates & Subramanian, supra note 15, at 927 ("[O]nce a bidder is fairly certain to gain control of the board in an imminent vote, managers might well choose to make a graceful exit, possibly extracting some benefit for themselves, which would not be possible after the vote has occurred."). This is in line with the empirical literature finding that companies and CEOs would rather let go or significantly amend certain deals than face the risk of a defeat at a shareholder meeting. See Becht, Polo & Rossi, supra note 29.

any event, future research should be addressed to investigate friendly deals, which represent a significantly larger pool, to see what portion of deals are approved with the pivotal votes of the acquirer and the target incumbents.[244] In other words, how many M&A deals would have generated a different outcome had disinterested shareholders alone been pivotal?[245]

But all things considered, doing nothing to address the issue should warrant more skepticism towards the ballot box route as a safety valve for the correct functioning of the market for corporate control. If we do believe in the importance of the shareholders' using "the powers of corporate democracy . . . to turn the board out"[246] and select the preferred outcome (either because it is good policy or because it is what we are left with anyway after takeover defenses eroded the market for corporate control), we should ensure that voting occurs in an orderly way that enables shareholders to express their preferences effectively: that implies the outcome is an aggregation of sincere preferences that are not affected by some particular interests going against the common interest.

Otherwise, if we surrender to the idea that legislating or enforcing conflicts would either be too cumbersome or create too much uncertainty, then we have once and for all accepted that, in a set of circumstances, the ballot box route, which is supposedly keeping the efficiency of the market for corporate control in check, may work in a potentially distorted way (and thus, in some cases, may ultimately not work). True, we cannot know ex ante if the

---

244. For an account of a relatively recent merger potentially tainted by a conflicted vote, even though the vote was not cast by an acquirer or a target incumbent, compare the 2014 cash-out merger of Zale Corporation, which was approved by 53.1% of the outstanding shares with the pivotal vote in favor by an allegedly conflicted 23.3% shareholder. However, on that occasion the Chancery Court dismissed the claim that the shareholder was in fact conflicted. See supra note 185 and accompanying text.

245. In any event, because of the difficulty in collecting data on the market consensus about the expected value of the target as a standalone entity, we will never know for sure whether voting against a specific deal would in fact have been a better course of action for shareholders.

246. Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946, 959 (Del. 1985).

distortions play in favor of targets or bidders[247] and that is probably why nobody has taken steps to make improvements: as conflicts are circumstantial and depend on whether the vote fosters shareholder wealth maximization or not, this is an issue for which interest groups do not necessarily have a clear agenda because they cannot anticipate the specifics of the conflict situation in a future deal (will they or their adversaries be actually conflicted in such a scenario?). In other words, because it is impossible to anticipate which end of the stick a takeover player will hold on deals, this is not an "us versus them" issue like staggered boards, which always favor incumbents and are opposed by proxy advisors and activists,[248] and so this is not an area in which lobbying efforts are activated to move things in some interest group's favor. But this is precisely why the issue can be considered even thornier than staggered boards. While the (low) likelihood that a company with a staggered board will ever become a target in a hostile deal is already priced into stock and so everyone, from any would-be bidder to market participants, can operate and trade with a given set of expectations (that is, investors will pay less because of the low probability of a battle for control),[249] the direction of whom the conflict is going to favor—whether the bidder or the incumbents—is not predictable ex ante,[250] and conflicted voting can introduce a noisy element in the pricing accuracy a given stock.

---

247. As I mentioned earlier (see supra note 94 and accompanying text, as well infra the examples in Sections IV.B.1, IV.B.2, and IV.B.4.a.), whether a shareholder is in conflict or not with respect to a given acquisition depends entirely on the offer price and the consensus, if any, on the long-term value of the target if it stays independent.

248. See generally Lucian Arye Bebchuk, Scott Hirst, & June Rhee, Towards the Declassification of S&P 500 Boards, 3 HARV. BUS. L. REV. 157 (2013).

249. Cf. Marcel Kahan & Edward B. Rock, Corporate Constitutionalism: Antitakeover Charter Provisions as Precommitment, 152 U. PA. L. REV. 473, 491 ("Investors need not buy shares of a company in an IPO or secondary market if they do not like the charter. . . . [D]issatisfied shareholders . . . individually . . . can sell their shares, and collectively, such selling can exert pressure for change by depressing the share price. As a result . . . exit imposes . . . significant constraints on managers . . . .").

250. This is because the advantage can be determined only after the offer is presented and the vote takes place.

2. Rules or Standard?

If policymakers decided not to surrender to a system of hostile deals tainted by potential conflicts at the ballot box level, we would have to choose between rules, standards, or, and this is possibly the most promising option, a combination of the two. Consider each of the two approaches in light of their respective appeal and flaws. A system of balanced rules would contain conflicted voting in a series of circumstances, but its potential over-deterrence can put at risk a subset of deals in which the universe of disinterested shareholders might not get it right or might be polarized by some shareholders who, while formally not disallowed to vote, might vote strategically to extract benefits of various sorts: the experience of majority-of-the-minority provisions in freeze-out mergers tells us that deal planners are very wary of putting the deal in jeopardy for the risk of some strategic vetoing by a blocking minority.[251] In addition, applying a disinterested shares regime plain and simple might have quite severe repercussions on certain existing ownership structures.[252] What if, for example, incumbents

251. See supra note 234. Note, however, that the larger pool of shares available in a hostile tender offer for a contestable public company should make these strategic vetoes less problematic for deal planners as compared with how such vetoes play out in the context of a parent/subsidiary merger, in which the size of the float in the market is normally smaller and makes it easier for investors to accumulate stakes that are sufficient to exert veto powers.

252. Another question is whether a disinterested shares regime would, to some extent, create a disincentive to pre-bid accumulation by a bidder if its shares cannot be counted for determining the acquisition outcome at the relevant vote. While exploring the issue is beyond the scope of this article, I would mention that the most obvious observation point is represented by patterns of stake accumulation in CSAS jurisdictions (which already have disinterested shares regimes in place). However, it is unlikely that available data can give us sufficient guidance if we consider the scarcity of hostile deals in such jurisdictions: according to FactSet/SharkRepellent sources, only in seven instances has a shareholder or hostile bidder formally gone through a CSAS referendum process. Cf. Fact Set, SHARKREPELLENT.NET (August 5, 2015) (on file with author). For an account that the relevance of CSAS has been de facto absorbed by the advent of poison pills (which call for a joint tender offer and proxy fight, rather than passing the CSASreferendum), see Emiliano Catan & Marcel Kahan, The Law and Finance of Anti-Takeover Statutes, 10 n.40 (N.Y.U. Ctr. L. Econ. & Org., Working Paper No. 14-30, 2014), http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2517594.

held a sizeable stake, say 30% of the voting stock? In the absence of a disinterested shares regime, everyone would assume incumbents can resist future hostile deals and thus no bidder could realistically consider that company up for grabs. However, with a regime in place and incumbents not being able to vote, a bidder could oust the board with a decent offer (whether the bidder could also obtain the majority of the shares in the tender offer, with incumbents already owning 30%, would be more uncertain but definitely possible). In a system with disinterested shares type-rules, sizeable stakes of "interested shares" would count very little, as a bidder can possibly oust a board even when the board has a 30% ownership base by offering some premium (even a low-ball one) and convincing enough shareholders to approve the acquisition. Not only would this potentially harsh byproduct of a one-size-fits-all regime present concerns with respect to the efficiency of voting and acquisitions generally (i.e., the risk that a low-ball bidder takes advantage of the regime and succeeds in a value decreasing transaction), but it can also be considered as politically unattainable if one frames such effects under a public choice lens: Delaware policymakers are wary of the negative consequences for their state's primacy in corporate law of reforms penalizing incumbents and are thus quite reticent to pass them.[253]

None of this would happen in a standard-based regime, as target incumbents would be able to vote and only subsequently would takeover contenders have a dispute over whether the vote was conflicted or not. In other words, rigid bright-line rules may impact ownership structures and assumptions on the market for corporate control, whereas standards would not. However, the complex element in a standard-based approach is establishing the 253. See generally Mark J. Roe, Takeover Politics, in THE DEAL DECADE: WHAT TAKEOVERS AND LEVERAGED BUYOUTS MEAN FOR CORPORATE GOVERNANCE 321, 340–41, 353 (Margaret M. Blair ed., 1993) (worried about the potential loss of primacy in the market for corporate charters, 1980s Delaware policymakers ruled for targets); Mark J. Roe, Delaware's Competition, 117 HARV. L. REV. 588, 625–26 (2003) (mentioning the November 1988 Wachtell Lipton client alert memo, which was sent in the wake of the pro-bidder decision in Interco and advised its clients to consider reincorporating outside of Delaware should Delaware continue to rule against targets, which in fact did not happen); Romano, supra note 31, at 120–22 (hypothesizing that not just target companies but a broader coalition has favored takeover regulation statutes).

---

inherent long-term value of the target as an independent entity, an exercise that judges seem quite uneasy to perform: if appraisal rights case law is any lesson, valuation never coincides with a point but rather falls within a range of estimates[254] and parties would have a hard time convincing a judge that the other's position is misaligned with the interests of shareholders.

3. Rules and Standard? The Case for a Combined Approach

A more promising way to address this policy dilemma is to actually combine a rule-based approach with a standard-based one. The idea is that the system relies on balanced bright-line rules establishing a rebuttable presumption that both contenders (i.e., bidder and target incumbents) are conflicted: each group would vote, but their shares would not be counted for determining the outcome of the proxy fight/deal. However, each group can prove that in fact its votes are not conflicted because they are directed to achieve an outcome that maximizes shareholder value. Thus, instead of having a plaintiff challenge the voting outcome by showing that a pivotal vote was cast in conflict (as in a plain vanilla standard-approach), this policy would initially disregard certain votes but would nonetheless give shareholders the opportunity to prove they should actually be counted in that they are not conflicted.[255]

This combined approach would be a less harsh version of a pure disinterested shares regime, because a group initially labeled as interested could actually demonstrate the opposite and avoid what would otherwise be a false positive: this way, entrenchment-seeking directors and management will have to convince a judge they are casting their votes because rejecting the bid is the best

---

254. Cede & Co. v. Technicolor, Inc., No. Civ.A. 7129, 2003 WL 23700218, at *2 (Del. Ch. Dec. 31, 2003) ("The value of a corporation is not a point on a line, but a range of reasonable values, and the judge's task is to assign one particular value within this range as the most reasonable value in light of all of the relevant evidence and based on considerations of fairness."); see supra note 205.

255. Obviously, if none of the disregarded votes were pivotal (that is, the outcome of the voting procedure would not change had some or all of the votes been counted), there would be no chance to challenge the resolution.

course of action, while bidders will have to prove their offer is not a "low baller."

One might counter that this policy is no different than having a standard in the first place: after all, parties would end up litigating over value before a judge who would have to pick a figure. I beg to differ.

First and foremost, the potential adjudication flaws would be less severe under this combined approach than in a plain vanilla standard-based regime. In the latter regime, the concern is that judges would be uneasy, if not reluctant, to make a valuation inquiry as to whether the bid price is higher than the target's long-term independent value.[256] In the typical standard-based regime, every vote would be counted and a plaintiff would have to prove that a shareholder (say the bidder) is in conflict: ultimately, a reluctant judge could avoid coming up with any valuation exercise just by saying he or she is not impressed with the pleading record—that way, the voting outcome would be left as is. Conversely, in the combined approach, those votes would be initially disregarded. So in rendering the opinion, a judge who is reluctant to change the outcome of the actual vote would still have to make, at least implicitly, a valuation decision—by rejecting the bidder's pleading, on grounds that there has been a failure to produce enough evidence to warrant a determination that the party is not conflicted, a judge would be implicitly establishing that the offer price is actually lower than the target's long-term independent value. But then it safe to say that, once a judge is placed into that situation, he or she might as well look into the record in more depth, come up with a valuation and actually determine who is and is not conflicted. In other words, the combined approach would compel the judge to conduct a valuation exercise no matter what, whereas under a standard-based approach the burden of proof could help a non-interventionist judge leave the outcome, as it resulted from the initial vote count. True, a combined approach would not cure all enforcement-related problems—the risk of judicial error, a typical problem of any standard-based regime, would not disappear with it—but a judge's reluctance to intervene would be reduced.

Turning to the potential appeal of this policy, not only would this type of reform draw a line and show the legal system is wary of potential conflicts and offer protection in conflicted voting situations, but, more importantly, the expected cost of litigation would generate pressure against undue entrenchment (for target incumbents) and low balling (for bidders).[257] In other words, this system would ex ante help to "keep honest" both the groups involved. First, the aim to avoid the risk of being subject to a disinterested shares regime should induce both groups of potentially conflicted shareholders to "do the right thing." Incumbents will have to be specific as to why the offer is not in the best interests of the shareholders—something akin to "specify[ing] the metric by which their performance going forward should be measured if the offer were defeated."[258] The bidder will have to offer what a ma-257. Supporters of an active and vibrant market for corporate control are likely to object that any limitation to a bidder's ability to freely run a proxy contest with the aim to redeem a poison pill would represent an additional restraint in a regulatory landscape that is already quite unsympathetic to buyers, both at the federal (for a pro-bidder critique to the Williams Act, see, for example, Daniel R. Fischel, Efficient Capital Market Theory, the Market for Corporate Control, and the Regulation of Cash Tender Offers, 57 TEX. L. REV. 1 (1978)) and state level, see Gilson, supra note 3. More constraints to bidders, the argument would go, mean less hostile takeovers at moment in history when this type of deal is not occurring in significant numbers (only 60 in the 2003–2015 period. See supra note 241 and accompanying text.

256. See supra notes 205 and 254.

---

The problem with this objection is that it only focuses on one side of the regulatory intervention, while neglecting the other one. When discussing a rule-based regime, I in fact made it clear that the only way a "disinterested shares" type of reform would work is through balanced rules, that is, rules disqualifying both bidders and target directors and management. This type of reform would hardly represent a worsening of the landscape for bidders. Quite the contrary, this would likely tilt the balance in the opposite direction, as one would expect that if the votes of both contending groups were actually neutralized, target incumbents would likely feel more endangered. And, if instead of a rule-based regime, we were to pick a standard-based one, its very own adaptability to the specific circumstances of the given case would sanction a bidder's votes only if such votes were in actual conflict with the other shareholders' interests, that is, only when a bidder is making a low offer: something a system should not encourage. In sum, the objection that a reform would penalize bidders would either (i) mistakenly forget that a disinterested shares regime penalizes both bidders and targets: leaving the last word to disinterested shareholders or (ii) enable conflicts of interests by wrongfully lamenting that bidders cannot vote when they make inefficient offers.

258. Gilson & Gordon, supra note 1, at 22–23. In channeling the famous article by Ronald J. Gilson & Reiner Kraakman, Delaware's Intermediate jority of unaffiliated recipients would consider above their reservation price. In other words, low-ball bidders might be dissuaded from not offering what is fair value to the shareholders if they know they cannot count on their votes to get rid of takeover defenses. Second, such pressure would of course be bolstered by each group's interest in avoiding the litigation route to start with.[259] That can be achieved by being extremely convincing with their fellow shareholders in the context of a proxy campaign: because a landslide outcome would make either group's vote not pivotal, there would no need to go to court to have their respective votes counted.

All in all, this suggested approach would utilize procedural tools, such as burden shifting and requiring the parties to factor in expected litigation costs in order to shape their actions in connec-

---

Standard for Defensive Tactics: Is There Substance to Proportionality Review?, 44 BUS. LAW. 247, 268 (1989), Gilson and Gordon explain:

> To make a claim of substantive coercion credible, [Gilson & Kraakman] called for a good deal more than just management's predictable assertion that the market price undervalued the company's shares. The board also would have to state clearly the source of the mispricing and the management's plans for correcting it. The thought was that requiring discipline in demonstrating the presence of substantive coercion would require management to specify the metric by which their performance going forward should be measured if the offer were defeated.

Id. at 22–23, 23 n.49. In their article, Gilson and Kraakman introduced the concept of "substantive coercion" to describe a situation where (i) management actually believes the offer price is inadequate, and (ii) shareholders do not trust management's ability either to assess the circumstances objectively or to deliver on the expected long-term value. Gilson & Kraakman, Delaware's Intermediate Standard for Defensive Tactics: Is There Substance to Proportionality Review?, 44 BUS. LAW 247, 260. Note that, to the authors' dismay, the concept was loosely adopted later on by Delaware judges starting with Paramount Communications, Inc. v. Time, Inc., 571 A.2d 1140, 1153 n.17 (Del. 1989).

259. As a stick to avoid abuses of the litigation avenue, it should be considered to prohibit the company from reimbursing any losing party in the related litigation: this would represent a disincentive system to push incumbents to litigate only if they believe they are in a position to prove the bidder is effectively low-balling (and, conversely, a bidder will litigate only if it can prove its offer is truly value-maximizing). This suggestion follows the spirit of the sanctions system set forth in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. See FED. R. CIV. P. 11(c).

tion with the underlying M&A transaction and thus help achieve the substantive policy goal of curbing conflicted voting to avoid suboptimal deals and promote desirable ones.[260]

260. It is common to use procedural tools for purposes of shaping substantive policy in corporate law: the rules on burden shifting in the context of corporate freeze-outs are clearly a case in point. See supra note 84. The pendulum between the standards of review under the duty of care and duty of loyalty is another. See Allen, Jacobs & Strine, supra note 38, at 874–78. Takeover law itself uses burden shifting abundantly. See, e.g., Unitrin, Inc. v. Am. Gen. Corp., 651 A.2d 1361, 1367 (Del. 1995) (noting that in order to fail the second prong under Unocal, that is, the proportionality test, directors must prove their actions are not "draconian, by being either preclusive or coercive[,]" and, if the "[response is] not draconian, the Court must then determine whether it [falls] within a range of reasonable responses to the threat . . . posed," at which point it is the plaintiff who has to prove unreasonableness); Paramount Commc'ns Inc. v. QVC Network Inc., 637 A.2d 34, 45 (Del. 1994). The Court in Paramount Communications discussed the scope of enhanced judicial scrutiny under Revlon:

> The key features of an enhanced scrutiny test are: (a) a judicial determination regarding the adequacy of the decisionmaking process employed by the directors, including the information on which the directors based their decision; and (b) a judicial examination of the reasonableness of the directors' action in light of the circumstances then existing. The directors have the burden of proving that they were adequately informed and acted reasonably.

Id; see also Blasius Indus. v. Atlas Corp., 564 A.2d 651, 661 (Del. Ch. 1988) (stating that if the board acts "for the primary purpose of impeding the exercise of stockholder voting power[,] . . . . the board bears the heavy burden of demonstrating a compelling justification for such action"); Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946, 955 (Del. 1985) (stating that directors have to prove there are "reasonable grounds for believing that a danger or a threat to corporate policy and effectiveness exists" and the response taken by the company is "reasonable in relation to the threat posed"; if they satisfy such a burden, the transaction is then reviewed under the deferential business judgment review, but if directors are unable to satisfy the enhanced scrutiny under Unocal, the defenses measures are not valid unless directors can show that the transaction was entirely fair). On burden shifting, see generally Louis Kaplow, Burden of Proof, 121 YALE L.J. 738 (2012) and, with respect to corporate law, Charles M. Yablon, On the Allocation of Burdens of Proof in Corporate Law: An Essay on Fairness and Fuzzy Sets, 13 CARDOZO L. REV. 497 (1991).

V. CONCLUSION

In this article, I have identified conflicted voting by shareholders of Delaware companies as a worrisome factor that can negatively distort voting and acquisitions outcomes, something that prior analysis in the takeover field has not satisfactorily explored. While conceding there is no easy policy fix, this article analyzes different approaches to minimize the efficiency costs of such distorted outcomes. This article does not necessarily call for a reform. Rather, it illustrates the implications of embracing one or more of the policy avenues that I have analyzed on the current Delaware system. Crucially, if the issue is dismissed, there is no way to reconcile the policy behind introducing proxy fights as a safety valve for the efficient functioning of the market for corporate control.[261] Future theoretical and empirical research is necessary to better understand the phenomenon and evaluate additional, complex policy dilemmas, such as whether a mandatory or an optional regime is better suited, whether friendly deals require a different solution, as well as the repercussions that policing conflicted voting might have on empty voting and shareholder activism.

261. Virtually all jurisdictions that vested shareholder referendums with the power to determine the outcome of hostile acquisitions have dealt with the issue and adopted a disinterested shares regime.

APPENDIX I

There are currently twenty-five states that somehow restrict the voting power of an acquirer via a control share acquisition statute.[i] These restriction statutes are the default option in twenty-four of the twenty-five states,[ii] with a possibility for companies to opt out of the statute, subject to the certain procedures under the relevant statute.[iii]

These control share acquisition statutes have two main characteristics: the type of restriction which is placed upon the acquirer's voting rights and the manner in which the acquirer is able to regain the affected voting rights. Within these twenty-five control share acquisition statutes, there are six different methods whereby acquirer's voting rights may be affected. The majority of control share acquisition states (eighteen) provide that an acquirer has no voting rights, unless a specific resolution has been passed by the applicable majority (this varies as to if the acquirers shares are entitled to vote on the resolution or not, as discussed below).[iv] Two states[v] allow an entity making a control share acquisition vote for directors but not on any other matters without a shareholder resolution authorizing the voting rights of the acquirer. Hawaii denies the voting rights of an acquirer for one year should the acquisition not be approved by a majority of disinterested shares.[vi] Two states disallow an acquirer to vote in shareholder matters if the acquirer has more than 20% percent of the voting rights.[vii] Wisconsin restricts the voting power of an acquirer, which holds over 20% of the voting power to one-tenth of the acquirer's shares (thus a 20% percent stake will have only 2% of the voting power, or one vote for every ten shares).[viii] Finally, Ohio does not specifically mention voting restrictions or restoration of voting rights; however, it requires a majority of the uninterested shares to approve any acquisition.[ix]

Among control share acquisition state statutes, there are primarily four separate methods used by the various states in which an acquirer can either have their voting rights restored or acquisition approved. A slight majority of the control acquisition states (thirteen of twenty-five) require a majority of the outstanding disinterested shares approve a resolution of acquisition or restoration of voting rights.[x] The second most popular regime (nine of twenty-five States) requires both a majority of outstanding disinterested shares, as well as a majority of all outstanding shares to approve a resolution.[xi] Next, two states (Idaho and Maryland) require a two-third majority of outstanding disinterested shares to approve a resolution of acquisition or restoration of voting rights.[xii] Finally, Wisconsin requires a majority of the adjusted shares (i.e. where any 20% or greater voting power is reduced to one-tenth of the power), which are voted at the meeting to approve a restoration of voting rights or approval of an acquisition.[xiii]

State	Voting Restrictions as Default	Company may change Default	Acquirer may vote in director elections without shareholder resolution	Acquirer may vote only if allowed by resolution	Denied Voting Rights for 1 Year	More than 20% is disallowed a vote	More than 20% of voting power is limited to 10% of voting power	No discussion of voting restrictions, only matters which may be voted on, (not director votes)	Needs Majority of disinterested shares to allow acquirer to vote	Needs Both Majority of Disinterested and Majority of all outstanding	Needs 2/3 of Disinterested Shares	Needs Majority of adjusted shares present at meeting	Defines Interested Shareholder as Acquirer, Officer or Inside Director of target	Defines Interested Shareholder otherwise (see footnotes)
Arizona	Yes[xiv]	Yes[xv]	X[xvi]						X[xvii]					X[xviii]
Florida	Yes[xix]	Yes[xx]		X[xxi]					X[xxii]				X[xxiii]
Hawaii	Yes[xxiv]	Yes[xxv]			X[xxvi]				X[xxvii]					X[xxviii]
Idaho	Yes[xxix]	Yes[xxx]		X[xxxi]							X[xxxii]			X[xxxiii]
Indiana	Yes[xxxiv]	Yes[xxxv]		X[xxxvi]						X[xxxvii]			X[xxxviii]
Kansas	Yes[xxxix]	Yes[xl]		X[xli]						X[xlii]			X[xliii]
Maryland	Yes[xliv]	Yes[xlv]		X[xlvi]							X[xlvii]		X[xlviii]
Massachusetts	Yes[xlix]	Yes[l]		X[li]					X[lii]				X[liii]
Minnesota	Yes[liv]	Yes[lv]		X[lvi]						X[lvii]			X[lviii]
Mississippi	Yes[lix]	Yes[lx]				X[lxi]			X[lxii]				X[lxiii]
Missouri	Yes[lxiv]	Yes[lxv]		X[lxvi]						X[lxvii]			X[lxviii]
Nebraska	Yes[lxix]	Yes[lxx]	X[lxxi]						X[lxxii]					X[lxxiii]
Nevada	Yes[lxxiv]	Yes[lxxv]		X[lxxvi]					X[lxxvii]					X[lxxviii]
North Carolina	Yes[lxxix]	Yes[lxxx]		X[lxxxi]					X[lxxxii]				X[lxxxiii]
Ohio	Yes[lxxxiv]	Yes[lxxxv]						X[lxxxvi]	X[lxxxvii]					X[lxxxviii]
Oklahoma	Yes[lxxxix]	Yes[xc]				X[xci]			X[xcii]				X[xciii]
Oregon	Yes[xciv]	Yes[xcv]		X[xcvi]						X[xcvii]			X[xcviii]
Pennsylvania	Yes[xcix]	Yes[c]		X[ci]						X[cii]				X[ciii]
South Carolina	Yes[civ]	Yes[cv]		X[cvi]					X[cvii]				X[cviii]
South Dakota	Yes[cix]	Yes[cx]		X[cxi]						X[cxii]			X[cxiii]
Tennessee	No[cxiv]	Yes[cxv]		X[cxvi]					X[cxvii]				X[cxviii]
Utah	Yes[cxix]	Yes[cxx]		X[cxxi]					X[cxxii]				X[cxxiii]
Virginia	Yes[cxxiv]	Yes[cxxv]		X[cxxvi]					X[cxxvii]				X[cxxviii]
Wisconsin	Yes[cxxix]	Yes[cxxx]					X[cxxxi]					X[cxxxii]		X[cxxxiii]
Wyoming	Yes[cxxxiv]	Yes[cxxxv]		X[cxxxvi]						X[cxxxvii]			X[cxxxviii]

---

i. Louisiana and Michigan repealed their controlled share acquisition statutes. See infra Chart.

ii. Tennessee is the exception. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 48-103-310(a) (2002) ("This part shall be applicable to any corporation as defined in § 48-103-302 whose charter or bylaws contain an express declaration that control share acquisitions respecting the shares of the corporation are governed by and subject to the provisions of this part.").

iii. See infra Chart.

iv. See id.; see also, e.g., KAN. STAT. ANN. § 17-1294(a) (2007) ("Control shares acquired in a control share acquisition have the same voting rights as were accorded the shares before the control share acquisition only to the extent granted by resolution approved by the shareholders of the issuing public corporation."); VA. CODE ANN. § 13.1-728.3(A) (2011). This provision states:

> Notwithstanding any contrary provision of this chapter, shares acquired in a control share acquisition have no voting rights unless voting rights are granted by resolution adopted by the shareholders of the public corporation. If such a resolution is adopted, such shares shall thereafter have the voting rights they would have had in the absence of this article.

Id.

v. See Chart. For example, see ARIZ. REV. STAT. § 10-2725(A) (2013), which states:

> Shares of an issuing public corporation that are acquired by an acquiring person in a control share acquisition and that exceed the threshold of voting power of any of the ranges prescribed in section 10-2722, subsection A, paragraph 4 have the same voting rights as other shares of the same class or series for all elections of directors but do not have the right to vote on other matters unless approved by a resolution of shareholders of the issuing public corporation at a special or annual meeting of shareholders pursuant to section 10-2723.

Id. For another example, see NEB. REV. STAT. § 21-2451 (2012), which states:

> Shares acquired in a control-share acquisition shall have the same voting rights as other shares of the same class or series in all elections of directors but shall have voting rights on all other matters only if approved by a vote of shareholders of the issuing public corporation at a special or annual meeting of shareholders pursuant to the Shareholders Protection Act and, to the extent so approved, shall have the same voting rights as other shares of the same class or series.

Id.

vi. HAW. REV. STAT. § 414E-2(b) (LexisNexis 2008) ("All shares acquired by an acquiring person in violation of subsection (e) shall be denied voting rights for one year after acquisition.").

vii. See Chart. For an example, see MISS. CODE ANN. § 79-27-7(2)–(3) (2013), which reads:

> (2) Subject to subsections (3) through (5) of this section, the voting power of control shares having voting power of one-> fifth (1/5) or more of all voting power is reduced to zero unless the shareholders of the issuing public corporation approve a resolution pursuant to the procedure set forth in Section 79-27-9 according the shares the same voting rights as they had before they became control shares.

> (3) Except as provided in Section 79-27-9(6), the voting power of control shares representing voting power of less than one-fifth (1/5) of all voting power is not affected by this chapter.

Id. For another example, see OKLA. STAT. ANN. § 18-1149(1)–(2) (West 2012), which states:

> (1) Subject to the provisions of paragraphs 2 through 4 of this section, the voting power of control shares having voting power of one-fifth (1/5) or more of all voting power is reduced to zero unless the shareholders of the issuing public corporation approve a resolution pursuant to the procedure set forth in Section 1153 of this title according the shares the same voting rights as they had before they became control shares.
> (2) Except as provided in subsection A of Section 1153 of this title, the voting power of control shares representing voting power of less than one-fifth (1/5) of all voting power is not affected by Sections 1145 through 1155 of this title.

Id.

viii. WIS. STAT. § 180.1150(2) (Westlaw through 2015 Act 392) ("Unless otherwise provided in the articles of incorporation of a resident domestic corporation or otherwise specified by the board of directors of the resident domestic corporation in accordance with s. 180.0824(3), and except as provided in sub. (3) or as restored under sub. (5), the voting power of shares of a resident domestic corporation held by any person, including shares issuable upon conversion of convertible securities or upon exercise of options or warrants, in excess of 20% of the voting power in the election of directors shall be limited to 10% of the full voting power of those shares.").

ix. OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 1701.831(E)(1) (LexisNexis 2009) ("The shareholders of the issuing public corporation who hold shares as of the record date of such corporation entitling them to vote in the election of directors authorize the acquisition at the special meeting held for that purpose at which a quorum is present by an affirmative vote of a majority of the voting power of such corporation in the election of directors represented at the meeting in person or by proxy, and a majority of the portion of the voting power excluding the voting power of interested shares represented at the meeting in person or by proxy. A quorum shall be deemed to be present at the special meeting if at least a majority of the voting power of the issuing public corporation in the election of directors is represented at the meeting in person or by proxy.").

x. See infra Chart.

xi. See id.

xii. See id.

xiii. WIS. STAT. § 180.1150(5)(c) (Westlaw through 2015 Act 392) ("Regular voting power is restored if at the meeting called under par. (a) at which a quorum is present a majority of the voting power of shares represented at the meeting and entitled to vote on the subject matter approve the resolution.").

xiv. ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 10-2721 (2013).

xv. Id.

xvi. Id. § 10-2725.

xvii. Id.

xviii. Id. § 10-2725(B) (excluding shares owned by any director, not a director which is also an employee).

xix. FLA. STAT. § 607.0902(5) (2016).

xx. Id.

xxi. Id. § 607.0902(5)(a).

xxii. Id. § 607.0902(9)(b).

xxiii. Id. § 607.0902(3).

xxiv. HAW. REV. STAT. ANN. § 414E-2 (LexisNexis 2008).

xxv. Id.

xxvi. Id. § 414E-2(b).

xxvii. Id. § 414E-2(e).

xxviii. Id. § (stating that only the acquirers' shares are considered interested).

xxix. IDAHO CODE § 30-1603 (2013).

xxx. Id.

xxxi. Id. § 30-1607.

xxxii. Id.

xxxiii. Id. § 30-1601(11) (excluding shares owned by any director, not a director which is also an employee).

xxxiv. IND. CODE ANN. § 23-1-42-5 (LexisNexis 2010).

xxxv. Id.

xxxvi. Id. § 23-1-42-9.

xxxvii. Id.

xxxviii. Id. § 23-1-42-3.

xxxix. KAN. STAT. ANN. § 17-1290 (2007).

xl. Id.

xli. Id. § 17-1294.

xlii. Id.

xliii. Id. § 17-1288.

xliv. MD. CODE ANN., CORPS. & ASS'NS § 3-702 (Westlaw through all legislation from the 2016 Regular Session of the General Assembly).

xlv. Id.

xlvi. Id.

xlvii. Id.

xlviii. Id. § 3-701(g) (Westlaw).

xlix. MASS. GEN. LAWS ANN. ch.110D, § 2 (West 2011).

l. Id.

li. Id. § 5.
lii. Id.
liii. Id. § 1(d).
liv. MINN. STAT. ANN. § 302A.671 (West 2011).
lv. Id.
lvi. Id.
lvii. Id.
lviii. Id. § 302A.011(42).
lix. MISS. CODE ANN. § 79-27-7 (2013).
lx. Id.
lxi. Id. § 79-27-9.
lxii. Id.
lxiii. Id. § 79-27-5(f).
lxiv. MO. REV. STAT. § 351.407.1 (2001).
lxv. Id.
lxvi. Id. § 351.407.5.
lxvii. Id.
lxviii. Id. § 351.015(9).
lxix. NEB. REV. STAT. § 21-2453 (2012).
lxx. Id.
lxxi. Id. § 21-2451.
lxxii. Id.
lxxiii. Id. § 21-2441 ("Interested shares shall mean the voting stock of an issuing public corporation owned by an acquiring person.").
lxxiv. NEV. REV. STAT. ANN. § 78.378 (LexisNexis 2010).
lxxv. Id.
lxxvi. Id. § 78.379.
lxxvii. Id. § 78.3791.
lxxviii. Id. § 78.3787 (including an acquirer, an officer or director, or an employee of the target).
lxxix. N.C. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 55-9A-09 (West, Westlaw through Chapters 93, 95 to 101 of the 2016 Regular Session of the General Assembly, pending changes received from the Revisor of Statutes).
lxxx. Id.
lxxxi. Id. § 55-9A-05 (Westlaw).
lxxxii. Id.
lxxxiii. Id. § 55-9A-01(b)(4) (Westlaw).
lxxxiv. OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 1701.831 (LexisNexis 2009).
lxxxv. Id.
lxxxvi. Id.
lxxxvii. Id.
lxxxviii. Only the acquirers' shares are considered interested. See id. § 1701.831(E)(2). lxxxix. OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 18, § 1148 (West 2012).
xc. Id.
xci. Id. tit. 18, § 1149.

xcii. Id. tit. 18, § 1153. xciii. Id. tit. 18, § 1147.
xciv. OR. REV. STAT. § 60.804 (2011).
xcv. Id.
xcvi. Id. § 60.807.
xcvii. Id.
xcviii. Id. § 60.801(7).
xcix. 15 PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. § 2561(a) (West 2013).
c. Id. § 2561(b).
ci. Id. § 2564(a).
cii. Id. § 2564.
ciii. See id. §§ 2562, 2564(a) (allowing only disinterested shares to vote).
civ. S.C. CODE ANN. § 35-2-105 (West, Westlaw through 2016 session, subject to technical revisions by the Code Commissioner as authorized by law before official publication).
cv. Id.
cvi. Id. § 35-2-109(a) (Westlaw).
cvii. Id. § 35-2-109(b)(2) (Westlaw).
cviii. Id. § 35-2-103(A) (Westlaw).
cix. S.D. CODIFIED LAWS § 47-33-17 (2007).
cx. Id. § 47-33-19(1)(a).
cxi. Id. § 47-33-12.
cxii. Id.
cxiii. Id. § 47-33-3(1)(r).
cxiv. TENN. CODE ANN. § 48-103-310 (2002).
cxv. Id.
cxvi. Id. § 48-103-303.
cxvii. Id. § 48-103-307.
cxviii. Id. § 48-103-302(6).
cxix. UTAH CODE ANN. §§ 61-6-6, -10 (West, Westlaw through 2016 Third Special Session).
cxx. Id. § 61-6-6 (Westlaw).
cxxi. Id. § 61-6-10 (Westlaw).
cxxii. Id.
cxxiii. Id. § 61-6-4 (Westlaw).
cxxiv. VA. CODE ANN. § 13.1-728.2 (2011).
cxxv. Id.
cxxvi. Id. § 13.1-728.3.
cxxvii. Id.
cxxviii. Id. § 13.1-728.1 (referring specifically to the definition of "interested shares").
cxxix. WIS. STAT. ANN. § 180.1150(2) (West, Westlaw through 2015 Act 392, published 4/27/2016).
cxxx. Id.
cxxxi. Id.
cxxxii. Id. § 180.1150(5)(c) (Westlaw).

cxxxiii. Id. § 180.1150(2) (Westlaw).
cxxxiv. WYO. STAT. ANN. § 17-18-309(a) (2013).
cxxxv. Id. § 17-18-309(b).
cxxxvi. Id. §§ 17-18-302(a), -306.
cxxxvii. Id. § 17-18-306(b).
cxxxviii. Id. § 17-18-301(a)(iv).

"To Return the Funds at All": Global Anticorruption, Forfeiture, and Legal Frameworks for Asset Return

PABLO J. DAVIS*

I. INTRODUCTION 292
II. THE US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE'S KLEPTOCRACY INITIATIVE 297
A. An Overview 297
1. Normative Overview..299
2. Jurisdictional Overview 300
3. Conceptual or Semiotic Mapping 306
4. Institutional/Prosecutorial Overview 310
B. Legal Authorities 311
1. U.S. Federal Statutory Framework 312
2. Complementary International or Foreign Legal Frameworks..317
C. Three Representative USDOJ-KI Prosecutions 321
1. Nigeria: Oil Riches in Africa's Giant 322
2. Kazakhstan: Oil and Power in Post-Soviet Central Asia..324
3. Equatorial Guinea: Paradise and Plunder on the Rio Muni 327
D. USDOJ-KI: Strengths and Weaknesses 330
III. RETURN OF ILL-GOTTEN ASSETS: POSSIBLE ANALOGUES......335
A. Deodand 336
B. Piracy 338
C. Customs Offenses 340
D. Forfeiture of Estate 342
E. Criminal Forfeiture 344
F. Seizure of Stolen Property as Evidence..345
G. Civil Asset (or In Rem) Forfeiture 346
H. Constructive Trust..349
IV. "FOUR R'S" IN A CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST FRAMEWORK..........350
V. CONCLUSION 355

I. INTRODUCTION

Down went the U.S. district judge's gavel—and a home valued at nearly three quarters of a million dollars in the Maryland suburbs of Washington, D.C., no longer belonged to the Honorable Diepreye Solomon Peter Alamieyeseigha ("DSP"), former governor of oil-rich Bayelsa State in Nigeria.[1] The court held that full legal title to that residence passed to the United States Government ("USG").[2] In another courtroom, down went the gavel of another district judge, who ordered over $115 million in a frozen Swiss bank account belonging to the Government of Kazakhstan to be disbursed to an independent foundation to benefit the people of that country.[3] In yet another courtroom, down went the gavel, and Teodoro Nguema Obiang ("Teodorín"), son of the president of Equatorial Guinea and holder of the office of "second vice president," agreed to the USG's seizure of a set of life-sized Michael Jackson statues originally from the entertainer's Neverland Ranch, their sale at auction, and the depositing of the proceeds into a USG account where they would become fully vested property of the United States.[4]

---

* Juris Doctor Candidate, The University of Memphis, Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law, May 2017; Symposium Editor, The University of Memphis Law Review, Volume 47; Ph.D., History, The Johns Hopkins University; M.A., History, The Johns Hopkins University; M.A., History, Columbia University; B.A. cum laude, History, University of Maryland-College Park. This Note benefited immeasurably from Mary Katherine Smith's insight and encouragement, and from Prof. Boris N. Mamlyuk's doctrinal and intellectual guidance. It was my privilege to work with them. The shortcomings that remain are, of course, entirely my own. The topic of this Note is rapidly evolving; the Note is current through Nov. 8, 2016.

1. DOJ 13-628 (2013), 2013 WL 2366183; DSP Alamieyeseigha Steals $700,000 Bayelsa State Money, NIGERIA STANDARD (June 19, 2013), http://nigeriastandardnewspaper.com/ng/fugitive-dsp-alamieyeseigha-steals-700000-bayelsa-state-money-united-states-govt-says-ex-gov-used-corruption-proceeds-to-purchase-properties-in-america-accumu/.

2. DOJ 13-628, supra note 1.

3. DOJ 15-1509 (2015), 2015 WL 8289228.

4. Stipulation and Settlement Agreement at 15–19, United States v. One Michael Jackson Signed Thriller Jacket and Other Michael Jackson Memorabilia, No. CV 13-9169-GW-SS, (C.D. Cal. 2014); Julia Edwards, Equatorial Guinea VP Loses Michael Jackson Statues in U.S. Settlement, REUTERS (Oct. 10,

These seemingly disparate cases, involving a former governor, a national government, and a vice-president who was also the son of a head of state, led to loss of title to real estate and cash and other personal property. None included a criminal conviction. All were outcomes of prosecutions brought by the U.S. Department of Justice ("USDOJ") as part of a new venture, the Kleptocracy Asset Recovery Initiative ("Kleptocracy Initiative," "USDOJ-KI," or "KI").[5]

What exactly is the Kleptocracy Initiative? It can best be viewed as a policy initiative and ongoing program of prosecutorial activity operating within the Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section ("AFMLS") of the USDOJ's Criminal Division since July 2010.[6] Its stated objectives are "to identify the proceeds of foreign official corruption, forfeit them, and repatriate the recouped funds for the benefit of the people harmed."[7] The typical target is a prominent public official or ex-official or a close relative—"politically exposed persons" in international anticorruption parlance.[8] The chief methodology for prosecutions begins with intensive investigation, almost always jointly with the FBI or other 2014, 4:39 PM), http://www.reuters.com/article/us-usa-equatorial-idUSKCN0HZ1TA20141010. Regarding vesting of full title to the property in the USG, see infra note 240.

---

5. See Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section, U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE, https://www.justice.gov/criminal-afmls (last visited Nov. 12, 2016).

6. That the KI procedurally effectuates civil forfeiture, yet is housed in the USDOJ's Criminal Division, highlights the actual hybrid nature of the civil-criminal-administrative forfeiture regime in operation. One of the main objectives of this Note is to problematize this apparent tension from an American legal realist perspective, seeking to reconcile the KI "law on the books" with the KI's "law in action." THE CANON OF AMERICAN LEGAL THOUGHT Part I (David Kennedy & William W. Fisher III, eds., 2006).

7. Lanny Breuer, Assistant Attorney General, Address at the Franz-Hermann Brüner Memorial Lecture at the World Bank (May 25, 2011) (transcript available at http://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/assistant-attorney-general-lanny-breuer-criminal-division-speaks-franz-hermann-br-ner). For an overview of mechanisms available to USDOJ prosecutors under the Kleptocracy Initiative, see U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE & U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, U.S. ASSET RECOVERY TOOLS AND PROCEDURES: A PRACTICAL GUIDE FOR INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION (2012) [hereinafter ASSET RECOVERY TOOLS], http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/190690.pdf.

8. THEODORE S. GREENBERG ET AL., POLITICALLY EXPOSED PERSONS 25 (2010), http://star.worldbank.org/star/publication/politically-exposed-persons.

federal agency, and often in cooperation with a foreign investigative body.[9] Next comes identification of assets within the U.S. believed to be proceeds of foreign corruption. This lays the groundwork for a federal in rem civil forfeiture action. Procedurally, the main basis for these prosecutions is the federal civil asset forfeiture statute, 18 U.S.C. Section 981; the typical substantive legal foundation is based on the money laundering statutes, 18 U.S.C. Sections 1956 and 1957.[10]

Successfully forfeited assets then become USG property.[11] The forfeiture of over $1 million in assets from DSP was its first success, but it is far from the largest prize netted by the USDOJ-KI. In its biggest monetary seizure to date, the Kleptocracy Initiative forfeited over $458 million in funds traceable to General Sani Abacha, Nigeria's de facto ruler for much of the 1990s and of whose regime DSP was an ally.[12] Other successful forfeitures have ranged from the hundreds of thousands of dollars to over $100 million.[13]

The Kleptocracy Initiative, then, is an attempt to systematize and institutionalize an innovative, hybrid practice in which the USG asserts jurisdiction over property located within the United States,[14] but the underlying criminal activity giving rise to the civil asset forfeiture proceedings occurred outside of the United States. Thus, USDOJ-KI seems to embody the vigorous exercise of a novel form of extraterritoriality—where enforcement is hyper-local,

9. ASSET RECOVERY TOOLS, supra note 7, at 3–5.

10. See id.

11. See infra note 240 and corresponding text.

12. DOJ 14-230 (2014), 2014 WL 844298. In an even larger action, the USDOJ recently announced the filing of civil forfeiture complaints against Malaysian officials alleged to have embezzled over three billion dollars in funds from the 1Malaysia Development Berhad, an economic-development entity of the Government of Malaysia; the complaints sought the forfeiture of over one billion dollars laundered. DOJ 16-839 (2016), 2016 WL 3913897.

13. See DOJ 14-1114 (2014), 2014 WL 5073696; DOJ 15-1509 (2015), 2015 WL 8289228; DOJ 15-266 (2015), 2015 WL 910102.

14. As the procedural posture in the Kazakhstan case study shows, the assets are not always located in the United States; there, the assets were frozen by Swiss authorities in Swiss banks, presumably following an exercise of "mutual legal assistance" on anticorruption matters between U.S. and Swiss law enforcement. See DOJ 15-1509, supra note 3; see also infra note 34.

but the underlying offense was committed abroad.[15] Due to its procedural framework, it also represents the transnational side of the dramatically growing practice of domestic civil asset forfeiture. It stands squarely within the international legal movement, also of the past two decades, to go beyond the "supply side" of international corruption as addressed by the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977 to pursue the "demand side"—those on the receiving end of bribes and other forms of corruption.[16]

What happens to the forfeited assets? The Initiative's ultimate objective, often declared, is to return such funds to the people from whom they were stolen.[17] The Initiative's first chief, Jennifer Shasky,[18] was quoted in 2011 as saying "there is no legal requirement to return the funds at all . . . . Nonetheless, we are committed to working to [find] ways to repatriate or otherwise use the funds for [the] benefit [of] the people of a victim country."[19] The

15. For an excellent overview of issues raised by expanding extraterritorial enforcement, see Andreas F. Lowenfeld, U.S. Law Enforcement Abroad: The Constitution and International Law, 83 AM. J. INT'L L. 880 (1989).

16. See infra notes 25–26 and corresponding text.

17. Lanny A. Breuer, Assistant Attorney General, Keynote Address at Money Laundering Enforcement Conference (Oct. 19, 2010), (transcript available at https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/assistant-attorney-general-lanny-breuer-delivers-keynote-address-money-laundering).

18. Now Jennifer Shasky Calvery. Ms. Shasky Calvery spent fifteen years with the USDOJ, including, approximately two as the inaugural head of the Kleptocracy Asset Recovery Initiative; she left in 2012 to become Director of the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network (FinCEN) in the Department of the Treasury—her position at the time of this writing. DEP'T OF THE TREASURY, FIN. CRIMES ENF'T NETWORK, https://www.fincen.gov/about_fincen/pdf/bio_director.pdf (last visited Nov. 12, 2016).

19. Christopher M. Matthews, Fledgling Kleptocracy Initiative Faces Challenges, Expectations, JUST ANTI-CORRUPTION: FOREIGN CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT NEWS (Sep. 19, 2011 11:36 AM), https://web.archive.org/web/20151122051202/http://www.mainjustice.com/justanticorruption/2011/09/19/fledgling-kleptocracy-initiative-face-challenges-expectations/. Shasky's phrasing furnishes the opening part of the title of this Note. Alexander W. Sierck, an attorney representing the Socio-Economic Rights and Accountability Project (SERAP) of Nigeria, paraphrases Ms. Shasky's statement as follows:

> SERAP notes that in a September 19, 2011 interview with the Main Justice blog, Jennifer Shasky, speaking on behalf of the Department's Kleptocracy Initiative, stated that: [t]he De-USDOJ's practice handbook for asset recovery itself devotes a single paragraph to repatriation or other post-forfeiture remedies.[20] In light of this, the robust statutory underpinnings for USDOJ-KI investigation, pursuit, and forfeiture of corruptly-acquired assets appear asymmetrical with the basically voluntary and discretionary nature of post-forfeiture disposition. Put differently, there is a solid legal framework for the Initiative's means (seizure of assets) but not for its stated policy ends (return of assets).

This Note, in attempting to understand and address that tension, essays a preliminary mapping of forfeiture and return of assets in the global anticorruption context. In support of the Initiative's goals of denying kleptocrats a safe haven for their ill-gotten gains, punishing past and deterring future kleptocratic conduct, and, especially, returning assets to populations blighted by corruption, this Note will explore the novel, hybrid nature of actions brought under the Kleptocracy Initiative and potential ways to bridge the current statutory gap.

The Note will proceed in five parts. Part II examines the origins and operation of the Kleptocracy Initiative, the legal authorities under which its prosecutions unfold, some representative prosecutions, and a preliminary assessment of the Initiative. Part III presents a series of possible analogues for the return of ill-gotten assets, exploring the potential of each as a conceptual model for bridging the gap between forfeiture and return. Part IV sketches a possible statutory framework for the disposition of forfeited assets consisting of "four R's"— repatriation, restitution, repara> partment has no [legal] obligation to repatriate assets subject to civil forfeiture, but that [t]he Department is committed to finding ways to repatriate or otherwise use such funds for the benefit of the victim country.

---

Letter from Alexander Sierck & Nicholai Diamond to Eric Holder, Jr., Attorney General (Mar. 18, 2014), https://www.icij.org/sites/icij/files/content/letter_to_attorney_general_holder_on_behalf_of_serap.pdf.

20. ASSET RECOVERY TOOLS, supra note 7 at 10. 18 U.S.C. § 981(i)(1) gives the Attorney General or the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion to transfer forfeited assets "to any foreign country which participated . . . in the . . . forfeiture of the property." 18 U.S.C. § 981(i)(1) (2013). Notably, the agreement of the Secretary of State is required, and such a decision to transfer is not subject to review. Id.

tions, and reimbursement—within a "derivative constructive trust" framework. Part V offers some brief concluding reflections.

II. The US Department of Justice's Kleptocracy Initiative

A. An Overview

Over nearly a half century, corruption has become a major target of both national and transnational legal regimes, with considerable growth since the turn of the 21st century.[21] Traditionally, the history of operational global anticorruption efforts begins with the U.S. Congress's enactment of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act[22] ("FCPA") in 1977, after nearly a decade of revelations of widespread bribe payments from U.S. corporations to governments and officials in countries where the corporations conducted or sought to do business.[23] Of course, the USG had prosecuted numerous corruption cases prior to the enactment of the FCPA, but the FCPA's passage did signal a watershed moment in global anticorruption efforts—not least because it elevated the rhetoric and suggested an end to impunity. The FCPA was, and remains, fraught with limitations, the most notorious of which is the "facilitating payments" exception.[24] A larger limitation is the statute's

---

21. Elena Helmer & Stuart H. Deming, Non-Governmental Organizations: Anticorruption Compliance Challenges and Risks, 45 INT'L LAW. 597, 598 (2011) ("Over the course of the past decade, enforcement of the anti-bribery provisions of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA), prohibiting the bribery of foreign officials, has experienced tremendous growth.") (citations omitted).

22. 15 U.S.C. § 78dd–1, et seq. (2013).

23. See U.S. SEC. AND EXCHANGE COMM'N, REPORT OF THE SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION ON QUESTIONABLE AND ILLEGAL CORPORATE PAYMENTS AND PRACTICES (1976), https://www.sec.gov/spotlight/fcpa/sec-report-questionable-illegal-corporate-payments-practices-1976.pdf.

24. This provision, also known as the "grease payment" exception, has since the 1988 FCPA amendment been located in 15 U.S.C. § 78dd–1(b), which reads:

> Subsections (a) and (g) of this section shall not apply to any facilitating or expediting payment to a foreign official, political party, or party official the purpose of which is to expedite or to secure the performance of a routine governmental action by a foreign official, political party, or party official.

15 U.S.C. § 78dd–1(b) (2013). Thus, a corporate gift to a cabinet minister in an attempt to win a government contract would be criminalized by the FCPA. In contrast, a small payment to speed up issuance of a driver's license probably deliberate failure to reach the conduct of those on the receiving end of bribery, a gap symbolized by the Fifth Circuit case of United States v. Castle.[25] The Castle court held "foreign officials may not be prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. § 371 for conspiring to violate the FCPA."[26] would not be. However, even the sort of conduct that falls within the FCPA carve-out is sternly criticized by one critic:

---

> [T]he demand for "grease payments" suggests a willingness on the part of a public official (agent) to withhold or delay services which the public (government representing people as the principal) has mandated to be provided without discrimination. Thus, the act of extortion creates injury to the extent that services are withheld or delayed.

Niles C. Logue, Cultural Relativism or Ethical Imperialism? Dealing with Bribery Across Cultures, at 13 n.20 (2005), http://www.cbfa.org/Logue.pdf. The "grease payments" exception has come under increasing fire, and the OECD has formally asked Congress to repeal it. OECD Calls for an End to Facilitating Payments Exception, JONESDAY (Dec., 2009), http://www.jonesday.com/oecd_calls/. At the other extreme, President-Elect Donald Trump has called the FCPA a "horrible law" that puts U.S. companies at a competitive disadvantage and urged its repeal. Ed Silverstein, Donald Trump Has Called the FCPA a "Horrible" Law, INSIDECOUNSEL (Aug. 17, 2015), http://www.insidecounsel.com/2015/08/17/donald-trump-has-called-the-fcpa-a-horrible-law.

25. United States v. Castle, 925 F.2d 831 (5th Cir. 1991).

26. Id. 18 U.S.C. § 371 is the general criminal statute covering conspiracy against the United States. Comparing the FCPA with the Mann Act, also known as the White-Slave Trade Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2421–2424, originally enacted in 1910 and criminalizing the transportation of people across state lines for prostitution or sex crimes, the Castle court held:

> Congress intended in both the FCPA and the Mann Act to deter and punish certain activities which necessarily involved the agreement of at least two people, but Congress chose in both statutes to punish only one party to the agreement. In Gebardi the Supreme Court refused to disregard Congress' intention to exempt one party by allowing the Executive to prosecute that party under the general conspiracy statute for precisely the same conduct. Congress made the same choice in drafting the FCPA, and by the same analysis, this Court may not allow the Executive to override the Congressional intent not to prosecute foreign officials for their participation in the prohibited acts.

Id. at 833 (referencing Gebardi v. United States, 287 U.S. 112 (1932)). Regarding the better-known carve-out in the FCPA for "facilitating payments," see supra note 24 and corresponding text.

1. Normative Overview

In an increasingly globalized world, awareness of the asymmetry of prosecuting only one side of the bribery transaction continues to grow among both policymakers and the public. Decades of the war on drugs and the post-9/11/2001 focus on international terrorism have led to a growing focus on the role of illicit international transfers of funds. Under President George W. Bush, foreign public corruption began to receive prominent attention as a criminal and economic matter—but also one with major national-security implications. In 2004, Presidential Proclamation 7750 addressed corruption in relation to immigration, giving the president the power to bar entry into the country of individual corrupt aliens or classes of corrupt aliens in order to protect national security.[27] Two years later, the Bush Administration announced that battling ¨large-scale corruption by high-level foreign public officials and target[ing] the fruits of their ill-gotten gains"[28] was part of "our freedom agenda" and of a "National Strategy to Internationalize Efforts Against Kleptocracy."[29]

A decade into the twenty-first century, under the presidential administration of Barack Obama, the battle against foreign corruption had assumed pride of place as a national policy concern. Even before his presidency, then-Senator Obama framed the issue as central. "The struggle against corruption," he said in an address in Kenya, "is one of the great struggles of our time."[30] During the first year of the Obama Administration, Attorney General Eric Holder cast the worldwide anticorruption fight as a matter of human rights and welfare: "When kleptocrats loot their nations'

---

27. Proclamation No. 7750, 69 Fed. Reg. 2287 (Jan. 12, 2004).

28. Fact Sheet: National Strategy to Internationalize Efforts Against Kleptocracy (Aug. 10, 2006), https://georgewbush-whitehouse.archives.gov/news/releases/2006/08/text/20060810-1.html.

29. President's Statement on Kleptocracy (Aug. 10, 2006), https://georgewbush-whitehouse.archives.gov/news/releases/2006/08/text/20060810.html.

30. President Barack Obama, An Honest Government, A Hopeful Future (August 28, 2006), http://obamaspeeches.com/088-An-Honest-Government-A-Hopeful-Future-Obama-Speech.htm.

treasuries, steal natural resources, and embezzle development aid, they condemn their nations' children to starvation and disease."[31]

2. Jurisdictional Overview

The normative genesis of the Kleptocracy Initiative can be discerned in Attorney General Holder's vision of bribe-takers dooming children to the scourges of poverty,[32] or in presidential pronouncements framing corruption in national security terms, but what is the KI's jurisdictional basis? The answer is not completely clear. In its most distilled form, KI jurisdiction appears to be basic in rem. U.S. courts have held that, even if a financial transaction's origin and ultimate destination are both outside the United States, the fact that the funds pass through any part of the U.S. financial system is enough to satisfy the jurisdictional aspects of the money laundering statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1956(a)(2).[33] Thus, the vigorous assertion of extraterritoriality in foreign-corruption-based civil forfeiture actions under the Kleptocracy Initiative is based, in part, on what might be termed a sort of "tag" jurisdiction over the assets—once assets "set foot in" the U.S. financial system, even if immediately transferred abroad, they fall within the scope of 18 U.S.C. § 981.[34] Surveying broader bases of jurisdiction under customary 31. Attorney General Eric Holder, Address to the Opening Plenary of the VI Ministerial Global Forum on Fighting Corruption and Safeguarding Integrity (Nov. 7, 2009) [hereinafter Address to the Opening Plenary of the VI Ministerial Global Forum on Fighting Corruption and Safeguarding Integrity], http://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/attorney-general-eric-holder-opening-plenary-vi-ministerial-global-forum-fighting.

32. Id.

33. United States v. All Assets Held at Bank Julius Baer & Co., 571 F. Supp. 2d 1, 13 (D.D.C. 2008). The main actor in the case, which has still not reached its conclusion, is Pavlo Lazarenko, former prime minister of Ukraine; see also United States v. All Assets Held in Account Number XXXXXXXX, 83 F. Supp. 3d 360, 368 (D.D.C. 2015) ("Use of the United States banking system . . . provides sufficient contact between property and the United States for a civil forfeiture action in rem.") (emphasis added).

34. See All Assets Held at Bank Julius Baer, 571 F. Supp. 2d at 13. The court rejected the argument that when a fund transfer originated in Poland, then went to a U.S. financial institution only as a brief intermediate stop, and from there went to Switzerland, the transfer should be viewed as a single Poland-to-Switzerland transfer. Rather, "[w]ith each EFT [electronic funds transfer] at least two separate transactions occurred: first, funds moved from the originating and conventional international law, one could make a number of other arguments in support of prescriptive, adjudicative, and enforcement jurisdiction in anticorruption cases.[35]

The most settled form of jurisdiction, based on nationality, posits that the U.S. can seize assets of individuals who are "citizens of the United States or domiciled therein" through an appropriate exercise of judicial fiat.[36] These principles were elaborated in a case that arose from Teapot Dome, the biggest American political scandal before Watergate. There, one Harry M. Blackmer bribed Albert Fall, then-Secretary of the Interior, to convey leaseholds over USG land in Wyoming and California to private oil companies without competitive bidding.[37] The Interior Secretary's bank to the intermediary bank; then the intermediary bank was to transfer the funds to the destination bank . . . . While the two transactions can occur almost instantaneously, sometimes they are separated by several days." Id. (quoting United States v. Daccarett, 6 F.3d 37, 54 (2d Cir. 1993)). The Daccarett court cited 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(1)(A). It can be inferred from the district court's holding in All Assets Held at Bank Julius Baer that the "several days" language was only meant to underline the fact that each transaction was separate and distinct, and would still be so even where funds were in the U.S. intermediary institution only for a few seconds.

---

35. See RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF FOREIGN RELATIONS LAW §§ 402–04 (1987) (hereinafter "R3FR"); UNITED NATIONS, OFFICE ON DRUGS AND CRIME, UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION AGAINST CORRUPTION 28 art. 42 (2004), https://www.unodc.org/documents/treaties/UNCAC/Publications/Convention/08-50026_E.pdf. United Nations Convention Against Corruption permits jurisdiction for the following: Article 42(1)(a) (if corruption or money-laundering offenses occurred on the territory of a state party); Article 42(2) (if corruption "offense is committed against a national of that State Party") (emphasis added); Article 42(2)(d) (if corruption is committed "against the State Party") (emphasis added); Article 42(6) (permitting residual jurisdiction: "Without prejudice to norms of general international law, this Convention shall not exclude the exercise of any criminal jurisdiction established by a State Party in accordance with its domestic law.").

36. See, e.g., Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421, 434 (1932); see also Hans Smit, International Aspects of Federal Civil Procedure, 61 COLUM. L. REV. 1031, 1048–49 (1961) (discussing whether an alien's residence or domicile in the U.S. provides a reasonable basis for the assertion of legislative jurisdiction with regard to an act committed outside the United States); R3FR § 402 (Nationality).

37. See Phil Roberts, The Teapot Dome Scandal, WYOHISTORY.ORG, http://www.wyohistory.org/encyclopedia/teapot-dome-scandal (last visited Nov. 13, 2016).

fall from grace resulted in prison time, while Blackmer fled to Paris with ten million dollars and a Norwegian opera singer paramour, continuing to challenge the legality of subpoenas and asset seizure orders against him.[38] The Court held that, following a contempt order, a court "may direct that property belonging to a witness and within the United States may be seized and held to satisfy any judgment which may be rendered against him in the proceeding."[39] So long as reasonable notice was provided to the property owner, jurisdiction in personam was proper even though the individual never appeared in court.[40]

In the contemporary view that poverty, corruption, and even climate change can act as powerful destabilizing forces,[41] the evocation of images of dying children also points to a strong, if implicit, assertion of jurisdiction based on a vicarious and inchoate "protective principle."[42] Further, under the "objective territorial

---

38. Blackmer, from Paris Refuge, Sues to Void $60,000 Teapot Fine, CHICAGO DAILY TRIB., September 3, 1930, at 8.

39. Blackmer, 284 U.S. at 435–36.

40. Id. at 439 ("The efficacy of an attempt to provide constructive service in this country would rest upon the presumption that the notice would be given in a manner calculated to reach the witness abroad."). The Court upheld a lower court order of $60,000 in fines ($30,000 in each of two cases) and seizure of assets to pay those fines even in the owner's absence. Id. at 443. The Blackmer saga stretched on for decades. In 1942, after the revocation of his U.S. passport and indictment on various counts, including income tax evasion and perjury, a "ghost fund" of $10,000,000 in cash and securities was discovered in New York banks and seized by the Office of Foreign Funds Control of the Treasury Department. Freeze Fortune of Teapot Dome Trial Fugitive: Reveal Blackmer Holds $10,000,000 in U.S. CHICAGO DAILY TRIB., June 23, 1942, at 8, ("The freezing order, which was issued [by the Secretary of the Treasury] on the theory that Blackmer is a 'national' of France altho [sic] a United States citizen, means that the accounts cannot be drawn on without [T]reasury permission.").

41. See, e.g., THE WHITE HOUSE, NATIONAL SECURITY STRATEGY 12 (2015), https://www.whitehouse.gov/sites/default/files/docs/2015_national_security_strategy.pdf ("Climate change is an urgent and growing threat to our national security, contributing to increased natural disasters, refugee flows, and conflicts over basic resources like food and water."). See also infra notes 98–99.

42. U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan, speaking of the "evil" of corruption, raised the specter of its pernicious effects on human rights and its spreading of misery among developing populations; these pronouncements dovetail with the U.S. invocation of the duty to protect. See infra note 96 and accompanying principle," closely linked to the "substantial effects" doctrine, if the corrupt behavior by foreign officials can be said to negatively affect U.S. interests, then jurisdiction may be proper.[43] Lastly, it is even conceivable that universality principles[44] can serve as a basis for KI enforcement: that is, corruption anywhere is a threat to the rule of law everywhere. For all of the linking of the anticorruption movement to national security (via the argument that international money laundering is a key financing mechanism for terrorism) and to substantial-effects arguments (the destabilizing impact of money laundering of corrupt assets on the U.S. financial and monetary systems, on the one hand, and the furtherance of crime through such mechanisms, on the other), ultimately the invocation of a hybrid "duty to protect" seems the most compelling argument for the Initiative—particularly in light of the broadly protective argumentative frames wielded by the past two U.S. presidential administrations.[45]

The jurisdictional themes raised above—including judicial fiat, extraterritoriality, and various inchoate "protective" justifications—inform and constrain the actual operational reach of the KI. Yet if the KI's goal is to strengthen and/or harmonize the doctrinal and normative link between anticorruption enforcement and related global law enforcement aims like combating terrorism, tax evasion, and money laundering, then the USDOJ must be mindful of the text; see also supra note 31; R3FR §§ 402–404 (setting forth bases of jurisdiction under customary international law).

---

43. See United States v. Yousef, 327 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2003); see also Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. California, 509 U.S. 764 (1993) (holding that extraterritorial jurisdiction under antitrust law applies where the conduct by a foreign actor in foreign territory had substantial effects on the territory of the United States.).

44. See Curtis A. Bradley, Universal Jurisdiction and U.S. Law, 2001 U. CHI. LEGAL F. 323 (2001).

45. Assistant Attorney General Leslie Caldwell termed U.S. anticorruption work "not a service . . . to the global community, but rather . . . enforcement action to protect our own national security interests . . . ." Leslie R. Caldwell, Assistant Att'y Gen., Address at Duke University School of Law (Oct. 23, 2014) https://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/assistant-attorney-general-leslie-r-caldwell-speaks-duke-university-school-law. The core argument seems to be: corruption weakens and destabilizes states, making them breeding grounds for terrorism, piracy, and other destabilizing unlawful activity. Id.

optics of selective long-arm reach.[46] We must recall that explicit public announcement of the Kleptocracy Initiative came in July 2010 with Attorney General Holder's address at the African Union Summit in Uganda.[47] It is noteworthy that both the key rhetorical preparation for the Initiative and its actual unveiling occurred where they did—the Initiative's targets have overwhelmingly been in Africa and Asia, and in significant, though lesser, measure in Latin America. Also significantly, the official making both statements was Holder, then head of the USDOJ. Thus, unlike anti-terrorism, which is overwhelmingly framed as a military and intelligence matter—with the asserted need for legal flexibility in addressing these rapidly evolving challenges[48]—anticorruption's

46. "Selective long-arm reach" does not refer solely to the traditional bounds of prosecutorial discretion in individual cases. It also implies an agency's broadly permissive interpretation of its enabling statutes' long arm provisions in certain contexts, alongside far more formalistic, circumspect, and/or limited interpretations of jurisdictional language in related contexts, or as pertaining to certain classes of likely targets of prosecutorial activity in the same context. For example, the KI's enabling statutes do not limit KI's reach solely to foreign officials engaged in foreign corruption. See infra Section II.B.1. In fact, as the "Kazakhgate" prosecution demonstrates, U.S. citizens may be central figures in a given foreign corruption scheme. See infra Section II.C.2. In light of the above, an agency's interpretation and implementation of its enabling statutes in a way that aggressively targets foreign corruption, while simultaneously showing lax enforcement of corrupt domestic actors, may threaten the perceived credibility of the otherwise legitimate foreign-oriented efforts.

47. Attorney General Eric Holder, Address at the African Union Summit (Jul. 25, 2010), http://www.justice.gov/opa/speech/attorney-general-holder-african-union-summit. The program's full, formal name is: Kleptocracy Asset Recovery Initiative. The unveiling of the Kleptocracy Initiative is sometimes dated to November 2009. On November 7, 2009, at the Opening Plenary of the VI Ministerial Global Forum on Fighting Corruption and Safeguarding Integrity in Doha, Qatar, Holder spoke of anticorruption and asset recovery as a major USDOJ priority but did not formally announce the Kleptocracy Initiative. Address to the Opening Plenary of the VI Ministerial Global Forum on Fighting Corruption and Safeguarding Integrity, supra note 31. Assistant Attorney General Lanny Breuer announced the Initiative's first cases targeting Alamieyeseigha in a May 2011 address at the World Bank. Breuer, supra note 7.

48. Of course, anti-terrorism efforts also rest on their own elaborate legal foundations, which continue to proliferate without an apparent overarching policy to harmonize the disparate statutory and enforcement schemes. See, e.g., Jordan J. Paust, Terrorism's Proscription and Core Elements of an Objective Definition, 8 SANTA CLARA J. INT'L L. 51, 54 (2010); Naomi Norbframework seems to be an exclusively legal one. Because of this, clear jurisdictional rules become essential prerequisites for an effective law enforcement mandate.[49] To clarify this jurisdictional scope, the KI must explicitly reach domestic corruption with foreign overtones, including corruption occurring exclusively in "developed" (North–North) contexts;[50] and this will require a far more refined understanding of the principles of concurrent jurisdiction, conflicts jurisprudence, comity, and complementary, all from a erg, Terrorism and International Criminal Justice: Dim Prospects for a Future Together, 8 SANTA CLARA J. INT'L L. 11, 13–14 (2010); Nicolas J. Perry, The Numerous Federal Legal Definitions of Terrorism: The Problem of Too Many Grails, 30 J. LEGIS. 249, 251 (2004).

---

49. The decades-long saga of Blackmer is instructive. In Blackmer, the nationality and in rem bases of jurisdiction bases were far less controversial than the hybrid extraterritoriality underpinning the KI. See supra notes 36–39 and corresponding text. Yet in Blackmer, the jurisdictional fight rose all the way to the Supreme Court. See Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421 (1932). Such jurisdictional challenges in the kleptocracy context could arguably bog down the KI in jurisdictional battles, draining time and resources from investigation, prosecution, forfeiture, and disposition of assets. One can imagine multiple novel due process or jurisdictional challenges to KI asset forfeiture regimes. Without explicit statements of congressional intent, courts could apply any number of canons to limit jurisdictional reach, resulting in dissonance: some courts upholding assertions of jurisdiction and corresponding asset forfeitures, others not. See Morrison v. National Australia Bank Ltd., 561 U.S. 247, 255, 265 (2010) (reaffirming the presumption against extraterritoriality—absent explicit congressional authorization to apply U.S. law abroad, courts will interpret statutes as concerned solely with domestic affairs); E.E.O.C. v. Arabian American Oil Co., 499 U.S. 244, 258 (1991) (reaffirming the presumption against extraterritoriality absent explicit congressional mandate to the contrary); Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 409–11, 439 (1964) (upholding and clarifying the "act of state doctrine" that a U.S. court should not sit in judgment of a foreign state's activities in that state); Murray v. Schooner Charming Betsy, 6 U.S. (2 Cranch) 64, 118 (1804) (holding that conflicts between a domestic statute and international law must be resolved so as to avoid conflicts with international law).

50. A parallel theme can be observed in the ongoing critiques of the International Criminal Court (an international adjudicative body chiefly promoted by the U.S.) prosecutions of predominantly African and other global South ex-leaders. See, e.g., Asaid Kiyani, A TWAIL Critique of the International Criminal Court: Contestations from the Global South, CANADIAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION, https://www.cpsa-acsp.ca/papers-2011/Kiyani.pdf (last visited Nov. 13, 2016).

multi-jurisdictional, comparative perspective—no simple task. However, the payoff of this effort would be commensurately heightened legitimacy, not only for the KI, but also for U.S. law enforcement efforts. Ultimately, the KI's efficacy and legitimacy hinge on implementation of a coherent normative, jurisdictional, and doctrinal vision.

3. Conceptual or Semiotic Mapping

As with its rich plurality of possible jurisdictional bases, the KI exists within, and in relation to, background anticorruption norms that show significant conceptual variability. The choice of "kleptocracy" as an official term for the USDOJ-KI is significant. First, it is a recent neologism.[51] A typical definition: "a government or state in which those in power exploit national resources and steal; rule by a thief or thieves."[52] But its novelty is not the most striking feature of the term "kleptocracy": while the Initiative pursues corruptly-acquired assets of particular individuals whom USDOJ-KI and national leaders often refer to as "kleptocrats," the Initiative's name, semantically, refers to a corrupt system—a State whose very structure is built on systemic theft of public resources.

---

51. "Kleptocracy" was one of six hundred words that debuted in Random House Webster's College Dictionary in 1996. Jennifer M. Hartman, Note, Government by Thieves: Revealing the Monsters Behind the Kleptocratic Masks, 24 SYRACUSE J. INT'L L. & COM. 157, 157 (1997) (citation omitted).

52. Id. The word is of Greek origin and means "rule by thieves." Kleptocracy, ONLINE ETYMOLOGY DICTIONARY, http://www.etymonline.com/ index.php?term=kleptocracy (last visited Nov. 13, 2016); see also -cracy, ONLINE ETYMOLOGY DICTIONARY, http://www.etymonline.com/index. php?term=-cracy&allowed_in_frame=0 (last visited Oct. 20, 2016) (describing the Greek origin of "kratia"); Kleptomania, ONLINE ETYMOLOGY DICTIONARY, http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=kleptomania&allowed_in_frame=0 (last visited Oct. 20, 2016) (discussing the Greek origin of "kleptes"). It has been attested as early as 1819 in Spain. Kleptocracy, supra note 52. "Kleptocrat" is a derivative coinage formed from "kleptocracy," analogous to the back-formation of "bureaucrat" from "bureaucracy."

TABLE 1. CORRUPTION AND KLEPTOCRACY: SELECTED TERMINOLOGY
TERM & DEFINITION	SOURCE
Corruption. "A fiduciary's or official's use of a station or office to procure some benefit either personally or for someone else, contrary to the rights of others; an act carried out with the intent of giving some advantage inconsistent with official duty or the rights of others."	Black's Law Dictionary 423 (10th ed. 2014)
Corruption. "[A]n insidious plague that has a wide range of corrosive effects on societies. It undermines democracy and the rule of law, leads to violations of human rights, distorts markets, erodes the quality of life and allows organized crime, terrorism and other threats to human security to flourish."	Secretary-General Kofi Annan, Foreword to UNCAC, iii
Corruption. N/A [Convention contains no definition.]	United Nations Convention Against Corruption
Grand Corruption. The "steal[ing] or extort[ion]" of "public assets . . . by prominent public office holders," then "mostly laundered through financial institutions," especially banks.	Theodore S. Greenberg, et al., Stolen Asset Recovery (World Bank and UNODS, StAR, 2012)
Indigenous Spoliation. "[T]he destruction of the sum total of a state's endowment, the laying waste of the wealth & resources belonging by right to her citizens, & the denial of their heritage."	Ndiva Kofele-Kale, Patrimonicide: The International Economic Crime of Indigenous Spoliation (1995) 58
Kleptocracy. "[L]arge-scale corruption by high-level foreign public officials."	President George W. Bush, Statement on Kleptocracy, Aug. 10, 2006
Kleptocracy. "Rule by thieves; a government in which the officials are thieves . . . [I[t arises if the holders of office take office in order to use its authority for their personal ends, or, after taking their offices, they use them to benefit themselves and their political and personal	Steven Michael Sheppard, Bouvier Law Dictionary, 2012 allies rather than to the benefit of the governed."

Kleptocracy. "Kleptocrat is usually defined as a ruler whose primary goal is personal enrichment. . . Similar to corruption, kleptocracy refers to the rent-seeking activities of the government. However, although the literature of corruption usually studies low or medium rank government officials, the literature of kleptocracy focuses on sovereign rulers."	C. Simon Fan, Kleptocracy and Corruption, 34 J. COMPAR. ECON. 57 n.1
Kleptocrats. "When kleptocrats loot their nations' treasuries, steal natural resources, and embezzle development aid, they condemn their nations' children to starvation and disease."	Eric Holder, Address to Global Forum, Doha, Qatar, Nov. 7, 2009
Patrimonicide. "The word . . . seems appropriate for this new international economic crime. The word comes from . . . the Latin words 'patrimonium,' meaning 'the estate or property belonging by ancient right to an institution, corporation, or class' . . . ; and 'cide,' meaning killing."	Kofele-Kale, Patrimonicide at 57–58
Politically Exposed Persons. "[I]ndividuals who are, or have been, entrusted with prominent public functions, such as heads of state or government. [F]inancial institutions [are] also expect[ed] to treat a prominent public official's family and close associates as PEP's." (at 25; n.36 & n.37 cite to FATF Glossary; Article 52(1), UNCAC)	Greenberg et al., Stolen Asset Recovery
Presidential Graft. [Used more or less synonymously with "indigenous spoliation" and "patrimonicide."]	Kofele-Kale, Patrimonicide (1995) 1
Specified Unlawful Activity. [Includes] "bribery of a public official, or the misappropriation, theft, or embezzlement of public funds by or for the benefit of a public official."	18 U.S.C. § 1956(c)(7)(B)(iv)
Stolen Assets. N/A [No definition provided]	Stolen Asset Recovery Initiative (StAR)

The Initiative's name thus implies an invidious characterization of an entire system of government, evoking the specter of a "failed" or even "outlaw" State.[53]

Its political-rhetorical character notwithstanding, the term "kleptocracy" has begun to find its way into case law. The Ninth Circuit, in a 1988 immigration case, held that beatings and other mistreatment by government security forces to extort money from a person "may constitute persecution on account of political opinion" pursuant to the Immigration and Nationality Act.[54] In so holding, the court explained: "The record also contains substantial evidence that the Haitian government under Duvalier operated as a 'kleptocracy,' or government by thievery" at all levels.[55]

Black's Law Dictionary defines "corruption" as "[a] fiduciary's or official's use of a station or office to procure some benefit either personally or for someone else, contrary to the rights of others; an act carried out with the intent of giving some advantage inconsistent with official duty or the rights of others."[56] "Kleptocracy" has been defined as "Rule by thieves" and "a government in which the officials are thieves."[57] The related term, "grand cor-

---

53. See, e.g., GERRY SIMPSON, GREAT POWERS AND OUTLAW STATES: UNEQUAL SOVEREIGNS IN THE INTERNATIONAL ORDER (2004).

54. Desir v. Ilchert, 840 F.2d 723, 724 (9th Cir. 1988).

55. Id. at 727. The Ninth Circuit further noted that ordinary agents of the Ton Ton Macoutes security forces often went unpaid, a situation ripe for pervasive violent extortion. Id. The court also noted an earlier federal district court decision that recognized the political nature of virtually any interaction between a citizen and the security forces: "To challenge the extortion by which the Macoutes exist is to challenge the underpinnings of the political system. Accordingly, to resist extortion is to become an enemy of the government." Id. (quoting Haitian Refugee Ctr. v. Civiletti, 503 F. Supp. 442, 498–500 (S.D. Fla. 1980)).

56. Corruption, BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY (10th ed. 2014).

57. Kleptocracy, THE WOLTERS KLUWER BOUVIER LAW DICTIONARY (Stephen Michael Sheppard ed. 2012). The definition continues: "[I]t arises if the holders of office take office in order to use its authority for their personal ends, or, after taking their offices, they use them to benefit themselves and their political or personal allies rather than to the benefit of the governed." Id. It is not difficult to see just how overbroad this definition may be. Interestingly, the leading legal dictionary has not, as of its tenth edition, yet registered the terms "kleptocracy" or "kleptocrat," although there is an entry for "kleptomania," defined as "[a] compulsive urge to steal, esp[ecially] without economic motive." Kleptomania, BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY (10th ed. 2014). The lack of economruption," has been defined as "st[ealing] or extort[ion]" of "public assets . . . by prominent public office holders," then "mostly laundered through financial institutions," especially banks.[58] Kleptocratic corruption is also known as "indigenous spoliation" or, in the coinage of Cameroonian-born legal scholar Ndiva Kofele-Kale, "patrimonicide"—terms that evoke the vast scale of this form of corruption involving "stupendous . . . amounts of wealth."[59] "Indigenous spoliation," in Kofele-Kale's usage, is "the illegitimate use of power for private ends by . . . heads of states . . . and other high-ranking[] leaders."[60] Table 1, an overview of definitions of key anticorruption terms, highlights the terminological and conceptual difficulties in this emerging area of the law.

4. Institutional/Prosecutorial Overview

The Initiative has its administrative home in the Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section of the USDOJ's Criminal Division. The principal procedural arrow in its quiver is civil asset forfeiture, sometimes referred to as "non-conviction based" forfeiture.[61] Following intensive investigation, usually in partnership with another agency such as the FBI, USDOJ-KI prosecutors bring a civil forfeiture action in federal court.[62] ic motive or an institutional context puts this definition in the realm of psychological disorders and clearly has little to do with the notion of kleptocracy as used in the anticorruption realm.

---

58. GREENBERG, ET AL., supra note 8, at xiii.

59. Ndiva Kofele-Kale, Patrimonicide: The International Economic Crime of Indigenous Spoliation, 28 VAND. J. TRANSNAT'L L. 45, 48, 58–59 (1995).

60. Id. at 60 (emphasis added).

61. U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE & U.S. DEP'T OF STATE*, supra* note 7, at 5.

62. USDOJ-KI typically enter into a collaborative relationship with (1) Department of Justice, Criminal Division, Office of International Affairs; (2) Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI); or (3) Department of Homeland Security, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) Homeland Security Investigation. The investigative partner can also be foreign (an agency of a government abroad) or international (a treaty body such as the United Nations or the World Bank). Where the partner is foreign, the USDOJ Office of International Affairs receives and handle such requests. Drawing on the investigative work conducted, USDOJ-KI prosecutors then bring a civil forfeiture action in federal court, asserting in rem jurisdiction over assets believed by the prosecutors to be traceable to foreign corruption. Given that jurisdiction is in USDOJ-KI began with over $1 million in twin forfeitures against DSP, its first target.[63] Other forfeitures have included $115 million in an action involving the regime of Kazakhstan; $30 million from "Teodorín" Obiang of Equatorial Guinea; $28.7 million from former South Korean president Chun Doo Hwan.[64] In just over a half-decade of activity, the Initiative has forfeited several billions of dollars in corruptly acquired assets.[65] The substantial volume of assets obtained (even if a tiny fraction of the total volume of corruption) underlines a striking procedural characteristic of the USDOJ-KI's activity: unlike conventional civil litigation, where collecting on a judgment is the final (often extremely difficult) procedural step, here, prosecution begins with the funds—over which the law enforcement bodies and federal court exercise jurisdiction.

After forfeiture, the destination of assets presents an unclear picture. Some funds have been repatriated, as for instance just under $30 million to the government of South Korea.[66] Some funds have been returned in less conventional, more innovative ways, as for instance some $115 million in the Kazakhstan forfeiture given to needy populations in that country through an NGO created expressly for that purpose. Problematically, however, the majority of the funds remain in USG accounts, unrepatriated or otherwise unrestored to their source countries.

B. Legal Authorities

The USDOJ-KI operates in a complex landscape of anticorruption statutes, treaties, agencies, and practices that have arisen rem, the defendant in such cases is typically the property. The very first USDOJ-KI case, against Nigeria's DSP, was United States v. The Contents of Account Number Z44-343021 Held at Fidelity Brokerage Services, L.L.C., Boston, Massachusetts In the Name of Nicholas Aiyegbemi D/B/A Inadinov and Co. OAO and All Assets Traceable Thereto, No. 1:11-cv-10606-RWZ (D. Mass. 2012).

---

63. DOJ 13-628 (2013), 2013 WL 2366183; DOJ 12-827 (2012), 2012 WL 2454717. See also supra note 1 and corresponding text.

64. DOJ 15-266 (2015), 2015 WL 910102; DOJ 15-1509 (2015), 2015 WL 8289228; DOJ 14-1114 (2014), 2014 WL 5073696.

65. FIN. CRIMES ENF'T NETWORK, supra note 18. The website refers to "the annual forfeiture of more than $1.5 billion in criminal assets . . . ." Id.

66. DOJ 15-266 (2015), 2015 WL 910102.

mostly in the past two decades. It also stands at the intersection of multiple law-enforcement policies, among them the war on drugs, prosecution of organized crime, anti-terrorism, and the fight against bribery and other official corruption. A brief overview of the domestic, international, and foreign legal regimes affecting the Initiative follows.

1. U.S. Federal Statutory Framework

The domestic statutory framework for the USDOJ-KI has both procedural and substantive components; further layers of complexity are added by its hybrid use of both criminal and civil actions and its interaction with foreign law. Procedurally, USDOJ-KI prosecutors rely mainly on 18 U.S.C. Section 981, the civil forfeiture statute. This statute provides a civil remedy even where the predicate offense giving rise to forfeiture is criminal.[67] Furthermore, the substantive provisions themselves, in turn, have underlying predicates, as will be seen below. Thus the statutory scheme is marked by both the relative ease and simplicity of civil forfeiture and by the complexity and interlocking nature of two separate levels of predicate substantive offenses. Section 981 was originally enacted in 1986 as Public Law 99-570 Subsection (a)(1)(A), which broadly subjects to forfeiture "[a]ny property, real or personal, involved in a transaction or attempted transaction in violation of section 1956, 1957, or 1960 of this title, or any property traceable to such property."[68] Where the underlying criminal conduct occurred outside of the United States, subsection (a)(1)(C) makes civil forfeiture applicable to "any offense constituting 'specified unlawful activity' (as defined in section 1956(c)(7) of this title), or a conspiracy to commit such offense."[69]

67. Note, too, the codification of civil asset forfeiture within Title 18, governing criminal offenses.

68. 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(1)(A) (2013).

69. Id. § 981(a)(1)(C).

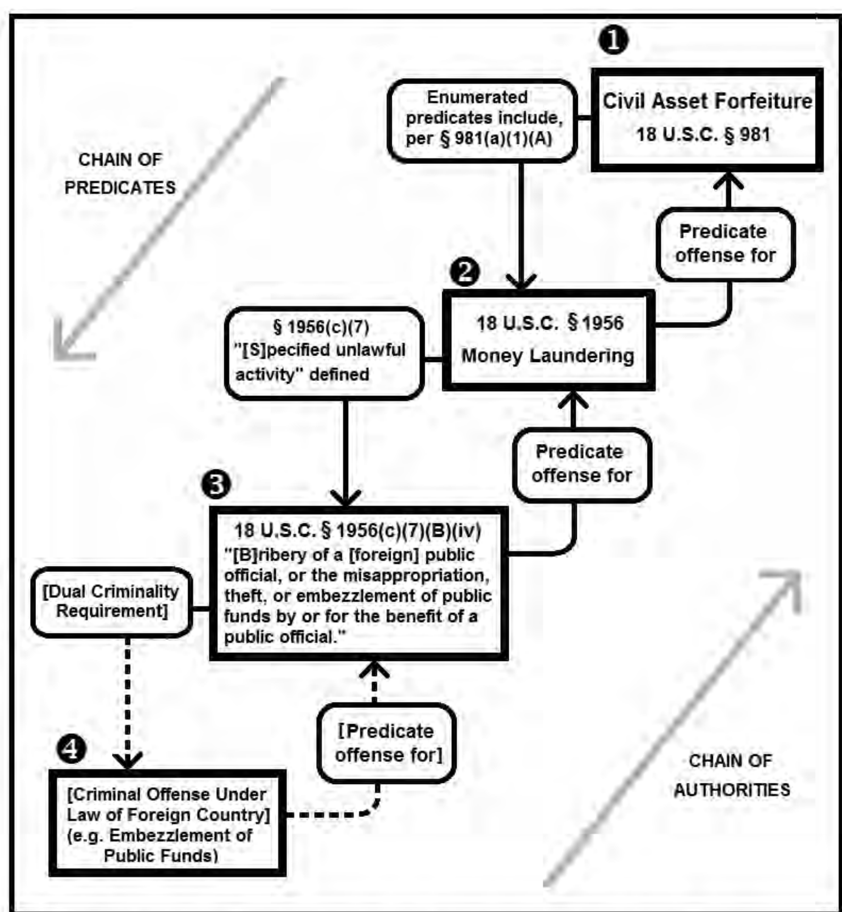

Fig. 1. Typical predicate–offense structure for Kleptocracy Initiative actions. The procedural nature of the USDOJ-KI action is (1), whose predicate offense is (2), which, in turn, has an underlying predicate of (3). Where dual criminality is required, or at least asserted, the foreign offense is (4). Diagram created by the author.

The "specified unlawful activity" provision of subsection 1956(c)(7) acts as a key unlocking the door to forfeiture prosecutions under literally hundreds of separate statutes. As of 2015, these ultimate predicate offenses numbered 236, any one of which may serve as a basis to trigger civil asset forfeiture proceedings connected with money-laundering offenses.[70] The key predicate

70. U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE, ASSET FORFEITURE AND MONEY LAUNDERING STATUTES app. A (2015), http://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/criminal-afmls/legacy/2015/04/24/statutes2015.pdf. The overwhelming majority of the underlying offenses are located within Title 18, governing criminal offenses; a offenses, from a USDOJ-KI perspective, are enumerated in subsection (a)(1)(A): Title 18, Sections 1956, 1957, and 1960.[71] Section 1956 defines money laundering as a financial transaction with property that "represents the proceeds of some form of unlawful activity."[72] A money launderer "conceals the existence, illegal source, or illegal application of income, and then disguises that income to make it appear legitimate," technical skills that can be crucial to the success of criminal enterprises.[73]

The most potent provision of section 1956 for USDOJ-KI prosecutors defines "specified unlawful activity . . . with respect to a financial transaction occurring in whole or in part in the United States," as, inter alia, "bribery of a public official, or the misappropriation, theft, or embezzlement of public funds by or for the benefit of a public official."[74] The latter is one of seven enumerated types of predicate "offense[s] against a foreign nation" "with respect to a financial transaction occurring in whole or in part in the United States."[75] Thus, section 1956, the chief predicate for section 981 civil forfeiture, in defining and criminalizing money laundering, derives the prohibited nature of the conduct from a further predicate—essentially, foreign corruption.

What is not entirely clear, however, is whether, for the sort of forfeiture actions undertaken by USDOJ-KI to succeed, a dual-criminality requirement applies. Under such a requirement, the underlying predicate offense must be a crime under both the law of the United States and of the foreign State in which the illicit en-significant number are in Title 21, governing food and drugs; nine state-law felonies including murder, robbery, and kidnapping are covered as well.

---

71. 18 U.S.C. § 1956 concerns money laundering, § 1957 engaging in monetary transactions in property derived from specified unlawful activity, and § 1960 prohibits unlicensed money transmitting business.

72. 18 U.S.C. § 1956(a)(1) (2013).

73. PRESIDENT'S COMM'N ON ORG. CRIME, THE CASH CONNECTION: ORGANIZED CRIME, FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS, AND MONEY LAUNDERING 7 (1984), https://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/Digitization/166517NCJRS.pdf.

74. 18 U.S.C. § 1956(c)(7)(B)(iv) (2013).

75. Id. § 1956(c)(7)(B)(i)–(iii), (v)–(vii), broadly, deal with (i) controlled substances; (ii) murder, kidnapping, and other violent crimes; (iii) fraud against a foreign bank; (v) smuggling or export-control violation involving items subject to the U.S. Munitions List or Export Administration Regulations control; (vi) an extraditable offense under applicable treaty; and (vii) trafficking in persons, selling or buying of children, and transporting persons for commercial sex acts.

richment occurred.[76] Government pleadings in USDOJ-KI actions appear to proceed on the assumption that there is indeed a dual-criminality requirement; for instance, the "Basis for Forfeiture" section of the Abacha complaint begins:

> At all times relevant to this complaint, conduct constituting theft; conversion; fraud; extortion; and the misappropriation, theft, or embezzlement of public funds by or for the benefit of a public official were criminal offenses under Nigerian law, as enumerated in the Nigerian Criminal and Penal Codes, including but not limited to Nigerian Criminal Code Act 1990, CAP. 77[sic], Part 3, Chapters 12 and 34, and the Nigerian Penal Code Law 1963, CAP. 89 (1987), Chapters X, and XIX.[77]

The complaint then appends Attachment A, "Selected Excerpts of Applicable Nigerian Law."[78]

Moreover, case law supports the proposition that where a forfeiture action is brought in relation to section 1956, the underlying conduct must be a violation of law in the country where it occurred.[79] The violation must also be equivalent to a felony under U.S. law.[80]

---

76. UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION AGAINST CORRUPTION, supra note 35, at 30 art. 43 ¶ 2 addresses the dual-criminality requirement, imposing a flexible test for satisfying the requirement. See infra note 95 and corresponding text.

77. Complaint for Forfeiture In Rem at 33–34, United States v. All Assets Held in Account Number 80020796, No. 1:13-cv-01832-JDB (D.D.C. Nov. 18, 2013), https://www.justice.gov/iso/opa/resources/765201435135920471922.pdf.

78. Id. at Attachment A: Select Excerpts of Applicable Nigerian Law.

79. United States v. 2291 Ferndown Lane, No. 3:10–CV–0037, 2011 WL 2441254, at *4 (W.D. Va. June 14, 2011). The district court specified that "[f]or all presently relevant purposes, 'specified unlawful activity' requires an 'offense against a foreign nation.'" Id. (quoting 18 U.S.C. § 1956(c)(7)(B)(iv). . . .")

80. Id. (citing 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(1)(B)(ii)).

TABLE 2. COMPARISON OF CRIMINAL FORFEITURE AND CIVIL ASSET FORFEITURE

	Criminal Forfeiture	Civil Asset Forfeiture
Type of jurisdiction	In personam	In rem
Criminal conviction required?	Yes	No
Burden of proof	Beyond a reasonable doubt	Preponderance of the evidence or Probable cause (“Customs carve-out”)
Substitution of assets allowed?	Yes	No
Money judgments allowed?	Yes	No

Civil forfeiture in rem offers prosecutorial and judicial efficiencies. First, personal jurisdiction over a defendant is not needed; in rem jurisdiction suffices—the court exercises control over the property.[81] Since the property is treated as guilty through its link to the predicate offense, as established by a preponderance of the evidence, actions can go forward even when a wrongdoer is a fugitive, refuses to appear, or is deceased.[82] A notable advantage of criminal forfeiture is that the defendant’s assets are considered fungible: the government can forfeit the defendant’s legitimate property if the illicit assets cannot be located.[83] In civil forfeiture, jurisdiction is in rem and only reaches the particular assets. Thus in rem proceedings adjudicate the “guilt” of the property; sensu stricto, such proceedings are not a forum to adjudicate the underlying corrupt act, with the punitive, educational, and spotlight effects such prosecution could offer. Complicating matters further, courts’ apparent insistence that, to justify civil asset forfeiture, the offense against the foreign nation be equivalent to a U.S. felony opens the possibility of due process challenges based on the discrepancies in respective evidentiary burdens and procedural protections between civil and criminal prosecutions.[84] Table 2 charts several key differences between civil and criminal forfeiture in this regard.[85]

81. Benjamin B. Wagner, Asset Forfeiture and International Cooperation, U.S. DEP’T OF JUSTICE, http://www.americanbar.org/content/dam/aba/directories/roli/raca/asia_raca_apec_asset_forfeiture.authcheckdam.pdf (last visited Nov. 13, 2016).

82. Id. at 13; see also supra Section II.A.2.

83. Wagner, supra note 81.

2. Complementary International or Foreign Legal Frameworks[86]

The first international convention on corruption came from Latin America, the Inter-American Convention Against Corruption (IACAC), adopted in March 1996, and entered into force in March 1997.[87] The United States is one of 34 IACAC signatory states.[88] Almost immediately after, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development ("OECD") Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions was signed in December 1997, entering into force in February 1999.[89] The United States is one of 41 signatory states.[90]

However, the most important international legal regime in the anticorruption fight is the United Nations Convention Against Corruption ("UNCAC"), which on entering into force in 2005 became the most ambitious multilateral effort to date to combat grand 84. See supra notes 80–82 and accompanying text; infra Section III.G.

85. See infra Section III.G, for further elaboration.

86. This Note's focus on U.S. and related common law legal structures precludes a comprehensive treatment of international or comparative anticorruption efforts, which lie far outside its scope.

87. Organization of American States, Inter-American Convention Against Corruption, Mar. 29, 1996, O.A.S.T.S. No. B-58.

88. For a list of the signatory states, see ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES, Signatories and Ratifications, http://www.oas.org/juridico/english/Sigs/b-58.html (last visited Nov. 13, 2016).

89. ORG. FOR ECON. CO-OPERATION AND DEV., CONVENTION ON COMBATING BRIBERY OF FOREIGN PUBLIC OFFICIALS IN INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS TRANSACTIONS 6–19 (Nov. 21, 1997), http://www.oecd.org/daf/anti-bribery/ConvCombatBribery_ENG.pdf.

90. All 35 OECD member states, and 6 non-member states, are signatories for a total of 41. OECD Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions, ORG. FOR ECON. CO-OPERATION AND DEV., http://www.oecd.org/corruption/oecdantibribery convention.htm (last visited Nov. 13, 2016).

corruption and the first global, legally binding framework to that end. Of particular importance under the UNCAC are Article 31, obligating each state party to take necessary measures to enable tracing, freezing, and confiscation of the proceeds of corruption; Article 57, governing return of confiscated assets; [91] and Articles 54 and 55, establishing an international regime of state-to-state mutual legal assistance ("MLA"). MLA can involve enforcement of foreign orders relating to corrupt assets as well as the initiation of freezing, seizure, and other proceedings against the proceeds of crimes of corruption by means of judicial processes in the requested State. The UNCAC framework is even influential in the U.S. domestic legal context. For instance, when Congresswoman Sheila Jackson Lee introduced a House Resolution to use the Abacha forfeiture assets to create a fund for Boko Haram terror victims in Nigeria, the draft legislation began by invoking the Convention.[92] The USDOJ-KI also prominently features the UNCAC as its basic international framework.[93]

---

91. Article 31 obligates State Parties to take these steps "to the greatest extent possible," a standard that arguably renders this and other UNCAC measures more aspirational than prescriptive. UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION AGAINST CORRUPTION, supra note 35, at 24–25 art. 31; see also UNITED NATIONS, OFFICE ON DRUGS AND CRIME, TECHNICAL GUIDE TO THE UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION AGAINST CORRUPTION 66–67 (2009), http://www.unodc.org/documents/corruption/Technical_Guide_UNCAC.pdf ("Most countries have already established regulatory and supervisory bodies with the responsibility of imposing standards of conduct on financial institutions, such as banks, insurance companies, securities firms and currency exchanges. . . . [Therefore, to effectuate the aims of UNCAC] an organizational model must be carefully designed to avoid the danger of conflicting instructions to institutions, and duplication of the examination of capacity and propriety, corporate governance controls and records.").

92. "Whereas the United Nations Convention Against Corruption (UNAC) [sic] obliges state parties to implement a wide and detailed range of anticorruption measures affecting their laws, institutions and practices." Expressing the Sense of the House of Representatives Regarding the Victims of the Terror Protection Fund, H.R. Res. 528, 114th Cong. (2015), https://www.congress.gov/bill/114th-congress/house-resolution/528/text. The resolution also cites "UNCAC's asset recovery provision[, which] is robust and delineates a global asset recovery framework and strategy . . . ." Id. On the Abacha forfeiture, see infra Section II.C.1.

93. This is visible in USDOJ-KI public materials, such as an entire page featuring USDOJ-KI activities under the heading, "U.S. Support for Asset Re-

One UNCAC provision particularly significant to the USDOJ-KI comes at the start of Chapter IV (International Cooperation): Article 43, Section 2 addresses dual criminality—that is, that predicate offenses which are crimes in the State Party requesting assistance also be crimes in the State Party of whom assistance is requested.[94] Where dual criminality is required, Section 2 deems the requirement fulfilled as long as the conduct underlying the offense is criminal in both State Parties, even if categorized or named differently in each State Party.[95]

The UNCAC print edition includes this call to arms by then Secretary-General Kofi Annan:

> Corruption is an insidious plague . . . . This evil phenomenon is found in all countries . . . but it is in the developing world that its effects are most destructive. Corruption hurts the poor disproportionately by diverting funds intended for development, undermining a Government's ability to provide basic services, feeding inequality and injustice and discouraging foreign aid and investment.[96]

Notably, no definition of corruption appears in this foreword, nor the UN General Assembly Resolution "[a]dopt[ing]" the Convention,[97] nor the Convention's Preamble, nor even the defini-covery and the Implementation of Chapter V of the UNCAC." U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE & U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, supra note 7, at 5.

---

94. UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION AGAINST CORRUPTION, supra note 35, at 30.

95. Id. On whether a dual-criminality requirement applies to USDOJ-KI actions, see supra Section II.B.1.

96. UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION AGAINST CORRUPTION, supra note 35, at iii.

97. Id. at 2 ("The General Assembly . . . Adopts the United Nations Convention against Corruption annexed to the present resolution, and opens it for signature at the High-level Political Signing Conference to be held in Merida, Mexico, from 9 to 11 December 2003, in accordance with resolution 57/169[.]"). While the legal effect of U.N. General Assembly resolutions is the subject of some scholarly and diplomatic controversy, for the most part such resolutions (unlike those of the U.N. Security Council) are not understood to have binding force. LORI F. DAMROSCH, ET AL., INTERNATIONAL LAW: CASES AND MATERIALS 265 (5th ed. 2009).

tional provisions of Article 2.[98] The general UNCAC stance of deferring to (and facilitating enforcement of) the statutory schemes of member states helps mitigate the omission. Yet the absence is still glaring, exemplifying the legal indeterminacy affecting anticorruption legal regimes.

Jointly with The World Bank, the United Nations created an administrative entity to serve the anticorruption work of all State Parties pursuant to the UNCAC: the Stolen Asset Recovery Initiative ("StAR").[99] StAR serves in some senses as both a multilateral equivalent and as an aid and resource to such national enforcement mechanisms as the Kleptocracy Initiative in the United States. The Financial Action Task Force ("FATF"), "an intergovernmental body established in 1989," aims "to set standards and promote effective implementation of legal, regulatory and operational measures for combating money laundering, terrorist financing and other related threats to the integrity of the international financial system."[100] FATF's formal recommendations are influential in shaping national policies against money laundering and other, related crimes.[101]

In addition to multilateral legal frameworks for international anticorruption action, foreign law is also part of the anticorruption landscape. Indeed, the U.S. is far from alone in creating a legal regime targeting the financial proceeds of criminal activity. In

---

98. UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION AGAINST CORRUPTION, supra note 35, at iii–iv, 1–3, 5–8.

99. Stolen Asset Recovery Initiative, WORLD BANK & UNITED NATIONS OFFICE ON DRUGS AND CRIME, http://star.worldbank.org/star (last visited Nov. 14, 2016).

100. Who We Are, FATF, http://www.fatf-gafi.org/about/ (last visited Nov. 14, 2016).

101. Id. The Recommendations were originally issued in 1990 and amended in 1996, 2001, 2003 and 2012.

> The FATF monitors the progress of its members in implementing necessary measures, reviews money laundering and terrorist financing techniques and counter-measures, and promotes the adoption and implementation of appropriate measures globally. In collaboration with other international stakeholders, the FATF works to identify national-level vulnerabilities with the aim of protecting the international financial system from misuse.

Id.

the United Kingdom, whose legal system is most closely aligned with that of the U.S., the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 ("POCA") placed a sweeping array of new tools in government hands, including anti-money laundering measures and non-conviction based (i.e. civil) forfeiture, among others.[102]

The references to foreign law in USDOJ-KI prosecutions also evidence the proliferation of foreign legal mandates against corruption. For instance, in one of the DSP forfeiture actions, the government's affidavit in support of its verified complaint in rem cites Nigerian law with thoroughness and specificity.[103] Given the numerically small number of prosecutions under the KI, there is insufficient empirical data from which to draw conclusions regarding comparative advantages or deficiencies in other State anticorruption laws. But the need seems apparent for a workable complementary regime cognizant of the interrelationships between multiple vertical (domestic–international) and horizontal (domestic–foreign) enforcement vectors.

C. Three Representative USDOJ-KI Prosecutions

What does a USDOJ-KI prosecution look like in the real world? Key characteristics and issues in the operation of the Kleptocracy Initiative emerge from a brief overview of actual forfeiture actions targeting corruption in Nigeria, Kazakhstan, and Equatorial Guinea—showing success in obtaining forfeiture of assets but disparities in the later disposition of the assets.[104] The discrepancy in post-forfeiture disposition of funds is significant because it can

---

102. COLIN KING & CLIVE WALKER, DIRTY ASSETS: EMERGING ISSUES IN THE REGULATION OF CRIMINAL AND TERRORIST ASSETS 3 (Colin King & Clive Walker eds., 2014). The UNDOC "TRACK" portal allows one to examine the national legislation of over 100 countries regarding corruption-related offenses. News of the portal's debut can be found at https://www.unodc.org/unodc/en/corruption/news-track.html. The actual link to the TRACK portal is http://www.track.unodc.org/Pages/home.aspx.

103. Affidavit of Cynthia Coutts, Special Agent, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), United States v. The Contents of Account Number Z44-343021 Held at Fidelity Brokerage Services, LLC, No. 11-10606-RWZ, 4–5 (D. Mass. Apr. 8, 2011). Cited law included the Nigerian Constitution; the Code of Conduct for Public Officers, contained in a schedule to the Constitution; and various criminal statutes.

104. See infra Sections II.C.1, II.C.2, II.C.3.

undermine the legitimacy and long-term viability of the USDOJ-KI as a global legal enforcement mechanism.

1. Nigeria: Oil Riches in Africa's Giant

The West African country of Nigeria is the continent's giant; its population of some 182 million is the eighth largest in the world.[105] The Niger Delta, a region not unlike Louisiana on the Gulf of Mexico, contains considerable oil wealth.[106] Nigeria is emblematic of what some observers have called the "resource curse."[107] The concept was originally used by political-economy scholars to highlight a paradox that countries endowed with such resources tend to be poorer than countries that lack them—but it is now widely used in connection with risk factors for corruption.[108] One scholar notes, "Mineral dependence turns out to be a curse not just in terms of economic growth, but also in terms of risks of violent conflict, greater inequality, less democracy and more corruption."[109]

DSP was elected governor of Bayelsa State, Nigeria in 1999 and reelected in 2003.[110] Midway into his second term, he was impeached and was arrested in London in September 2005 on money-laundering charges; police found some $1.5 million in unaccounted cash among his personal effects.[111] In the following

---

105. Nigeria, CENT. INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/ni.html (last visited Nov. 15, 2016) (click on "People and Society :: NIGERIA" drop down menu).

106. Nigeria, CENT. INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/ni.html (last visited Nov. 15, 2016) (click on "Economy :: NIGERIA" drop down menu).

107. Nicholas Shaxson, Oil, Corruption, and the Resource Curse, 83 INT'L AFFAIRS 1123–40 (2007); see also Carlos Leite & Jens Weidmann, Does Mother Nature Corrupt? Natural Resources, Corruption, and Economic Growth 9 (1999), https://www.imf.org/external/pubs/ft/wp/1999/wp9985.pdf.

108. See RICHARD M. AUTY, SUSTAINING DEVELOPMENT IN MINERAL ECONOMIES: THE RESOURCE CURSE THESIS 1–3 (1994); TERRY LYNN KARL, THE PARADOX OF PLENTY: OIL BOOMS AND PETRO-STATES 3–5, 241–42 (1997).

109. Shaxson, supra note 107, at 1123.

110. Anayo Onukwugha & Osa Okhomina, Goodnight Alamieyeseigha, LEADERSHIP (Oct. 11, 2015, 3:47 AM), http://leadership.ng/news/466258/goodnight-alamieyeseigha.

111. Id.

decade, DSP would become the USDOJ-KI's first target. USDOJ-KI prosecutors lodged a forfeiture action in federal district court in Massachusetts, and in June 2012 obtained a motion for default judgment and a forfeiture order authorizing the seizure of just over $400,000 in assets in Fidelity Investment brokerage accounts traceable to DSP.[112] The next step in the Kleptocracy Initiative's prosecution of DSP occurred the following year, in May 2013, in the federal district court in Maryland. There, the court ordered the forfeiture of a home in Rockville, Maryland, valued at $700,000 and which had been purchased with funds allegedly traced to corrupt conduct by DSP.[113] The proceeds of these twin forfeitures, valued at over 1 million dollars, apparently still sit in USDOJ accounts, unrepatriated and otherwise unreturned.[114]

Far greater in scale was the USDOJ-KI prosecution launched against funds originating in corruption by Nigeria's former dictator, Gen. Sani Abacha, ultimately leading to forfeiture of over $458 million.[115] In October 2015, Congresswoman Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Tex.) proposed legislation to turn the Abacha forfeiture into a fund to benefit victims of terror in Nigeria, in particular those victimized by Boko Haram.[116] The ultimate destination of these funds remains uncertain. A Nigerian NGO, through its U.S. counsel, wrote to Attorney General Holder in 2014 "respectfully request[ing] that the [USDOJ] establish a general process for the repatriation of assets seized as part of its Kleptocracy Initiative"—eloquently expressing the gap this Note addresses.[117]

---

112. Press Release, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Department of Justice Forfeits More Than $400,000 in Corruption Proceeds Linked to Former Nigerian Governor (June 28, 2012), http://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/2012/June/12-crm-827.html.

113. Christopher M. Matthews, U.S. Seizes House of Allegedly Corrupt Nigerian Official, WALL ST. J. (May 31, 2013, 4:11 PM), http://on.wsj.com/143RQZI.

114. Diepreye Alamieyeseigha, WORLD BANK & UNITED NATIONS OFF. ON DRUGS AND CRIME, STAR DATABASES, http://star.worldbank.org/corruption-cases/node/18493 (last visited Nov. 15, 2016).

115. DOJ 14-230 (2014), 2014 WL 844298.

116. Expressing the Sense of the House of Representatives Regarding the Victims of the Terror Protection Fund, H.R. Res. 528, 114th Cong. (2015), https://www.congress.gov/bill/114th-congress/house-resolution/528/text

117. Letter from Alexander W. Sierck & Nicholai Diamond to Att'y Gen. Eric Holder, supra note 19.

2. Kazakhstan: Oil and Power in Post-Soviet Central Asia

Kazakhstan, formerly one of the Central Asian republics within the Soviet Union, is a territorial giant with a population of 18.1 million, of whom some 70% are Muslim.[118] The combination of petroleum resources and extensive cattle-raising lands makes for a poetic analogy to Texas and the American "Wild West." Kazakhstan was the last of the former Soviet republics to gain independence, doing so in December 1991.[119] President Nursultan Nazarbayev has been Kazakhstan's only head of state in the 25 years since independence.[120]

American businessman James Giffen had been active in Kazakhstan since 1992 and in the former Soviet Union for over two decades prior.[121] Giffen eventually became an adviser, and chief oil negotiator, to President Nazarbayev.[122] Giffen was arrested and prosecuted in 2003 in a case that became known as "Ka-

118. Kazakhstan Physiographic Map, CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/resources/cia-maps-publications/map-downloads/Kazakhstan_physiography.pdf (last visited Nov. 14, 2016); see also Kazakhstan, CENT. INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/kz.html (last visited Nov. 14, 2016). At just over 1 million square miles, it has the largest territory of any of the former Soviet republics besides Russia and ranks ninth among all states in the world. Id.

119. Kazakhstan, ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA ONLINE, http://www.britannica.com/place/Kazakhstan/Cultural-life#toc214566 (last visited Nov. 15, 2016).

120. Kazakhstan, CENT. INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/ni.html (last visited Nov. 20, 2016) (click on "Government :: KAZAKHSTAN" drop down menu).

121. Robert Winnett, George Clooney Film Inspiration 'Mr Kazakhstan' Finally Brought to Justice, THE TELEGRAPH (Aug. 13, 2010, 9:00 PM), http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/northamerica/usa/7943201/George-Clooney-film-inspiration-Mr-Kazakhstan-finally-brought-to-justice.html. The 2005 feature film SYRIANA, starring George Clooney, is based on the account of Giffen by an ex-intelligence officer. ROBERT BAER, SEE NO EVIL: THE TRUE STORY OF A GROUND SOLDIER IN THE CIA'S WAR AGAINST TERRORISM (2003); SYRIANA (Warner Bros. 2005).

122. See Winnett, supra note 121.

zakhgate."[123] The criminal charges were violations of (1) the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act ("FCPA"), 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2; (2) the wire fraud statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1343; and (3) U.S. money laundering laws, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1956 and 1957.[124] The heart of the case was the charge that Giffen had made some $80 million in bribe payments on behalf of U.S. oil companies to the Kazakh government and officials in return for oil concessions.

Giffen fought back doggedly over the course of a lengthy prosecution that stretched out for over seven years, witnessed multiple changes in prosecutors, and involved dozens of court appearances.[125] From the outset, his defense was that his conduct was known and approved at the highest levels of the USG, including the CIA.[126] His defense sought disclosure of documents he said would corroborate his claims. The documents were never publicly disclosed, but the judge saw them and stated they showed Giffen had "advanced the strategic interests of the United States and American businesses in Central Asia."[127] Seemingly vindicating Giffen's heroic self-portrait, the judge stated, "How does Mr. Giffen reclaim his reputation? This court begins by acknowledging his service."[128] In the words of one observer, "The biggest [FCPA] prosecution of all time . . . just fizzled out."[129] Finally, Giffen

---

123. Id.; Government's Notice of Final Release of Settlement Funds and Motion to Dismiss, United States v. Approximately $84 Million on Deposit in Account No. T-94025 in the Name of the Treasury of the Ministry of Finance of the Republic of Kazakhstan at Pictet & Cie, Geneva, Switzerland, Formerly on Deposit in Account No. 1017789e at Cai Indosuez, Geneva, Switzerland, and All Interest, Income, Benefits, and Other Proceeds Traceable Thereto, No. 2:07-cv-03559-LAP (S.D. N.Y. 2015) [hereinafter Kazakhstan Settlement].

124. Kazakhstan Settlement, supra note 123.

125. See Richard L. Cassin, No Punishment for 'Hero' Giffen, FCPA BLOG (Nov. 22, 2010, 1:13 AM), http://www.fcpablog.com/blog/2010/11/22/no-punishment-for-hero-giffen.html.

126. See Steve Levine, The Giffen Strategy: Waiting Out the CIA, Hoping Prosecutors Lose Heart or Interest, FOREIGN POLICY (June 4, 2010), http://foreignpolicy.com/2010/06/04/the-giffen-strategy-waiting-out-the-cia-hoping-prosecutors-lose-heart-or-interest/.

127. Cassin, supra note 125. The judge further said Giffen had served as a valuable go-between with Soviet leadership during the Cold War. Id.

128. Id.

129. Scott Horton, Kazakhgate Ends With a Whimper, BROWSINGS: THE HARPER'S BLOG (AUG. 9, 2010, 10:01 AM), http://harpers.org/blog/pled guilty to a misdemeanor tax charge and one count of unlawful payment to a Kazakh official; he received no fine or prison time.[130]

The forfeiture proceeding, however, was successful, and its resolution had a unique twist: an innovative non-profit entity, the BOTA Foundation, was created on the basis of $115 million ($80 million plus interest accrued) in funds forfeited by USDOJ.[131] In 2007, the governments of the United States, Kazakhstan, and the Swiss Confederation agreed to the Memorandum of Understanding creating the Foundation.[132] This agency ran three programs: (1) a conditional cash transfer ("CCT") program, (2) a grants program called the Social Service Program ("SSP"), and (3) a scholarship program known as the Tuition Assistance Program ("TAP").[133] The BOTA Foundation claims to have benefited over 200,000 individuals by dispensing the Kazakhstan forfeiture, and the effort

---

2010/08/kazakhgate-ends-with-a-whimper/. Horton notes that when the CIA revealed it had not turned over all relevant documents, the prosecution's legs were cut out from under it. Id. He also characterized Giffen's CIA defense as "graymail." Id.

130. U.S. Attorney's Office, Southern District of New York, New York Merchant Bank Pleads Guilty to FCPA Violation; Bank Chairman Pleads Guilty to Failing to Disclose Control of Foreign Bank Account, FED. BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION (Aug. 6, 2010), https://archives.fbi.gov/archives/newyork/press-releases/2010/nyfo080610a.htm; Steve Levine, Was Giffen Telling The Truth?, FOREIGN POLICY (Nov. 19, 2010), http://foreignpolicy.com/2010/11/19/was-james-giffen-telling-the-truth; Cassin, supra note 125.

131. The BOTA Foundation: Final Report Executive Summary, IREX (Feb. 12, 2015), https://www.irex.org/resource/bota-foundation-final-report (click on "Executive summary" link); Aaron Bornstein, The BOTA Foundation Explained (Part Two): Where Did BOTA Get Its Money?, FCPA BLOG (Apr. 7, 2015 7:02 AM), http://www.fcpablog.com/blog/2015/4/7/the-bota-foundation-explained-part-two-where-did-bota-get-it.html; see also The BOTA Foundation: Innovative Asset Return, IREX, https://www.irex.org/projects/bota-foundation [https://web.archive.org/web/20150922024426/https:/www.irex.org/projects/bota-foundation] (last visited Nov. 16, 2016).

132. Aaron Bornstein, The BOTA Foundation Explained (Part Six): How Was BOTA Set Up?, FCPA BLOG (Apr. 15, 2015, 7:08 AM), http://www.fcpablog.com/blog/2015/4/15/the-bota-foundation-explained-part-six-how-was-bota-set-up.html. The government's final release of settlement funds and dismissal motion in the case were accompanied by final reports on the activities of the BOTA Foundation issued by both IREX and The World Bank. Id.

133. Id.

appears to have been well administered without any taint of corruption.[134] It has been cited as an example of what can be accomplished by dispensing forfeited assets innovatively and prioritizing service to vulnerable populations.[135]

3. Equatorial Guinea: Paradise and Plunder on the Rio Muni

The former Spanish colony of Equatorial Guinea, in Central Africa, has some 750,000 inhabitants.[136] Since independence in 1968, it has had two heads of state: Francisco Macías Nguema, who ruled from 1968 until a 1979 coup, and his nephew Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo ("Obiang") who rose to power via the coup.[137] Obiang has now ruled for 37 years.[138] The country began major petroleum and natural gas production in the 1990s, and is now sub-Saharan Africa's third largest petroleum producer.[139] According to the World Bank, the country's per-capita GDP of $18,389 ranked 41st out of 183 countries, well in the top quarter worldwide and ahead of such countries as Uruguay, Chile, and

134. Id.

135. For instance, Congresswoman Sheila Jackson Lee cites the outcome of the Kazakhstan forfeiture as a model for what could be done with the funds forfeited from Gen. Abacha of Nigeria. See Press Release, Congresswoman Sheila Jackson Lee Introduces Bipartisan Legislation Urging the Creation of a $458 Million Victims of Terror Protection Fund Utilizing the Abacha Forfeited Funds, United States Congresswoman Sheila Jackson Lee (Oct. 27, 2015), https://jacksonlee.house.gov/media-center/press-releases/congresswoman-sheila-jackson-lee-introduces-bipartisan-legislation-0.

136. Equatorial Guinea, CENT. INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/ek.html (click on "Population and Society :: EQUATORIAL GUINEA" drop down menu).

137. Equatorial Guinea, CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/ek.html (click on "Government :: EQUATORIAL GUINEA" drop down menu).

138. Equatorial Guinea, CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/ek.html (click on "Energy :: EQUATORIAL GUINEA" drop down menu).

139. Equatorial Guinea, CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/ek.html (click on "Population and Society :: EQUATORIAL GUINEA" drop down menu).

Hungary.[140] Yet, on various public-health metrics, Equatorial Guinea is desperately poor.[141] The horrific gap between the country's high-middle income and its grim health indices seem to indicate a harsh case of the "resource curse."[142]

Teodoro Nguema Obiang ("Teodorín"), the president's son and holder of the office of "second vice president," was the target of corruption investigations for years.[143] In 2010, the U.S. Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations exhaustively documented his schemes using shell companies, kickbacks, and other corrupt means to amass and transfer tens of millions of dollars into the U.S. financial system.[144] Some funds were used to purchase big-ticket real property such as a $30 million residence in Malibu, California, and a $38.5 million jet aircraft.[145] The Senate investigation also detailed 61 separate wire transfers through two U.S. banks between 2006 and 2008, totaling $110.4 million.[146] After a

---

140. GDP Per Capita for Equatorial Guinea, THE WORLD BANK, http://data.worldbank.org/indicator/NY.GDP.PCAP.CD (scroll down and click on "Equatorial Guinea" hyperlink).

141. The 58-year life expectancy ranks 167th out of 196 countries. Equatorial Guinea, WORLD HEALTH RANKINGS, http://www.worldlifeexpectancy.com/equatorial-guinea-life-expectancy (last visited Nov. 16, 2016). On another crucial public-health yardstick, infant mortality, the rate of 71 per 1,000 live births ranks 187th out of 202 in the world according to the United Nations. See Infant Mortality Rate for Equatorial Guinea, UNITED NATIONS, http://esa.un.org/unpd/wpp/DataQuery/ (click on "Infant mortality rate, 1q0, for both sexes combined (infant deaths per 1,000 live births); then type "Equatorial Guinea" into the search box above and click on "Next" button twice").

142. Supra notes 107–08 and corresponding text.

143. Leslie Wayne, Wanted by U.S.: The Stolen Millions of Despots and Crooked Elites, N.Y. TIMES (Feb. 16, 2016), http://www.nytimes.com/2016/02/17/business/wanted-by-the-us-the-stolen-millions-of-despots-and-crooked-elites.html.

144. STAFF OF S. PERMANENT SUBCOMM. ON INVESTIGATIONS, 111th Cong., REP. ON KEEPING FOREIGN CORRUPTION OUT OF THE UNITED STATES: FOUR CASE HISTORIES 16–107 (Comm. Print 2010).

145. Id. at 98.

146. Id. at 99–106. The USDOJ calculated Teodorín's total fortune at $300 million. Second Vice President of Equatorial Guinea Agrees to Relinquish More than $30 Million of Assets Purchased with Corruption Proceeds, U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE: OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS (Oct. 10, 2014) [hereinafter Second Vice President of Equatorial Guinea], prosecution lasting years, the Teodorín kleptocracy action took a startling turn. USDOJ began negotiations with Teodorín in June 2014 and reached a settlement in October: The Equatoguinean official agreed to liquidate his Malibu mansion, a Ferrari sports car, and his Michael Jackson memorabilia, forfeiting some $30 million in proceeds to the U.S.[147] He would also have to "contribut[e]" $1 million to a special fund set up by the USDOJ.[148]

In absolute terms, the Teodorín settlement yielded a large dollar amount that doubtless qualified it as a major USDOJ-KI success. On the other hand, as a proportion of Teodorín's corrupt gains, it was dishearteningly small: according to the USDOJ's announcement, Teodorín's corruptly amassed wealth totaled some $300 million.[149] He got to keep his Gulfstream jet and Michael Jackson's crystal-studded glove—symbolic of what was only a partial USDOJ-KI victory.[150] The outcome can thus be viewed from two distinct vantage points. Some observers question the implications of the USG allowing a kleptocrat to keep a large percentage of what had been proven in court to be "ill-gotten gains."[151] Others emphasize a partial victory is still a victory, and that substantial resources looted from the people of Equatorial http://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/second-vice-president-equatorial-guinea-agrees-relinquish-more-30-million-assets-purchased

---

147. Stipulation and Settlement Agreement, supra note 4. The style of the case hints at both the high life beloved of the second vice-president, and some of the ways kleptocrats convert misappropriated funds into assets abroad. See also Second Vice President of Equatorial Guinea, supra note 146.

148. Stipulation and Settlement Agreement, supra note 4.

149. Second Vice President of Equatorial Guinea, supra note 146.

150. Kara Scannell, Corruption: Moving Money out of Purgatory, FIN. TIMES (Jul. 5, 2016, 5:41 PM), http://www.ft.com/cms/s/0/10d8679c-228b-11e6-9d4d-c11776a5124d.html.

151. Robert Packer, Settlements in Asset Recovery Cases—Neither Ethical Nor Effective, GLOBAL ANTICORRUPTION BLOG (Jun. 30, 2015), http://globalanticorruptionblog.com/2015/06/30/guest-post-settlements-in-asset-recovery-cases-neither-ethical-nor-effective. Packer argues that settlements such as the one reached with Teodorín encourage kleptocrats to think of asset forfeiture as a mere "business expense"; "a conviction and seizure of all illicit assets is the best way to help achieve" improvements in the lives of corruption's victims. Id.

Guinea would soon be returned via some as yet unspecified mechanism.[152]

The language of one of the Settlement Agreement provisions underlines the uncertainty over the ultimate fate of the forfeited assets: "The United States represents that, where practicable and consistent with law, and after deducting its usual case-related costs and expenses, it intends to utilize the net Settlement Amount for the benefit of the people of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea."[153] As a statement, it reflects U.S. policy, but it raises two questions: first, what legal force, if any, does the "representation" by the United States have? Second, is there a way that this "inten[tion]," here and in other USDOJ-KI actions, could be placed on a more solid legal footing?

D. USDOJ-KI: Strengths and Weaknesses

Half a decade later, and on the edge of a change in presidential administrations, the leaders and staff of the USDOJ's Kleptocracy Initiative can point to some remarkable successes and a track record in which substantial experience has been built in the pursuit of tainted fruits of grand corruption abroad. The successful confiscation of nearly half a billion dollars in the Abacha action, over $100 million in the Kazakhstan action, and $30 million from Teodorín Obiang of Equatorial Guinea, among other forfeitures, represent undeniable achievements. Nevertheless, the overall picture is not uniformly rosy. A more complex depiction of success, challenges, and critiques emerges from our examination of the USDOJ-KI.

---

152. Richard L. Cassin, 'Shameless' Kleptocrat Teddy Obiang Forfeits $30 Million in DOJ Settlement, FCPA BLOG (Oct. 13, 2014, 1:38 AM), http://www.fcpablog.com/blog/2014/10/13/shameless-kleptocrat-teddy-obiang-forfeits-30-million-in-doj.html. Matthew Stephenson suggests that recoveries expressed as a percentage of the total assets originally sought is not necessarily the best metric for success since USDOJ-KI prosecutors may start out with the most ambitious goal possible. Matthew Stephenson, Is the Kleptocracy Initiative Worth It? A Tentative Yes, GLOBAL ANTICORRUPTION BLOG (Feb. 23, 2016), https://globalanticorruptionblog.com/2016/02/23/is-the-kleptocracy-initiative-worth-it-a-tentative-yes/#more-5525; see also Martin Kenney, Kleptocracy Stinks. The DOJ Fights Back "With Impact," FCPA BLOG (Mar. 22, 2016, 9:28 AM), http://www.fcpablog.com/blog/2016/3/22/martin-kenney-kleptocracy-stinks-the-doj-fights-back-with-im.html.

153. Stipulation and Settlement Agreement, supra note 4, at 23–24.

In nearly six years of operation, the Kleptocracy Initiative has done much more than simply carry out over a dozen successful forfeiture actions. It has amassed a body of practical experience in investigative cooperation (domestically and internationally), mutual legal assistance, invocation of foreign statutes and multilateral treaties and conventions, and, in more limited cases, repatriation or (in at least one case) more innovative ways of restoring forfeited assets to the countries from which they were stolen. The deterrent effect on existing or aspiring kleptocrats ought not be scorned—nor should the encouragement to citizens and NGOs in countries battling corruption.[154]

On the other hand, the USDOJ-KI has faced considerable challenges and is subject to a range of critiques. First, prosecutions are extraordinarily labor-intensive in the investigative phase; kleptocrats have very deep pockets and can foot the bill for top-notch legal representation, drawing forfeiture actions out for years.[155] This leads to pressure to settle, and the USDOJ-KI attorneys and staff may be supposed to reach a point where they may be eager—or at least willing—to obtain a positive (if only partial)

---

154. The KI's deterrent effect must also be assessed in light of similar, ongoing U.S.-led investigative and law enforcement efforts against entities like FIFA. Rebecca R. Ruiz, FIFA Official Plans to Fight Conspiracy Charges, N.Y. TIMES (Mar. 29, 2016), http://www.nytimes.com/2016/03/30/sports/soccer/fifa-official-plans-to-fight-court-charges.html?_r=0. IRS prosecutions of U.S. tax evaders who arguably concealed income in Swiss banks led to historic settlement agreements with Swiss banking giants like UBS whereby the Swiss banks waived their centuries-long secrecy conventions. Unsettling Settlements: More Wrongdoing at Banks, More Swingeing Fines, No Prosecutions, THE ECONOMIST (May 23, 2015), http://www.economist.com/news/finance-and-economics/21651885-more-wrongdoing-banks-more-swingeing-fines-no-prosecutions-unsettling. The point worth emphasizing is that every successful prosecution or record-breaking settlement in these spheres adds to the overall "snowball effect" in enforceability in each individual sphere. By the same token, as expressed throughout this Note, one should pay careful attention to the optics or perception of so-called hegemonic enforcement, where U.S. enforcement actions in disparate fields of regulated activity are taken as further corroboration of the dangerously simplistic narrative of the U.S. as "the world's policeman." It seems manifest that to achieve a legitimate deterrent effect, enforcement measures must be balanced against various countervailing interests and rooted in well-settled doctrinal ground.

155. James Giffen is a case in point; see supra notes 121–130. Pavlo Lazarenko is another; see supra note 33.

result.[156] Where such settlements are reached and USDOJ-KI prosecutors are only able to forfeit a fraction of the targeted corrupt assets, an unintended message may be sent to corrupt officials and a perverse incentive established: kleptocratic wrongdoers may be inspired to misappropriate as much money as possible from their national treasuries so as to increase the value of a potential eventual settlement. Some observers have expressed serious misgivings about such arrangements.[157] Teodorín Obiang, the beneficiary of one such "golden handshake"[158] reportedly told the media he was "happy to 'continue the charitable work I have sponsored for many years in Equatorial Guinea.'"[159] A settlement—particularly where there is no admission of wrongdoing—may thus enable a wrongdoer to reframe the forfeiture as a voluntary charitable donation.

Second, the USDOJ-KI's broad, protective justifications with ethical and humanitarian overtones stand in tension with the perception of unilateralism in the Initiative's actions. While USDOJ-KI practice is often highly collaborative with foreign states and/or citizens, making the criticism unfair in many cases, the rhetoric of American exceptionalism helps feed it. Advocacy of international cooperation around broad principles of justice can sometimes fit uneasily with the unilateral-sounding rhetoric of American exceptionalism—as with President George W. Bush's 2006 characterization of anticorruption work as "a critical component of our freedom agenda" that would "extend America's transformational democratic values to all free and open societies."[160]

---

156. See, e.g., Equatorial Guinea kleptocracy prosecution, supra Section II.C.3.

157. Mohamed Moussa, The Golden Handshake: Background Rules and the Choice of Restoring Money or Doing Justice, GLOBAL ANTICORRUPTION BLOG (Apr. 13, 2015), http://globalanticorruptionblog.com/2015/04/13/the-golden-handshake-background-rules-and-the-choice-of-restoring-money-or-doing-justice; s*ee also* Packer, supra note 151.

158. Moussa, supra note 157.

159. Packer, supra note 151.

160. President George W. Bush, President's Statement on Kleptocracy (August 10, 2006), http://georgewbush-whitehouse.archives.gov/news/releases/2006/08/20060810.html (emphasis added). Rhetorically, it is also unclear how societies that are already "free and open" require, or would benefit, from having "America's transformational values [extended]" to them. Such rhetoric, perhaps, encourages criticism of an "ethical imperialism" that rides roughshod over

Third, until now the USDOJ-KI has mostly targeted activity in Africa and Asia, and, to a more limited extent, Latin America. The shape of USDOJ-KI operations bears an uncomfortable resemblance to the North/South, developed/underdeveloped global divide.[161] The fact that U.S. anticorruption efforts are not only directed at those regions, and even in some cases target conduct within the U.S. by domestic actors, helps mitigate this perception but does not dispel it entirely.[162] Two scholars note the targeting of corruption in the global "South" and "East," and find "Orientalist overtones" in the anticorruption movement.[163]

Fourth, similar concerns to those raised by civil asset forfeiture domestically arise regarding the USDOJ-KI. In principle the government, like local police departments, has an incentive to take legal shortcuts in order to forfeit and obtain title to substantial sums of money, which the government is under no affirmative duty to return.[164] Of course, even some critics acknowledge significant a wide range of cultural practices, not all of which deserve broad-brush condemnation as "corruption." The FCPA's "facilitating payment" exception, of course, already makes allowances for this view. See supra note 24 and corresponding text. Both conceptual and empirical difficulties in distinguishing corruption from the other, culturally-rooted phenomena alluded to form a key theme running through several of the contributions to CORRUPTION AND THE SECRET OF LAW: A LEGAL ANTHROPOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVE (MONIQUE NUIJTEN & GERHARD ANDERS EDS., 2007). S*ee*, e.g., Andrew MacNaughton & Kam Bill Wong, Corruption Judgments in Pre-War Japan: Locating the Influence of Tradition, Morality, and Trust on Criminal Justice, in CORRUPTION AND THE SECRET OF LAW 77–80 (2007).

---

161. See, e.g., B.S. Chimni, Third World Approaches to International Law: A Manifesto, 8 INT'L COMTY. L. REV. 3, 3 (2006).

162. See, e.g., Richard C. Smith et al., Anti-Corruption Enforcement Is Escalating Worldwide, LAW 360 (May 27, 2015, 8:17 AM), http://www.law360.com/articles/659365/anti-corruption-enforcement-is-escalating-worldwide. The article mentions the indictment of U.S. Senator Robert Menendez (D-NJ). Id. See also Kazakhstan kleptocracy case, supra Section II.C.2.

163. Nuijten & Anders, Corruption and the Secret of Law: An Introduction, in CORRUPTION AND THE SECRET OF LAW: A LEGAL ANTHROPOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVE 1, 3 (asserting that "[e]ndemic corruption . . . represents the evil and primitive Other [in] global rhetoric about transparency and good governance" whereas corruption in the wealthier countries is treated as "incidental, . . . a few rotten apples."). Id.

164. See supra note 19 and corresponding text.

differences between the two situations.[165] The ability of a local police department to expand its resources substantially through forfeitures finds little parallel in the USDOJ—the budgets involved differ by many orders of magnitude; and, unlike the situation in a local police department that may be chronically understaffed, the USDOJ-KI is carried out by highly trained, experienced legal professionals. Additionally, USDOJ-KI forfeiture actions are tested in the rigorous forum of a federal court. However, even in the highly professionalized USDOJ context, matters of institutional prestige, advancement incentives, and the use of forfeiture amounts as a metric for administrative efficacy and budgetary claims, may make the analogy a little less far-fetched.

Finally, the "discretion to return" and the accompanying incentives are vexing. The gap pointed out at the outset of this Note—between the firm statutory underpinnings of the Kleptocracy Initiative's means (forfeiture) and the voluntary, discretionary framework for the ends (return)—likely does more than anything else to undermine the legitimacy of the Initiative in some eyes.[166]

Could it be that the USDOJ-KI would benefit from having less post-forfeiture discretion over assets? Initially, assets forfeited through Kleptocracy Initiative actions belonged to the people of the States that were hosts to the corruption in question. Logically, that ought to be their ultimate destination. That is the fundamental political, rhetorical, and moral underpinning for the legal doctrines used by the USDOJ-KI; and it is linked to the principal jurisdictional assertion made for the USDOJ-KI at the highest levels of the USG: the protective principle.[167] Whatever can be done to increase the likelihood of asset return will strengthen the Initiative, bolstering its prestige and legitimacy in the eyes of the internation-

---

165. Matthew Stephenson, The StAR "Few and Far" Report, and (Conflicted) Reflections on Civil Forfeiture, GLOBAL ANTICORRUPTION BLOG (Nov. 4, 2014), http://globalanticorruptionblog.com/2014/11/04/the-star-few-and-far-report-and-conflicted-reflections-on-civil-forfeiture/.

166. See Oluwafunmilayo Akinosi, Asset Recovery and the Department of Justice's Discretion to Return, GLOBAL ANTICORRUPTION BLOG (Aug. 31, 2015), https://globalanticorruptionblog.com/2015/08/31/asset-recovery-and-the-department-of-justices-discretion-to-return/. Akinosi argues that leaving the return of assets to the discretion of the USDOJ saddles the USDOJ with a degree of arbitrary power that is unfair and harms its overall effectiveness. Id.

167. See supra note 42 and corresponding text.

al community, the populations affected, and their allies and co-nationals within the U.S. At the same time, kleptocrats also have skilled lawyers capable of advancing novel theories for the return of assets—to their clients. The next section will attempt to find usable doctrinal analogues for the return of forfeited assets to their rightful owners compatible with the KI's existing legal authorities and sufficient to withstand legal counter-claims by the corrupt officials.

III. RETURN OF ILL-GOTTEN ASSETS: POSSIBLE ANALOGUES

Returning forfeited assets to their rightful owners under the USDOJ-KI is hampered both by the fact that it is discretionary and that it is difficult. Fig. 2 is an attempt to graphically express the problem: how is the dotted line to be accomplished; completing the circle by returning looted funds to their true owners? This section will look at a series of historical mechanisms or doctrines by which government takes control of property,[168] in search of promising analogues potentially adaptable into a more robust legal framework of asset return in the kleptocracy context.

168. See Infra note 213.

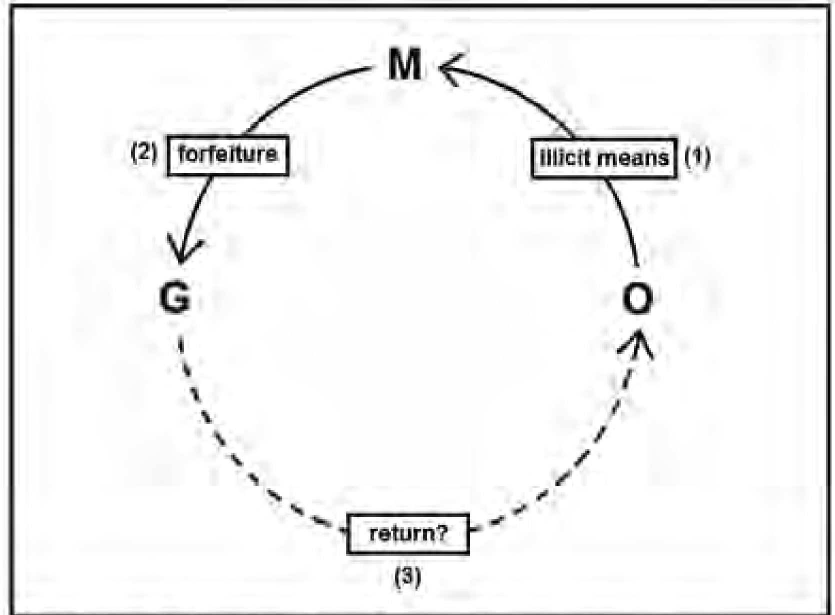

Fig. 2. Asset Forfeiture and Potential Return. (1) The original embezzlement, theft, or other illicit acquisition of assets by malfeasor M from true owner O. (2) The forfeiture of the assets by government G. (3) The possible return of assets by G to O. Solid lines show actual shifts in possession of the assets, dotted lines a potential shift. Diagram created by the author.

A. Deodand

The origins of deodand are ancient. Justice Holmes in THE COMMON LAW (1881) recalls the "well-known passage in Exodus [21:28] . . . : 'If an ox gore a man or a woman, that they die: then the ox shall be surely stoned, and his flesh shall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox shall be quit.'"[169] The "deodand" was the forfeited beast or object, "'an accursed thing,' in the language of Blackstone."[170] Eventually, destruction gave way to confiscation: the deodand went to God by way of the king.[171] In a typical early-modern English case where "a falling tree kill[ed] a man," the jury found that the tree caused the man's death" and was deodand.[172]

169. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., THE COMMON LAW 7 (1881).

170. Id.

171. Id. at 24.

172. Anna Pervukhin, Deodands: A Study in the Creation of Common Law Rules, 47 AM. J. LEGAL HIST. 237, 242 (2005).

Gradually, deodand evolved as a common law rule, though with much fluctuation and variation in its application.[173]

Deodand later became a form of civil compensation for wrongful death, or pension to surviving dependents. An 18th century coroner's jury declared "a stack of timber which had fallen on a child to be forfeited as a deodand, it was ransomed for 30*s.*, . . . paid over to the child's father."[174] Juries often improvised and even manipulated the facts to achieve a desired result; like situations could be treated inconsistently from region to region or even jury to jury.[175]

Deodands also underwent evolution into a source of Crown revenue, justified as a penalty and deterrence to carelessness; the Crown even began to raise revenue by selling off the rights to all the deodands from a particular jurisdiction to lords and townships.[176] The Industrial Revolution brought with it a revival of the deodand, now expressly used to compensate survivors, such as the widows of workmen killed in factory or railway "misadventures."[177] Deodand was finally abolished in 1846, when Lord Campbell's Act created a cause of action for wrongful death in survivors.[178] Thus, deodand's twilight was the dawn of tort liability in English law.[179]

What recourse was available to the owner of chattels declared deodands? The records are not entirely clear, but there are grounds to infer that a property owner could appeal to the court to overturn the jury's verdict. Certainly the opposite could and did occur: in Rex v. Cheyney, a lord challenged the sufficiency of a jury verdict of deodand against the wheel of a wagon that had run

---

173. Id. at 242–47.

174. J.W. CECIL TURNER, KENNY'S OUTLINES OF CRIMINAL LAW 8 (18th ed. 1962).

175. Pervukhin, supra note 172, at 239.

176. Id. at 237.

177. Id. at 249.

178. Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 681 n.19; Harry Smith, From Deodand to Dependency, 11 AM. J. LEGAL HIST. 389, 397–99 (1967).

179. Smith, supra note 178, at 389.

over and killed a child; his appeal was denied.[180] Courts were generally highly deferential to jury findings of deodand; in a 1755 case, the court reasoned that a court "ought not to contradict the [factual] finding of a jury" even where it was "exceedingly improbable, if not altogether impossible."[181] It appears that challenges to deodand findings were possible but infrequent.[182]

Deodand has been a many-faceted, almost protean, legal doctrine meaning different things at different times: destruction of "guilty" property, forfeiture to God by way of king, transfer as compensation to victims of negligence, accident, or felony. Its absolute destruction of the original owner's title suggests strong parallels with the kleptocracy forfeiture regime. This, in combination with its evolution in a restitutionary direction, makes it an intriguing analogue for potential reforms aimed at bolstering the return of forfeited assets to their true owners by permanently extinguishing the corrupt individual's property rights, and therefore legal and equitable basis for challenging the seizure.

B. Piracy

Piracy was prosecuted at admiralty. Original title to the vessel as property was irrelevant to the proceedings. Rather, the vessel's association with the crime of piracy acted as an acid, dissolving the original title. Barnet analyzes the case as an example of "legal fictions" around forfeiture.[183] Here, the fiction is the personification of the ship as a moral agent capable of guilt. Such prosecutions involved a vigorous assertion of extraterritoriality—the target of the vessel's piracy can be "any vessel of the United States, or of the citizens thereof, or . . . any other vessel."[184]

In The Palmyra, 25 U.S. 1 (1827), the commander of a U.S. vessel of war boarded and captured, under suspicions of piracy, a Spanish vessel whose commander identified it as a privateer sail-180. Pervukhin, supra note 172, at 247 (quoting Rex v. Cheyney, 3 Keble 312, 84 ER 739 (1674)). The challenge failed; presumably, the lord would have become the owner of any deodands on his land. Id.

---

181. Id. at 247 (quoting Rex v. Grew, Sayer 249–50, 96 ER 869 (1755)).

182. Id. at 239.

183. Todd Barnet, Legal Fiction and Forfeiture: An Historical Analysis of the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act, 40 DUQ. L. REV. 77, 77 (2001).

184. The Palmyra, 25 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1827) (citing Act of Congress, 3 Mar. 1819, ch. 75, as continued in force by Act of Congress, 15 May 1820, ch. 112).

ing under a commission from the King of Spain.[185] The Spanish commander sued unsuccessfully for return of the vessel and for damages incurred pursuant to capture but was awarded damages on appeal.[186] On the government's appeal before the U.S. Supreme Court, the appellee argued that forfeiture was improper absent a criminal conviction.[187] The Court rejected the argument, differentiating statutory forfeiture actions from criminal forfeitures:

> It is well known, that at the common law, in many cases of felonies, the party forfeited his goods and chattels to the crown. The forfeiture did not, strictly speaking, attach in rem; but . . . could [occur] only by the conviction of the offender . . . . But this doctrine never was applied to . . . forfeitures[] created by statute, in rem, cognizable on the revenue side of the Exchequer. The . . . offence is attached primarily to the thing . . . . The same principle applies to proceedings in rem, on seizures in the Admiralty . . . . In the judgment of this Court, no personal conviction of the offender is necessary to enforce a forfeiture in rem in cases of this nature.[188]

The Court's holding gives us a glimpse of the deodand origins of forfeiture.

Did owners of property stolen by pirates have any legal recourse? The British Bounty Legislation of 1825 Retroactive to 1820 contained a provision "requir[ing] the return of property in the possession of 'pirates' to its former owners or proprietors after in rem proceedings in Admiralty, and on the payment by owners of one eighth of the value of the property returned in lieu of salvage."[189] This seems to have been general practice by the U.S.: "[r]eturn of the vessel and cargo to its legal owners and payment by them of 'salvage.'"[190] Thus, where the owner of stolen property

185. Id. at 8.
186. Id. at 8–9.
187. Id. at 12.
188. Id. at 14–15.
189. ALFRED P. RUBIN, THE LAW OF PIRACY 205 (1988).
190. Id. at 165.

was known, admiralty courts in piracy prosecutions appear to have made return of property a key objective.

Like deodand's severing of title from the original owner, anti-piracy doctrine implies absolute dissolution of title in the pirate vessel. The strong legal and moral opprobrium attached to piracy—its infamy leading to ubiquitous condemnation and universal jurisdiction—is thus a compelling parallel with kleptocratic corruption. The focus on return of stolen property, too, makes the piracy regime, like deodand, a potentially relevant parallel.

C. Customs Offenses

Forfeiture could also be imposed for such offenses as fraudulently undervaluing a ship's cargo in order to avoid customs duties. Such seizures, coupled with the broad, general warrant known as the Writs of Assistance, were a major grievance leading to the American Revolution.[191]

Customs offenses present some interesting legal difficulties, one being that the identity of the person who shipped the goods was often difficult, or even impossible, to ascertain:

> If the seller has committed a customs offense, say by preparing invoices which understate the purchase price of the goods, forfeiture of the goods may be the only practical way to exact the equivalent of a civil or criminal fine from the seller, at least where the seller has retained title to the goods, as in a consignment sale.[192]

The leading admiralty treatise underscores the practicalities of seizure: "[I]n a great variety of . . . cases [involving violations of the laws of trade, navigation, and revenue committed on navigable

---

191. James Otis, Against the Writs of Assistance, NATIONAL HUMANITIES INSTITUTE, http://www.nhinet.org/ccs/docs/writs.htm (last visited Nov. 20, 2016); Thomas K. Clancy, The Importance of James Otis, 82 MISS. L.J. 487 (2013).

192. Stefan B. Herpel, Toward a Constitutional Kleptocracy: Civil Forfeiture in America, 96 MICH. L. REV. 1910, 1918 (1998). That the charge of "kleptocracy" should be hurled at law enforcement is ironic, but in the context of this Note, it underlines the care with which forfeiture actions need to be undertaken and prosecuted.

waters], the vessels and the goods alone are within the reach of the process of the courts; the individuals concerned are in other countries" and beyond reach.[193] Justice Holmes famously noted a ship may be "the only security available in dealing with foreigners, and rather than send one's own citizens to search for a remedy abroad in strange courts, it is easy to seize the vessel and satisfy the claim at home . . . ."[194]

In the influential Supreme Court case of United States v. Twenty-Five Packages of Panama Hats, 231 U.S. 358 (1913), the government initiated forfeiture proceedings against a shipment of Panama hats a consignee, Castillo, had unloaded at New York harbor with fraudulently undervalued invoices.[195] Castillo argued that the goods were not introduced into the commerce of the United States within the meaning of the Tariff Act of 1909 because they were stored in the General Order warehouse rather than formally entered through customs.[196] The Court held that storage in General Order did place the goods in "a channel of [U.S.] commerce."[197] More importantly, the fact that the consignor of the goods was beyond U.S. jurisdiction did not shield the goods from forfeiture.[198]

Forfeiture thus operated as a strict liability mechanism, enabling the U.S. to take title to goods in a way that avoided both prohibitively expensive factual inquiry to identify the culpable party and in personam jurisdictional barriers. In effect, forfeiture could serve as an expedient in the face of practical limits on extraterritorial jurisdiction to adjudicate.

The peculiar circumstances of this legal form, unlike the cases of deodand and piracy, tended to make forfeiture final—there was typically no move to restore property to its owner. Customs

---

193. 4 Benedict on Admiralty 607, at 177 (6th ed. 1940), quoted in Herpel, Toward a Constitutional Kleptocracy, at 1919 n.31. United States v. 25 Packages of Panama Hats, 231 U.S. 358, 361–62 (1913).

194. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, JR., THE COMMON LAW 28 (1881).

195. Panama Hats, 231 U.S. at 359.

196. Id. at 360.

197. Id. at 362.

198. Indeed, the Court made clear that the 1909 statute broadened liability for customs fraud to include consignors "beyond the seas" to close loopholes in the earlier statute. Castillo argued that it was not he but the consignor who made the valuation and did so while outside U.S. jurisdiction; to the Court, this was further reason why the goods were subject to forfeiture. Id. at 361–62.

offenses where true owners are unknown and the harmed party is the government are an inverted mirror-image of kleptocratic situations where it is the victims who are difficult to identify with particularity because the misappropriation harms numerous, anonymous individuals.[199] The relevance of customs forfeiture regimes to grand corruption cases lies in this core prudential consideration: where the evidence of the link between, say, judicially noticed corruption and the property at issue is so high that it results in a forfeiture order under the KI, the USDOJ's posture following the forfeiture resembles the administrative posture of customs officials with respect to post-forfeiture asset disposition obligations, if any. Absent a clear obligation to return the funds, and due to the lower evidentiary burden in both regimes, incentives for administrative overreach exist. The overall legitimacy of both customs and anti-corruption forfeiture schemes hinges on perceptions of even-handed application and objectively fair judicial review; Congress would do well to limit the discretionary scope of kleptocracy actions by harmonizing the conceptual definition of corruption, and clarifying evidentiary standards at each step of the forfeiture process (investigative findings, judicial notice of foreign grand corruption, and post-forfeiture asset return), and creating a statutory framework for asset return.[200]

D. Forfeiture of Estate

A harshly punitive mechanism at English common law was forfeiture of estate against convicted felons or traitors: the convict forfeited all his real property to a lord or the king and all chattels to the king.[201] The doctrine of "corruption of blood" was harsher still: the felony or treason conviction led to the legal severing of the convict's blood line, that is, his ability to bequeath property to his heirs.[202] Convicted felons and heirs thus suffered the loss of estate.[203] However, the penalty's reach was limited by the common law's recognition of the rights of innocent third parties:

199. These numerous individuals could also pursue claims on the basis of potentially cognizable group or class interests. "Class" as used herein alludes to the analogical American procedural vehicle of a "class action," recognizing that a diffused group of individuals may form a class of affected persons capable of aggregating their claims against a defendant. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23. This is not meant to suggest the existence of a class action right in kleptocracy contexts, especially in light of Morrison v. National Australia Bank Ltd., 561 U.S. 247 (2010), which limited extraterritorial jurisdiction under the Securities Exchange Act in the securities class action context, and the Court's recent decision in Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., 133 S. Ct. 1659 (2013), which limited extraterritorial jurisdiction under the Alien Tort Statute for "foreign cubed" claims arising from alleged gross violations of human rights.

200. Infra Section IV.

> The common law 'saved' to innocent parties all rights, title, uses, possession, . . . rents, leases, or other interests in the land. Moreover, if a felony statute specified that 'no corruption of blood' must occur or if the statute 'saved to the heirs' the offender's land, the offender's wife did not lose her dower rights and the offender's heirs could inherit the convicted offender's land interests.[204]

The law offered a remedy, then, not to the convicted felon but certainly to those who could prove their status as innocent third parties, or, in some cases, as heirs with rights safeguarded by law.

At first glance, forfeiture of estate seems to offer little of use to the kleptocracy asset context. Yet perhaps a poetic analogy can be made between the "corruption of blood" doctrine and the practical effects of non-return of forfeited assets. In the case of a decedent who was adjudicated "corrupt," the seizure of assets eliminates heirs' rights to the property; an unintended consequence of non-return is the denial of the forfeited resources to future generations in the country concerned.[205] As such, the accompanying doctrine of saving the rights of innocent third parties might be a metaphoric expression of the USDOJ-KI's stated, ultimate goal.

---

201. Michael Paul Austern Cohen, The Constitutional Infirmity of RICO Forfeiture, 46 WASH. & LEE L. REV. 937, 937 (1989).

202. Cecil Greek, Drug Control and Asset Seizures: A Review of the History of Forfeiture in England and Colonial America, in DRUGS, CRIME AND SOCIAL POLICY 109, 112 (Thomas Mieczkowski, ed., 1992).

203. Id.

204. Cohen, supra note 201, at 937 n.2 (citation omitted).

205. Of course, nepotism often characterizes kleptocratic regimes, making it important that the property rights of corrupt individuals be taken away in an analogue to forfeiture of estate: Equatorial Guinea is a case in point; see supra Section II.C.3.

E. Criminal Forfeiture

Criminal forfeiture involves the seizure of property connected with the commission of a crime; historically, it bears some relation to the deodand. Underlying offenses could be many. Unlike forfeiture of estate, it involved the government's seizing of property linked to the commission of a crime, rather than all the property in the estate of the criminal. Two important contemporary cases underline the harshness of this type of forfeiture in providing no protection for innocent owners or co-owners. In Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663 (1974), the owner-lessor of a yacht suffered forfeiture of the vessel by Puerto Rican police authorities when a marijuana cigarette was found, apparently belonging to the lessees. Despite the owner-lessor's lack of knowledge, much less consent, with regard to the use of illegal drugs on the yacht, the Supreme Court upheld the forfeiture.[206] The Court was guided largely by the lack of any mitigating provisions in the relevant Puerto Rican statute.[207]

An even harsher outcome came in Bennis v. Michigan, 516 U.S. 442 (1996). There, a man was convicted of gross indecency for an act with a prostitute and the government seized the automobile in which the act occurred.[208] The man's wife objected to the forfeiture of her interest in the motor vehicle; the Court rejected her innocent owner defense and upheld the forfeiture.[209]

Interestingly, legal history shows a series of attempts in the English common law "to mitigate the harshness of felony and deodand forfeitures" through the availability of "[t]he writ of restitution . . . to an individual whose goods were stolen by a thief and forfeited to the crown as a consequence of the thief's conviction."[210] Thus even the regime of criminal forfeiture afforded rightful owners some opportunity to recover.

---

206. Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663 (1974).

207. Id. at 686–87. The Puerto Rican statute authorizing forfeiture of the yacht was P.R. LAWS ANN. tit. § 2512(a)(4) (Supp. 1973). Id. at 665–66.

208. Bennis v. Michigan, 516 U.S. 442, 443–44 (1996).

209. Id. at 452–53. The legal authority under which both the husband's and wife's interests in the vehicle were taken by the State of Michigan was the nuisance abatement statute, MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. § 600.3801 (West Supp. 1995). Id. at 444.

210. Calero-Toledo, 416 U.S. at 689 n.27.

The harshness of recent application of criminal forfeiture doctrine, with its effective indifference to the plight of innocent co-owners of tainted property, offers little in the way of useful parallels to the kleptocracy context. However, the historical provision for the writ of restitution provides an analogue that seems useful both in connection with a private right of action to claim ownership of forfeited assets, and as potentially adaptable to a claim for constructive return on behalf of a population affected by corruption.

F. Seizure of Stolen Property as Evidence

When the government takes possession without claiming title, as in a criminal proceeding where law enforcement seized allegedly stolen property, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure offer recourse through a motion to return property. The relevant rule states:

> A person aggrieved by an unlawful search and seizure of property or by the deprivation of property may move for the property's return. The motion must be filed in the district where the property was seized. The court must receive evidence on any factual issue necessary to decide the motion. If it grants the motion, the court must return the property to the movant, but may impose reasonable conditions to protect access to the property and its use in later proceedings.[211]

The federal rule, along with various state statutes,[212] provide for the return of property seized by the government in two

---

211. FED. R. CRIM. PRO. 41(g).

212. States take a variety of approaches in dealing with the return of private property following seizure in criminal or other contexts. Under Wisconsin law, for example, "any person claiming the right to possession of property seized pursuant to [or without] a search warrant . . . may apply for its return to the circuit court for the county in which the property was seized . . . ." WIS. STAT. ANN. § 968.20(1) (Westlaw 2016). Tennessee law offers another perspective, Tenn. Code Ann. § 40-17-118 requires that stolen property confiscated by law enforcement be appraised, catalogued and photographed; that the prosecutor show cause to the court with jurisdiction over the property in order to impound it sorts of cases: one where the property was wrongly seized and thus without actual taint of criminality, the other where the property was justly seized from a wrongdoer, but a third party to the seizure asserts her claim as rightful owner of the property.[213] The latter most closely matches the kleptocracy context, particularly where claims for the return of the property emanate from victim groups.

G. Civil Asset (or In Rem) Forfeiture[214]

Civil asset forfeiture, also known as in rem forfeiture, is based on ancient jurisprudence; but until 1970 its use in U.S. law beyond thirty days; and that the state or local authority holding the property return it to its lawful owner, with liability for damage or destruction caused by delay in the return. Persons asserting a claim to property in government possession can move for return of the property pursuant to the statute. See, e.g., Maness v. Woods, No. W2000-01049-COA-R3-CV, 2001 WL 29457 (Tenn. Ct. App. Jan. 10, 2001). The additional circumstance that occurs when the government damages or loses seized property gives rise to no statutory claim for compensation, unlike the case of civil asset forfeiture. David B. Smith, A Comparison of Federal Civil and Criminal Forfeiture Procedures: Which Provides More Protections for Property Owners?, Legal Memorandum No. 158, HERITAGE FOUNDATION (Jul. 30, 2015), http://www.heritage.org/research/reports/2015/07/a-comparison-of-federal-civil-and-criminal-forfeiture-procedures-which-provides-more-protections-for-property-owners.

---

213. In describing a typology for asset seizure, forfeiture, and return, it must be borne in mind that we are inevitably dealing in heuristics. There is, of course, a large number of legal regimes governing forfeiture and the rights of innocent third-parties and/or victims. Some of the most elaborate arise in various criminal contexts which, in their essence, are mainly matters of state law. A detailed account of the full array of legal theories for the return of seized property lies well outside the scope of this Note. What is worth noting is that in the bribery context, the property notions are more complicated than in, say, embezzlement from the fisc—there is no warrant for the bald assertion that "the funds were stolen from the people" of the country in which the bribe was received. See supra Section II.C.2. Among the colorable claims in corruption cases, however, is that of "theft of honest services." See 18 U.S.C. § 1346 (the federal mail and wire fraud statute). One could continue cataloguing the various allied federal/state/foreign, statutory/administrative/common law, historical/contemporary/emerging doctrines, but while inherently useful, such a taxonomy lies, again, far outside the present scope.

214. See supra notes 81–85 and accompanying text & Table 2.

was limited mainly to maritime, revenue, and wartime contexts.[215] Two landmark pieces of legislation in 1970 ushered in a new era: the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act, 21 U.S.C. § 881, and the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961–1968.[216] The scope of application of those statutes, as well as the total number of statutes that contemplate civil asset forfeiture, have both expanded dramatically in the nearly half-century since—now some 150 federal statutes (not to mention state laws) provide for the use of this enforcement mechanism.[217]

The distinctions between civil asset forfeiture and its criminal "cousin" are significant (see Table 2). Perhaps most important from a prosecutorial standpoint is that forfeiture requires no criminal conviction; indeed, the property owner need not even be present.[218] The lower burden of preponderance of the evidence is all that is required for a showing that the property is traceable to statutorily covered criminal conduct.[219] Formerly the even more modest standard of "probable cause" was all that was required in civil asset forfeiture prosecutions; the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000 (CAFRA), which aimed to put an end to the most abusive features of the civil forfeiture regime then in place, changed the standard to the higher one of "preponderance of the evidence." But even this reform had an exception in which the old, lower standard still prevailed: the so-called "customs carve-out," 18 U.S.C. § 983(i).[220]

---

215. Herpel, supra note 192, at 1914–15. The wartime use was as a mechanism to seize enemy property. Id.

216. Mary M. Cheh, Forfeiture, ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CRIME AND JUSTICE (2002), http://www.encyclopedia.com/topic/Forfeiture.aspx.

217. Id.

218. WAGNER, supra note 81, at 8, 13, 14.

219. Id. Regarding other prosecutorial advantages to one or the other mechanism, see supra notes 81–85 and accompanying text.

220. Smith, supra note 212, at No. 7; U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE, Policy Manual: Asset Forfeiture Policy Manual 51, Chap. 1, Sec. II.C (2016), https://www.justice.gov/criminal-afmls/file/839521/download.. Though known as the "customs carve-out," the exception to the CAFRA reform provisions also applies to IRS and FDA forfeitures as well as seizures pursuant to the Trading With the Enemy Act. FORFEITURE ENDANGERS AM. RIGHTS FOUND, How to Determine Whether Your Case is Governed by CAFRA or Falls in the 'Customs Carve Out' Exception, FEAR.ORG (Jul. 20, 2014) http://fear.org/1/pages/law-

Return of assets to rightful owners does not even figure in most accounts of this forfeiture regime. On the contrary, the use of such assets by law enforcement itself is a major aspect of civil asset forfeiture practice, leading to considerable criticism of what some see as a perverse financial incentive for overreach by police and prosecutors.[221] Federal agencies, too, "share among themselves the proceeds of jointly conducted forfeiture" and "transfer hundreds of millions of dollars . . . to state, local, and foreign law enforcement . . . ."[222]

In spite of recent reforms, in rem civil forfeiture as a whole seems to offer little in the way of encouraging analogues for the library/federal-forfeiture-statutes/federal-forfeiture-procedure/customs-carve-out.php. The carve-out marks one of the limits of the reform drive's success. Another CAFRA reform "amended 28 U.S.C. § 2680(c), a provision of the Federal Tort Claims Act, to provide a damage remedy for property owners who prevail in a civil forfeiture case where the law enforcement agency has lost, destroyed, or damaged the property." Smith, supra note 212, at No. 9. However, even this remedy has been rendered almost meaningless by court holdings that the damage remedy is unavailable if the property was also seized as possible evidence of a crime. Smith, supra note 212, at No. 9.

---

221. Smith, supra note 212, at No. 9. A large and growing body of legal scholarship and popular political discourse from across the ideological spectrum subjects civil asset forfeiture by police to withering criticism. LEONARD LEVY, LICENSE TO STEAL: THE FORFEITURE OF PROPERTY (1996); for a review of Levy's book, see Herpel, supra note 192. A prominent recent instance of such critique: the Cato Institute, on the libertarian Right of the political spectrum, sponsored a 2010 public policy forum, "Policing for Profit: The Abuse of Civil Asset Forfeiture." The forum was linked to a book by the ideologically kindred Institute for Justice: MARIAN R. WILLIAMS, ET AL., POLICING FOR PROFIT: THE ABUSE OF CIVIL ASSET FORFEITURE (2010). Two decades earlier, Cato published REP. HENRY HYDE, FORFEITING OUR PROPERTY RIGHTS: IS YOUR PROPERTY SAFE FROM SEIZURE? (1995). An instance from the left is Chloe Cockburn, Easy Money: Civil Asset Forfeiture Abuse by Police, ACLU SPEAKING FREELY BLOG (Feb. 3, 2010 1:16 PM), https://www.aclu.org/blog/easy-money-civil-asset-forfeiture-abuse-police. A scholarly critique of a famous forfeiture case is Charlena Toro, From Piracy to Prostitution: State Forfeiture of an Innocent Owner's Property: Bennis v. Michigan, 11 BYU J. PUB. L. 209 (1997). For a critique of civil asset forfeiture urging reforms to curtail abuses while preserving the process as an important law enforcement tool, see Eric Moores, Note, Reforming the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act, 51 ARIZ. L. REV. 777 (2009).

222. CHARLES DOYLE, CONG. RESEARCH SERV., CRIME AND FORFEITURE, (2015), https://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/97-139.pdf.

kleptocracy asset context. The practice of civil forfeiture is a powerful mechanism for taking property, not for its return. The criticism of in rem civil forfeiture exposes potential dark sides of KI prosecutions and serve as illuminating reminders of how institutional legitimacy depends on judicious consideration and internalization of these critiques.

H. Constructive Trust

The equitable doctrine of constructive trust offers a mechanism for "a court [to] recognize[] that a claimant has a better right to certain property than the person who has legal title to it."[223] The doctrine has been described as a key "flexible restitutionary device that imposes an equitable duty . . . to convey property acquired under certain circumstances to the rightful owner."[224] The essence of the trust as a property-law doctrine is "separation of 'legal' and 'equitable' title. The trustee holds legal title to the trust property and manages that property for the benefit of the beneficiaries, who have the right of beneficial enjoyment of the property."[225]

Justice Cardozo, writing for the majority in Beatty v. Guggenheim Exploration Co., 122 N.E. 378 (N.Y. 1919), stated the principle thus: "When property has been acquired in such circumstances that the holder of legal title may not in good conscience retain the beneficial interest" equity converts him into a trustee.[226] The typical elements for an equitable trust were a confidential or fiduciary relation, a promise, a transfer in reliance thereon, and unjust enrichment.[227] The New York Court of Appeals later pulled back from such requirements, emphasizing that "[u]njust enrichment . . . does not require the performance of any wrongful act by the one enriched. Innocent parties may frequently be unjustly enriched."[228]

The constructive trust doctrine seems a promising way forward for the emerging forfeiture regime because it offers a frame-

223. Constructive Trust, BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY (10th ed. 2014).

224. ELAINE SHOBEN, WILLIAM TABB, RACHEL JANUTIS, THOMAS MAIN, REMEDIES 917 (6th ed., 2016).

225. JESSE DUKEMINIER, ET AL., PROPERTY 295 (8th ed. 2014).

226. Sharp v. Kosmalski, 351 N.E.2d 721, 723 (N.Y. 1976) (quoting Beatty v. Guggenheim Exploration Co., 122 N.E. 378, 380 (N.Y. 1919)).

227. Id.

228. Simonds v. Simonds, 380 N.E.2d 189, 194 (N.Y. 1978).

work for reconciling the finality of 18 U.S.C. § 981(f), resulting in full vesting of title to forfeited assets in the USG, with a variety of possible equitable and legal remedies. Objection to the constructive trust doctrine in the forfeiture regime might be framed in procedural or institutional terms—specifically, the concern that U.S. courts would be ill-equipped to effectuate constructive-trust remedies in the kleptocracy context given the vast sums involved and the breadth of jurisdictional coverage; however, one recent high-profile federal case showed that federal courts are adept at using the vehicle of constructive trusts in extremely complex, multi-jurisdictional cases involving corruption issues.[229] The next section will sketch the outlines of a possible statutory scheme within the overall embrace of a constructive trust approach.

IV. "FOUR R'S" IN A CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST FRAMEWORK

This Note suggests a series of possible reforms focusing on the post-forfeiture disposition of assets under the Kleptocracy Initiative built on the fundamental notion that the United States government, through the USDOJ, act as a fiduciary overseeing assets held in trust for the benefit of the people from whom they were stolen. Assaying the existing array of options USDOJ-KI has and exploring where those options can be enhanced and complemented, this Note sketches a possible statutory reform providing USDOJ-KI prosecutors with a post-forfeiture framework of "Four R's" to guide them in the disposition of assets. By providing guidance through an orderly decision-making process for the disposition of forfeited assets, Congress can free the USDOJ from the politically and diplomatically contentious "discretion to return."[230]

229. Chevron Corp. v. Donziger, 974 F. Supp. 2d 362, 640–41 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). For an approving view of the Second Circuit's employment of constructive-trust doctrine, see William E. Thomson et al., Rule of Law Trumps Rhetoric in Chevron's 2nd Circ. Win, LAW360 (Aug. 19, 2016, 12:50 PM), http://www.gibsondunn.com/publications/Documents/Thomson-Scolnick-Mefford-Rule-Of-Law-Trumps-Rhetoric-In-Chevrons-2nd-Circ-Win-Law360-8-19-16.pdf; for a critical view, see Brief of International Law Professors as Amici Curiae in Support of Reversal (filed Jul. 8, 2014), Chevron v. Donziger, No. 14-0826 (2d Cir. 2016).

230. See Oluwafunmilayo Akinosi, Asset Recovery, supra note 166; see also supra note 20. In addition to the discretionary nature of the return of for-

The four tools contained in this sketch for a possible reform scheme are (1) Repatriation, i.e. transferring the assets to the government of the country in question; (2) Restitution, i.e. the creation of a private right of action for individuals or groups seeking to recover assets stolen from them by the kleptocrat whose assets were the subject of the forfeiture action; (3) Reparations, i.e. constructive return of the assets to the people through an appropriate, responsible non-governmental organization ("NGO") or organizations; (4) Reimbursement, i.e. retention of funds by USDOJ to help defray some of its prosecution costs and for potential sharing with FBI or other investigative entity—domestic, foreign, or international—that aided the prosecution.

Repatriation of assets to the relevant national government is the first "R," to be done where practicable on both prudential and ethical grounds. "[H]ow . . . property [will] be returned to the state requesting it"[231] is the heart of the asset-recovery part of the UNCAC treaty framework that forms the underlying legal foundation for Kleptocracy Initiative work. Yet clearly, multiple real-world cases have presented themselves where returning funds to the government in question seems to defeat the very purposes of the Initiative by inviting a repeat of the original misappropriation.[232]

Where it is not possible or desirable to repatriate forfeited assets to the government currently in power in the relevant State, the statutory reform would allow for restitution to individuals with claims to forfeited assets, through the creation of a private right of action under the Initiative. Similar reforms have been proposed to other statutory schemes involving international corruption, most notably the FCPA.[233] feited assets, it is noteworthy that the statutory language authorizing such return makes use of the legally imprecise term "country." 18 U.S.C. § 981(i)(1) (20130. The ambiguity in the statutory language warrants legislative drafting review.

---

231. United Nations Convention Against Corruption: Convention Highlights, UNITED NATIONS OFFICE ON DRUGS AND CRIME, https://www.unodc.org/unodc/en/treaties/CAC/convention-highlights.html (last visited Aug. 29, 2016).

232. See supra note 151 and corresponding text.

233. Nika Antonikova makes some partly analogous proposals with respect to private-sector corruption. She urges twin reforms of the FCPA, the first

A third option, reparations, is conceived of as a collective, constructive restoration of assets to the people through an appropriately chosen and monitored non-governmental organization ("NGO") or organizations.[234] The BOTA Foundation stands as the most solidly grounded, well executed exemplar of this solution.[235] The remarkable outcome to the Kazakhstan kleptocracy prosecution via creation of a charitable foundation inspires hope. However, the fact that it is the lone case where this has occurred underlines the difficulties facing this option. Most notably, the Equatorial Guinea forfeiture is one in which the absence of a BOTA-like solution has been most glaring. It is not clear, however, why the United Nations, World Health Organization, and other multilateral organizations with strong infrastructure and long experience have not also been considered as possible vehicles for constructive return of forfeited kleptocratic assets.[236]

Fourth, reimbursement would allow USDOJ to help defray some of its costs in bringing Kleptocracy Initiative actions, as well of which would create a private right of action for victims of private sector corruption to recover damages. Nika A. Antonikova, Private Sector Corruption in International Trade: The Need for Heightened Reporting and a Private Right of Action in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, 11 BYU INT'L L. & MGMT. REV. 93, 121–23 (2015). Delphia Lim et al. make a similar argument for the creation of a private right of action in Access to Remedies for Transnational Public Bribery: A Governance Gap, 28 CRIM. JUST. L. 35 (2013). A related proposal is to create mechanisms for redistributing FCPA penalties so as to benefit the populations harmed by the bribery in question. Id. at 43–44.

---

234. Lim et al. argue, in addition to a private right of action under the FCPA, for the creation of what they call a "public interest-based right of action" under the statute. Lim et al., supra note 233 at 44–45. Broadly, they advocate moving away from regarding the fines collected under the FCPA as U.S. federal revenue, instead shifting to a conceptualization of potential "remedies" aimed at providing public benefit in the countries affected. Id. Their suggestion is akin to what this Note refers to as "reparation," or a collective, constructive restoration of funds to the people of a national state affected by kleptocratic wrongdoing. It also has features in common with the notion of the USG holding forfeited assets in trust.

235. See supra Section II.C.2.

236. Such arrangements would comport with current calls for reforms in United Nations funding and practice, in the direction of partnerships with civil society, business, and other stakeholders. UNITED NATIONS GLOBAL COMPACT OFFICE, BUSINESS UNUSUAL: FACILITATING UNITED NATIONS REFORM THROUGH PARTNERSHIPS 1–3 (2005).

as to equitably share with cooperating law enforcement or investigative agencies; the reform would cap this option by statute so as to reduce the perception of self-interested agency behavior or prosecutorial overreach, and thereby enhance the legitimacy of the Initiative. The statutory cap, or limit, would be the smaller of 12.5% (one-eighth of the forfeited assets) or $50 million.[237] This fourth "R" would function similarly to the reasonable administrative fee courts will customarily permit a trustee to deduct from trust assets the trustee administers.[238] The one-eighth share also comports with the "salvage" amount in piracy-related seizure actions, dampening critiques based on arbitrariness.[239]

Perhaps most importantly, all four options would be placed within a framework that could be termed a "derivative constructive trust." The purpose of this overall framework is to place forfeited assets in a clearer legal status as property. This is necessary because the civil forfeiture statute that furnishes the procedural framework for USDOJ-KI actions provides that forfeited assets vest fully in the USG.[240] The trust framework enables us to uncouple legal title, held by the USG upon forfeiture, from equitable title, which could be asserted by victims' groups.[241]

Applying the constructive-trust doctrine to the sorts of ill-gotten assets forfeited by the USDOJ-KI, the "unjust enrichment" aspect of the mechanism would, in effect, "pass through" to the United States Government. The "pass-through" of the taint is the 237. In other words, a 12.5% share capped at $50 million. The logic behind the proposed cap is this: the largest single forfeiture accomplished by the Kleptocracy Initiative as of the date of this writing, against former Nigerian dictator Gen. Sani Abacha, was for approximately $458 million; a one-eighth share of that forfeiture would be just over $50 million. The cap would play a further, legitimizing function; USDOJ would not be rewarded simply for the size of the forfeitures it achieves, beyond a certain point. Again, the perception of self-interested conduct would be reduced.

---

238. This "reimbursement" provision is also analogous to UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION AGAINST CORRUPTION, supra note 35, at 47–48, art. 57, para. 4, making it possible to "deduct reasonable expenses incurred in investigations, prosecutions, or . . . proceedings . . . ."

239. See supra note 189 and corresponding text.

240. "All right, title, and interest in property described in subsection (a) of this section shall vest in the United States upon commission of the act giving rise to forfeiture under this section." 18 U.S.C. § 981(f) (2013).

241. See supra note 199 and corresponding text.

derivative aspect of this form of constructive trust. In other words, while there is no assertion that the U.S. itself was guilty of malfeasance, there would be an analogy to the receipt of stolen property; the taint attaching to the assets would still be there. A court order mandating a trusteeship would constitute an institutionalized, judicially-overseen effort to return stolen property to its true owners.

Turning back to Justice Cardozo,[242] we could view the dubious acquisition of the property as effected, not by the United States, but by the defendant in the action giving rise to the original forfeiture. The phrase "has been acquired in such circumstances," therefore, need not refer to the acquisition by the United States; rather, it can refer to the prior link in the chain of title—the illegitimate acquisition yielding invalid title and exposing the acquirer to USDOJ-KI prosecution.

The first and fourth options already exist, and the third has been attempted at least once. The proposed statutory framework would offer a coherent, unified protocol for choosing and implementing the pertinent option or options in a given asset forfeiture.[243] Though the framework can be viewed as a set of constraints on the USDOJ, it can best be understood instead as liberating the agency from external critiques of selective prosecution and

---

242. Sharp v. Kosmalski, 351 N.E.2d 721, 723 (N.Y. 1976) (quoting Beatty v. Guggenheim Exploration Co., 122 N.E. 378, 380 (N.Y. 1919)).

243. Like concerns are shared by a number of contemporary legal scholars. See Jorene Soto, Show Me the Money: The Application of the Asset Forfeiture Provisions of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and Suggestions for the Future, 23 PENN. ST. INT'L L. REV. 365 (2004) (advocating more robust international cooperation to use the statute's forfeiture provisions in ways adapted to the particular characteristics of international sex trafficking and help undermine the trade's profitability); Amy M. Schaldenbrand, The Constitutional and Jurisdictional Limitations of In Rem Jurisdiction in Forfeiture Actions: A Response to International Forfeiture and the Constitution: The Limits of Forfeiture Jurisdiction Over Foreign Assets Under 28 U.S.C. 1355(B)(2), 38 SYRACUSE J. INT'L L. & COM. 55 (2010) (urging caution on constitutionality and comity where U.S. courts assert jurisdiction over assets located in countries whose government is not cooperating with the U.S. court); Bruce Zagaris, International Enforcement Law Trends for 2010 and Beyond: Can the Cops Keep Up with the Criminals?, 34 SUFFOLK TRANSNAT'L L. REV. 1 (2011) (advocating creation of innovative tools to help face complex new challenges in international white-collar and related kinds of crime).

institutional self-interest and enabling a more transparent process of decision-making.

V. CONCLUSION

In its half-dozen years of operation, the USDOJ's Kleptocracy Initiative can point to some remarkable successes and a track record in which substantial experience has been built up on the complex global terrain of pursuing the proceeds of corrupt leaders. Yet, for all the immense investigative resources and legal acumen at its disposal, the KI often finds its targets to be formidable adversaries in the courts. The KI is also vulnerable to a range of critiques on issues ranging from the inevitably political framework in which it operates to perceived (and possibly real) unilaterality and arbitrariness. Perhaps most problematic is the destiny of funds after their forfeiture. Indeed, the widely varying post-forfeiture outcomes of USDOJ-KI prosecutions remain a continuing source of disquiet and mistrust.

At the same time, Voltaire's famous aphorism contains real-life wisdom: "Perfect is the enemy of good."[244] Samuel Johnson memorably expressed perfectionism in the context of scholarship as "prescrib[ing] to [oneself] such a degree of exactness as human diligence cannot attain."[245] The analogy between scholarship and policy is inexact, but the caution is invaluable. The challenge is to safeguard the good in the KI and shore up its weaknesses.

In reflecting on the future of the KI and possible reforms, we must also understand anticorruption efforts in a far longer durée than even the doctrinal sources surveyed here. Condemnation of corruption runs like a long thread through human civilization

244. The original French: "Le mieux est l'ennemi du bien." Proverbes, LINTERN@UTE, http://www.linternaute.com/proverbe/694/le-mieux-est-l-ennemi-du-bien/. The maxim is often cited in the negative: "Let perfect not be the enemy of good" or, more informally, "Don't let the perfect be the enemy of the good."

245. SAMUEL JOHNSON, NO. 65 FATE OF POSTHUMOUS WORKS., (1759), reprinted in THE IDLER, http://www.johnsonessays.com/the-idler/fate-posthumous-works/. Johnson further urged, "Let it always be remembered that life is short, that knowledge is endless, and that many doubts deserve not to be cleared." Id.

and appears to be universal.[246] Roman imperial law "forbade all enrichment by senatorial officials, allowing only certain specific exceptions[.]"[247] The Old Testament prophets railed against bribery, as in the admonition to judges in Deuteronomy: "Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous."[248] Our most elaborate taxonomy (and hierarchy) of the despicable, Dante's Inferno, reserved the eighth and ninth circles of hell for the lowest of the low: those who, in committing "fraud, a form of malice . . . unique to human beings[,] . . . victimize someone with whom they share a special bond of trust."[249]

Against this backdrop of solemn, even pious censure of corruption, one tradition comes down to us as so jovial in its poetic justice, so comically rooted in the wicked reality of human appetite, as to prove irresistible. I have in mind the purported early English custom of the "weigh-in," where elected officials were weighed at the start and end of their time in office; to grow heavier over the term of office was taken as a sign and proxy for corrup-

246. JOHN T. NOONAN, JR., BRIBES 702–03 (1984). The cynical response is not long in coming: if the thread of condemnation is universal, so must be the corruption it condemns.

247. P.A. Brunt, Charges of Provincial Maladministration under the Early Principate, 10 HISTORIA: ZEITSCHRIFT FÜR ALTE GESCHICHTE 189, 191 (1961).

248. Deuteronomy 16:19 (King James).

249. Fraud: Pimping and Seducing (18), Flattery (18), Simony (19), Sorcery (20), Political Corruption (21-2), Hypocrisy (23), UNIV. OF TEXAS AT AUSTIN, http://danteworlds.laits.utexas.edu/circle8a.html#fraud (last visited Nov. 21, 2016). Many other cultural touchstones can be cited; just a few example include Martin Luther, who inveighed against the Roman Church's sale of indulgences, saying that "[t]here is no divine authority for preaching that so soon as the penny jingles into the money-box, the soul flies" out of purgatory, but that the ringing of the coin in the box surely signaled "gain and avarice," MARTIN LUTHER, 95 THESES, Nos. 27–28 (last updated Mar. 27, 2013), http://www.crivoice.org/creed95theses.html; Hugh Latimer, the destitute Anglican bishop, giving pungent expression to the Christian anticorruption tradition: "If a judge should ask me the way to hell, I would show him this way: First, . . . let his heart be poisoned with covetousness," NOONAN, supra note 246, at 315 (quoting Hugh Latimer, Fifth Sermon (April 5, 1549)); and Geoffrey Chaucer, who appears to have introduced "bribe" and related words into the English language, "although shaded more to extortion than to voluntary offering." NOONAN, supra note 246, at 315.

tion and led to the pelting of the offending officeholder with rotten fruit and other measures of crowd justice.[250]

Our world is unfathomably more complex than that of our ancestors, the levers of power and the schemes for its abuse intricate beyond the wildest imaginings of Dante Alighieri or the Hebrew prophets. But it may be there is nothing new under the sun. Today's kleptocrats spin novel variations on the oldest of themes; a new chapter is added, but the book is ancient. This long view of human venality and power's abuse of the weak may make today's prosecutors feel a bit like Sisyphus with his rock. Yet perhaps there is grandeur in this view of corruption, in situating the battle over kleptocracy within the annals of human culture—and nobility in working to ensure that high justice is administered justly.

---

250. A weigh-in is still performed every May on brass scales in the middle of the town square of High Wycombe, near London. Kimiko de Freytas-Tamura, A British Town Weighs Its Officials' Merits, With Scales, N.Y. TIMES (May 18, 2016), http://www.nytimes.com/2016/05/19/world/what-in-the-world/high-wycombe-england-annual-weigh-in.html. Whether this ritual is a true survival of an ancient practice or just a bit of madcap humor, we have to say with the Italians, "Se non è vero è ben trovato" [Even if it is not true, it sounds awfully good].

Animal Abuse and Domestic Violence: Why the Connection Justifies Increased Protection

OLIVIA S. GARBER*

I. INTRODUCTION 360
II. THE LINK BETWEEN ANIMAL ABUSE AND DOMESTIC VIOLENCE 361
A. Animal Abuse and Children...362
1. Childhood Exposure to Violence Leads to Childhood Animal Abuse...363
2. A Childhood History of Animal Abuse Leads to Violence Towards Humans 364
B. Animal Abuse and Intimate Partner Abuse Victims.........366
III. LEGISLATIVE RESPONSE TO THE LINK 371
A. Cross-reporting Statutes..372
B. Psychological Treatment Provisions in Animal Cruelty Laws..373
IV. CLOSING THE LEGISLATIVE GAP IN PROTECTION 379
A. Current Status of Animal Cruelty Laws in Tennessee......380
B. The Duty to Cross-Report Needs to Be a Two-Way Street..382
C. The Need for Mandatory Psychological Evaluation and Treatment..385
V. CONCLUSION 389

---

* Juris Doctorate Candidate, 2017, The University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. I would like to thank Professor John Newman and Phoebe Dossett for providing me with their invaluable time and insight throughout the writing of this Note.

I. INTRODUCTION

In 2015, Tennessee lawmakers enacted the Tennessee Animal Abuser Registration Act, creating the nation's first statewide animal abuse registry.[1] The registry, which was released on January 1, 2016, is a publicly accessible, online database of convicted animal cruelty offenders.[2] Upon a person's first conviction for an animal abuse offense, the person's photo, name, and any other identifying information deemed necessary by the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation ("TBI") will be listed on the state's public registry for two years.[3] A subsequent conviction will earn the offender five years on the registry.[4] The bill was initially proposed in order to "take a stand against animal cruelty" by deterring acts of animal abuse, but some Tennessee lawmakers feel that the registry will prove to be an effective tool for protecting human victims as well.[5]

Over the last few decades, research studies and statistics have revealed the connection between animal abuse and interpersonal violence, especially highlighting the relationship between animal abuse and domestic violence.[6] Against this backdrop, many states have enacted laws aimed at detecting, preventing, and treating these often-interrelated forms of familial abuse.[7] Tennessee's innovative registry has thrust the state into the spotlight, making it a trendsetter in the animal-law world.[8] Tennessee is now in position to serve as a working model for other states hoping to

---

1. TENN. CODE ANN. §§ 40-39-101 to -103 (West 2016).
2. See id. § 40-39-103.
3. Id. § 40-39-103(d)(1) (Westlaw).
4. Id. § 40-39-103(d)(2) (Westlaw).
5. Arin Greenwood, Tennessee Will Soon Have First Statewide Animal Abuse Registry, HUFFINGTON POST (Nov. 4, 2015 3:34 PM), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/entry/tennessee-animal-abuse-registry_56392877e4b0411d306eaf90 (quoting Senator Jeff Yarbro).
6. See Angela Campbell, Note, The Admissibility of Evidence of Animal Abuse in Criminal Trials for Child and Domestic Abuse, 43 B.C. L. REV 463, 464–65 (2002).
7. Id. at 467–68.
8. See New State Animal Abuser Registries Proposed in 2016, NAT'L ANTI-VIVISECTION SOC'Y (Jan. 21, 2016), https://www.navs.org/news/new-state-animal-abuser-registries-proposed-in-2016.

bolster the strength and scope of protection of their animal cruelty laws.

This Note argues that Tennessee lawmakers should take this opportunity to improve the state's existing laws and increase protection for both animals and humans. Part II of this Note highlights the statistically proven link between animal abuse and domestic violence. Part III will discuss the nationwide, legislative response to this cyclical pattern of violence, focusing primarily on cross-reporting statutes and psychological evaluation and treatment provisions in animal cruelty laws. Part IV will examine the current status of Tennessee animal cruelty laws. Part IV will also propose two statutory measures that, if enacted, would increase protection of both animals and humans in Tennessee. First, Tennessee lawmakers should enact an inverse of the state's current cross-reporting statute, which requires health and human services agencies to report signs of animal abuse observed during the course of their employment, by imposing a reciprocal duty to report on animal welfare agents who encounter signs of domestic violence while acting in the scope of their employment. Second, Tennessee lawmakers should amend the penalty provisions in the state's current animal cruelty statutes to mandate—rather than merely allow—psychological evaluation and treatment both for juvenile offenders convicted of animal cruelty and for all offenders convicted of aggravated animal cruelty. Finally, Part V will conclude by urging Tennessee lawmakers to address the cyclical pattern of violence between animal abuse, child abuse, and intimate partner abuse by increasing the overall strength and comprehensiveness of the state's animal protection laws.

II. THE LINK BETWEEN ANIMAL ABUSE AND DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

The link between animal abuse and interpersonal violence has been discussed since the 14th Century, but it is only recently that law enforcement, courts, and mental health professionals have begun to acknowledge the connection.[9] Family violence and ani-

9. Facts About the Link Between Violence to People and Violence to Animals, AM. HUMANE, https://www.animalhumanesociety.org/webfm/574 (last visited Sept. 14, 2016).

mal abuse "go hand in hand" because the victims of domestic violence, child abuse, and animal abuse all share a common trait: their abusers are preying on the weak, vulnerable, and powerless.[10] Often, the relationship between the abuser and the victim is one of "economic dependence, strong emotional bonds, and an enduring sense of loyalty."[11] Where there is violence against a spouse, child, or animal within a home, the violence is rarely limited to just one form of abuse and one type of victim.[12] Detecting and deterring animal abuse in a home can lead to the discovery and prevention of other forms of violence against human family members in the home and vice versa.[13] Animal abuse may indicate the presence of other forms of abuse and types of victims within the home because, often, animal abuse is actually directed towards or linked to human family members.[14]

A. Animal Abuse and Children

The connection between animal abuse, child abuse, and interpersonal violence manifests itself through a continuous chain of events. Studies show that children who are exposed to animal abuse are likely to be victims of abuse themselves.[15] In turn, child abuse victims often harm animals in an attempt to release feelings of anger and aggression that stem from their own abuse.[16] Harming animals desensitizes children to violence and erodes their empathic development, which indicates a propensity to become increasingly violent towards fellow humans as the child progresses

---

10. Animal Abuse and Human Abuse: Partners in Crime, PETA, http://www.peta.org/issues/companion-animal-issues/companion-animals-factsheets/animal-abuse-human-abuse-partners-crime/ (last visited Sept. 14, 2016) [hereinafter Partners in Crime].

11. Campbell, supra note 6, at 478.

12. Id.

13. Charlotte A. Lacroix, Another Weapon for Combating Family Violence: Prevention of Animal Abuse, 4 ANIMAL L. 1, 4 (1998).

14. Campbell, supra note 6, at 478.

15. Childhood Cruelty to Animals: Breaking the Cycle of Abuse, HUMANE SOC'Y U.S., http://www.humanesociety.org/parents_educators/childhood_cruelty_breaking_cycle_abuse.html (last visited Sept. 14, 2016).

16. See id.

into adulthood.[17] Absent intervention, this sequential chain of events will continue to manifest itself in a cyclical pattern of abuse and violence.[18]

1. Childhood Exposure to Violence Leads to Childhood Animal Abuse

Parents who neglect or abuse family pets often subject children and other dependents in the home to similar treatment.[19] Particularly in cases of animal hoarding and neglect, it is common for authorities to also find children of the home living in extreme filth and unsanitary conditions.[20] When a person is unable to provide a baseline level of care for the family pet, children in the home are likely to experience the same neglect or abuse.[21] Animal abuse may also be used to exert psychological control over victimized children. Abusers frequently threaten or harm animals in order to coerce children to comply with or remain silent about their own abuse.[22] Children may be manipulated to keep the abuse a secret if they fear that disclosing the abuse will subject them to the same fate as the animal.[23]

Animal abuse is but one step in a continuous cycle of familial violence because children who are exposed to animal abuse "become desensitized to violence and the ability to empathize with victims."[24] Children who grow up in abusive homes—whether the abuse was directed towards the child, an animal in the home, or

---

17. Charles Siebert, The Animal-Cruelty Syndrome, N.Y. TIMES MAG. (June 11, 2010), http://www.nytimes.com/2010/06/13/magazine/13dogfighting-t.html?_r=0.

18. Id.

19. Partners in Crime, supra note 10.

20. Animal Cruelty and Human Violence: A Documented Connection, HUMANE SOC'Y U.S., http://www.humanesociety.org/issues/abuse_neglect/qa/cruelty_violence_connection_faq.html?referrer=https://www.google.com/ (last visited Sept. 14, 2016) [hereinafter A Documented Connection].

21. Id.

22. Campbell, supra note 6, at 466.

23. What is the Link, NAT'L LINK COALITION, http://nationallinkcoalition.org/what-is-the-link (last visited Sept. 14, 2016) [hereinafter What is the Link].

24. Id.

both—often develop "abuse reactive" behavior,[25] mimicking the abuse against pets or other vulnerable humans.[26] If an animal in the home is the victim of the abuse, a child may experience pain stemming from his empathy towards the beloved pet's suffering.[27] In an attempt to destroy his affectionate bond with the pet and rid himself of the resulting pain, the child may actually mimic the witnessed animal abuse.[28] Some children may even "kill the pet themselves in order to at least have some control over what they see as the animal's inevitable fate."[29] Conversely, if the child himself is the victim of abuse, he may lash out and harm the family pet in an expression of his own anger at being abused.[30]

2. A Childhood History of Animal Abuse Leads to Violence Towards Humans

A childhood history of animal abuse has been associated with one's lack of empathy towards others and an inability to restrain impulsive aggression.[31] A child's abusive behavior can become increasingly violent as he progresses into adulthood, thus perpetuating the cycle of animal abuse and interpersonal violence towards humans.[32] Of course, not every juvenile animal abuser will go on to engage in violent conduct towards humans later in his adult life, but sociological research has shown that there is a statistically significant connection between childhood animal abuse and later violence towards humans in adulthood.[33]

Many infamous psychopaths and serial killers began their criminal careers by harming animals before graduating to human victims.[34] Albert DeSalvo—the "Boston Strangler"—admitted to having shot arrows through orange crates containing cats and dogs

---

25. Siebert, supra note 17.
26. Id.
27. Id.
28. Id.
29. Id.
30. Campbell, supra note 6, at 466.
31. See Margit Livingston, Desecrating the Ark: Animal Abuse and the Law's Role in Prevention, 87 IOWA L. REV. 1, 44–45 (2001).
32. Id. at 45.
33. Id. at 49.
34. Id. at 43.

as a child, before he later went on to murder thirteen women from 1962–63.[35] David "Son of Sam" Berkowitz, who pled guilty to thirteen murders and attempted murders in 1978, had previously shot and killed his neighbor's Labrador Retriever after claiming the dog was directing him to kill others.[36] Jeffrey Dahmer, also known as the Milwaukee Cannibal, spent his childhood secretly capturing and torturing animals, once impaling a dog's head on a stick.[37] Dahmer went on to kill as many as seventeen people.[38] Columbine High School shooters Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, who murdered fifteen people before turning their guns on themselves, had also previously maimed animals.[39] In 1997, sixteen-year old Luke Woodham shot and killed his own mother, as well as two students, in a Mississippi school.[40] In a diary entry dated five months before the shooting, Woodham recounted the death of his dog, Sparkle:

> I made my first kill today. It was a loved one . . . . I'll never forget the howl she made. It sounded almost human . . . . I'll never forget the sound of her bones breaking under my might. I hit her so hard I knocked the fur off her neck . . . . It was true beauty.[41]

The link between childhood animal cruelty and violence towards humans is so strong that the Federal Bureau of Investigation ("FBI") treats juvenile animal cruelty as a red flag indicating

---

35. Id.

36. Id.

37. Campbell, supra note 6, at 467; Lorna Benson, Animal Cruelty May Be Sign of Deeper Human Problems, MPR NEWS (July 6, 2006), http://www.mprnews.org/story/2006/07/06/animalkillers.

38. Benson, supra note 37.

39. Debra L. Muller-Harris, Animal Violence Court: A Therapeutic Jurisprudence-Based Problem-Solving Court for the Adjudication of Animal Cruelty Cases Involving Juvenile Offenders and Animal Hoarders, 17 ANIMAL L. 313, 320 (2011).

40. Sherry Ramsey, Cause for Concern: Juveniles and Crimes of Animal Cruelty, JUV. & FAM. JUST. TODAY, Spring 2012, at 12–13.

41. Id. Note that Woodham referred to this act as simply his "first kill," which suggests he saw no distinction between his animal victim and his later human victims. Id.

habitually violent behavior.[42] The FBI also relies on prior reports of animal cruelty in assessing the potential threat an individual poses to society[43] and as part of its "serial killer triad which is used to profile suspects."[44] If a person commits violent acts against animals, the FBI recognizes that such behavior can signal a propensity to later abuse vulnerable human victims.[45] Because animal abuse is "prominently displayed in the histories of" violent criminals, the FBI treats "cruelty to animals and cruelty to humans as a continuum."[46]

B. Animal Abuse and Intimate Partner Abuse Victims

The relationship between animal abuse and intimate partner abuse is similar to that between animal abuse and child abuse because, in both scenarios, the abuser often uses the family pet as a pawn to manipulate and control his human victim.[47] The vast majority of U.S. pet owners consider their companion animals to be family members,[48] which supports the increasingly accepted classi-

---

42. Campbell, supra note 6, at 468.

43. See id.

44. Kirsten E. Brimer, Comment, Justice for Dusty: Implementing Mandatory Minimum Sentences for Animal Abusers, 113 PENN. ST. L. REV. 649, 655 (2008) (quoting People v. Dyer, 115 Cal. Rptr. 2d 527, 532 (Cal. Ct. App. 2002)).

45. See id.

46. Campbell, supra note 6, at 468 (quoting DORIS DAY ANIMAL FOUNDATION., THE VIOLENCE CONNECTION: AN EXAMINATION OF THE LINK BETWEEN ANIMAL ABUSE AND OTHER VIOLENT CRIMES, 6 (2004)).

47. Statistics show that intimate partner abuse is predominantly a crime against women. See Intimate Partner Violence, 1993–2010, U.S. DEP'T OF JUST., http://www.bjs.gov/content/pub/pdf/ipv9310.pdf (last visited Sept. 14, 2016) (explaining that "From 1994 to 2010, about 4 in 5 victims of intimate partner violence were female."). Accordingly, this Note will use masculine pronouns when referring to domestic violence abusers and feminine pronouns when referring to domestic violence victims.

48. More Than Ever, Pets Are Members of the Family, THE HARRIS POLL (July 16, 2015, 1:00 PM), http://www.theharrispoll.com/health-and-life/Pets-are-Members-of-the-Family.html. "More than three in five Americans (62%) have at least one pet in their household," and 95% of "all pet owners . . . consider their pets to be members of the family." Id. U.S. pet owners treat their pets as if they were human family members, with 71% of pet owners "frequently or occasionally" letting their animals sleep in their bed with them and 64% of pet own-fication of animal abuse as a form of domestic violence.[49] Intimate partner abuse victims in particular[50] tend to share close bonds with their pets because abusive partners often isolate their victims from emotionally supportive human relationships, leaving a pet as the victim's only source of affectionate interaction.[51] This bond, however, is a double-edged sword, as an especially close relationship between a battered woman and her animal may actually "increase the likelihood and severity of [the relationship's] exploitation."[52] Abusive partners use the animal as a coercive tool by threatening or actually harming the animal in order to control and inflict psychological trauma on the human victim.[53]

The physical vulnerability of the animal and the decreased risk of detection make this form of violence an especially appealing method of domestic abuse to abusive partners.[54] Abusive partners capitalize on the shortcomings of animal abuse detection and ers buying holiday gifts for their furry family members. Id. A smaller pool of pet owners (12%) have even taken out health insurance policies on their pets. Id.

---

49. See Vivek Upadhya, Comment, The Abuse of Animals as a Method of Domestic Violence: The Need for Criminalization, 63 EMORY L.J. 1163, 1175 (2014).

50. Id. "In interviews, abused women have described their companion animal as their 'baby,' 'child,' a part of the 'family,' and the 'center of our lives.'" Id. "Some victims have brought pictures of their animals to interviews, tearfully describing the relationship that they shared with their animal while simultaneously recounting the trauma of that same animal being threatened, harmed, or killed." Id.

51. Id. at 1175–76.

52. Id. at 1177; see also Clifton P. Flynn, Woman's Best Friend: Pet Abuse and the Role of Companion Animals in the Lives of Battered Women, 6 VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN 162, 169 (2000) (describing a study that found that "women whose pets were abused indicated stronger emotional attachment to their pets than women who did not report pet abuse."). Interestingly, the closeness of the bond between the women and their pets also correlated with whether the woman had children. Id. Of the women surveyed who had children, 37% said their pets were very important to them emotionally, but one third of the women said they were not at all important. Id. In contrast, 64.3% of the women with no children reported that their pets were very important sources of emotional support, and only 18.2% of women without children said their pets were not important. Id.

53. See A Documented Connection, supra note 20.

54. Upadhya, supra note 49, at 1178–79.

prosecution.[55] Animal abuse within the home is less likely to be detected, whereas traditional intimate partner violence may be self-reported by the battered spouse, noticed by friends, family, or medical professionals, or reported by neighbors after a domestic disturbance.[56] Even if the animal abuse is discovered, the legal ramifications pose little to no deterrent value because (1) animal cruelty laws are not strictly enforced, and (2) when they are, they involve only "paltry" sentences.[57]

The frequency and regularity with which animal abuse and intimate partner abuse co-occur is alarming. A pivotal 1997 study[58] surveyed the largest U.S. domestic violence shelter in forty-nine states and the District of Columbia,[59] questioning the overlap between intimate partner abuse, child abuse, and animal abuse. The study found that 85% of women and 63% of children entering the shelters also reported pet abuse within the home.[60] A similar study surveyed thirty-eight women at a domestic violence shelter in Utah and found that, of the women who owned animals, 71% reported that their partner had threatened to harm or had harmed the animal, and 57% reported that their partner actually harmed or killed the animal.[61]

---

55. See id.

56. Id.

57. Id. at 1179.

58. Frank R. Ascione et al., The Abuse of Animals and Domestic Violence: A National Survey of Shelters for Women Who Are Battered, 5 SOC'Y & ANIMALS 205 (1997) [hereinafter Survey of Shelters].

59. Since this study only surveyed women in domestic violence shelters and did not provide comparison statistics of animal abuse reported by women in non-abusive relationships, Professor Ascione conducted a follow-up study in 2007 that surveyed 101 women residing at domestic violence shelters (the S group) and 120 women who had not experienced intimate partner abuse as an adult (the NS group). See Frank R. Ascione et al., Battered Pets and Domestic Violence: Animal Abuse Reported by Women Experiencing Intimate Violence and by Nonabused Women, 13 VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN 354 (2007) [hereinafter Animal Abuse Reported by Women]. From the S group, 52.5% of women had received threats to hurt or kill their pets and 54% of the women reported actual abuse or killing of the pets occurred. Id. at 361. In contrast, just 12.5% of women from the NS group received threats to hurt or kill their pets and only 5% reported actual abuse or killing of their pets. Id.

60. Survey of Shelters, supra note 58.

61. Frank R. Ascione, Battered Women's Reports of Their Partners' and Their Children's Cruelty to Animals, 1 J. EMOTIONAL ABUSE 119 (1998).

Individual stories provide compelling evidence of the link between animal abuse and domestic violence. In an act of retaliation against his ex-girlfriend for ending the relationship, one California man "killed, skinned, and cooked" the woman's pet rabbit.[62] He then ate the rabbit as he texted pictures to the woman and threatened to do the same to her.[63] In July 2015, a Texas man was charged with first-degree murder and animal cruelty for fatally beating his boyfriend and strangling his boyfriend's dog.[64] A witness to the incident told police he heard crashing, screaming, and Harlow—the victim's five-year-old Yorkshire Terrier—crying out in pain after the suspected murderer threatened to kill it.[65] Harlow survived the beating but her owner did not.[66] He later died from head trauma sustained during the beating.[67] In some cases, offenders even force their human victims to watch acts of bestiality.[68]

---

62. Angel Jennings, Man Eats Ex-Girlfriend's Pet Rabbit, Threatens Her, Prosecutors Say, L.A. TIMES (Dec. 10, 2014, 1:05 PM), http://www.latimes.com/local/lanow/la-me-ln-north-hollywood-eats-exlover-pet-rabbit-20141210-story.html.

63. Id.

64. Man Accused of Murdering His Boyfriend, Animal Cruelty, THE LINK-LETTER (Nat'l Link Coal., Stratford, N.J.), Sept. 2015, at 13, http://nationallinkcoalition.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/09/LinkLetter-2015-September.pdf; Mariah Medina, Texas Man Facing Murder Charges for the Beating Death of His Boyfriend in Austin, SAN ANTONIO EXPRESS-NEWS (July 20, 2015, 3:11 PM), http://www.mysanantonio.com/news/local/article/19-year-old-Austin-resident-facing-murder-charges-6394840.php.

65. Man Accused of Murdering his Boyfriend, Animal Cruelty, supra note 64, at 13; Medina, supra note 64. When police arrived on the scene to investigate hours later, they found Harlow clinging to life and suffering from injuries consistent with strangulation, including "bloodshot eyes, hemorrhaging and difficulty swallowing." Man Accused of Murdering his Boyfriend, Animal Cruelty, supra note 64, at 13.

66. Medina, supra note 64.

67. Id.

68. ALLIE PHILLIPS, NAT'L DIST. ATT'YS' ASS'N, UNDERSTANDING THE LINK BETWEEN VIOLENCE TO ANIMALS AND PEOPLE: A GUIDEBOOK FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE PROFESSIONALS 27 (2014), http://nationallinkcoalition.org/wp-content/uploads/2014/06/Allies-Link-Monograph-2014.pdf. In one case, an abusive husband forced his wife and three sons to watch as he sexually assaulted one of the family's dogs before he shot and killed the pet. Id. After this incident, the wife, her three sons, and the family's other dog were able to flee to a pet-friendly shelter. Id. The husband was later prosecuted for animal abuse. Id.

Animal abuse used as a method of psychological control within a home creates an environment of submission and terror, and may lead the human victim to delay or refrain from fleeing out of concern for her pet's welfare and safety.[69] Only 3% of domestic violence shelters in the nation offer some sort of housing for victims' pets.[70] Given the strong emotional attachment that domestic violence victims tend to feel towards their pets, it is no surprise that up to half of abused women[71] struggle with the idea of seeking safety if it means leaving their animal in the hands of their batterers.[72] The psychological trauma of animal abuse as a method of domestic violence may continue to have crippling effects on the human victim if she—but not her pet—manages to escape the abusive situation.[73] Her abuser may retaliate by harming or killing the animal as a form of revenge for her leaving or to coerce her into returning.[74] Some women feel such unbearable fear and guilt over leaving their pets behind that they return to the toxic environment for the animals' sake.[75] In one case, a domestic violence victim

---

69. Frank R. Ascione, Emerging Research on Animal Abuse as a Risk Factor for Intimate Partner Violence, in INTIMATE PARTNER VIOLENCE [hereinafter Emerging Research], 3-9 (Kathleen A. Kendall-Tackett & Sarah M. Giacomoni eds., 2007). According to nine independent studies, a range of 18% to 48% percent of women in abusive relationships reported that their fear for their pets' safety either influenced their decision to stay with the abusive partners or delayed their fleeing for shelter. Id.

70. Clark, Ros-Lehtinen Bill Protects Domestic Violence Victims and Pets, HUMANE SOC'Y U.S. (Mar. 5, 2015), http://www.humanesociety.org/news/press_releases/2015/03/domestic-violence-and-pets-030515.html [hereinafter Clark, Ros-Lehtinen Bill].

71. Emerging Research, supra note 69, at 3–9.

72. Lori R. Kogan et al., Crosstrails: A Unique Foster Program to Provide Safety for Pets of Women in Safehouses, 10 VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN 418, 419 (2004). After fleeing from her abusive partner, one Colorado woman and her dogs lived in her car for four months until space became available at a pet-friendly shelter. Id. at 431–32.

73. See Jen Reeder, Let's Discuss Pets During Domestic Violence Awareness Month, HUFFINGTON POST (Jan. 28, 2015), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/jen-reeder/we-need-to-include-pets-w_b_6017762.html.

74. Carol J. Adams, Woman-Battering and Harm to Animals, in ANIMALS AND WOMEN: FEMINIST THEORETICAL EXPLANATIONS 69–70 (Carol J. Adams & Josephine Donovan eds., 1995).

75. Id. at 60.

sought safety at a local shelter, only to return to the abusive home after her batterer sent her pictures of him cutting her dog's ears off with garden shears.[76] He also sent the ears.[77]

The co-occurrence and intertwinement of animal abuse and intimate partner abuse is so prevalent that twenty-nine states, as well as the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, have amended their laws to allow for judges to include companion animals in domestic orders of protection.[78] Members of Congress have also recognized the need for nationwide, increased protection for animal victims of domestic violence.[79] In 2015, "congresswoman Katherine Clark (D-MA) and congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtimen (R-FL) introduced the Pets and Women Safety Act" ("PAWS Act").[80] The bill calls for extended protection to pets under federal stalking laws and interstate violation of protection orders, and also urges all states to allow for the inclusion of companion animals in domestic violence orders of protection.[81]

III. LEGISLATIVE RESPONSE TO THE LINK

In light of the well-documented link between animal cruelty and interpersonal violence, many state legislatures have enacted laws to better detect, deter, treat, and prevent these often interrelated forms of abuse. An increasing number of states have enacted cross-reporting statutes, which permit or mandate the reporting of identified or suspected abuse between law enforcement officials

---

76. Emerging Research, supra note 69, at 3-12 to 3-13 (citing Jane Ann Quinlisk, Animal Abuse and Family Violence, in CHILD ABUSE, DOMESTIC VIOLENCE, AND ANIMAL ABUSE: LINKING THE CIRCLES OF COMPASSION AND INTERVENTION 168 (Frank R. Ascione & Phil Arkow eds., 1999)).

77. Id.

78. ANIMAL LEGAL DEF. FUND, 2015 U.S. ANIMAL PROTECTION LAWS RANKINGS, 2 (Dec. 2015), http://aldf.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/12/Rankings-Report-2015.pdf [hereinafter 2015 U.S. ANIMAL PROTECTION LAWS RANKINGS].

79. Clark, Ros-Lehtinen Bill, supra note 70. "We must have a national policy that safeguards the pets of abuse victims, and recognizes that domestic violence impacts all members of the family—including the four-legged." Id.

80. Id.

81. Pets and Women Safety Act of 2015, H.R. 1258, 114th Cong. (2015). The PAWS Act also aims to establish a federal grant program to assist shelters and other service providers in implementing care and housing options for the pets of domestic violence victims. Id.

and various animal and human welfare services.[82] In addition, thirty-two states' animal cruelty laws either allow or require court-ordered psychological evaluation and treatment for certain offenders.[83]

A. Cross-reporting Statutes

The relationship between animal cruelty and domestic violence supports the practicality of using one type of detected abuse within a home to indicate the possibility of other victims and forms of abuse in the home as well.[84] States that have cross-reporting laws recognize the added benefits of a multifaceted response to animal abuse, child abuse, and domestic violence. Animal abuse, child abuse, and intimate partner abuse typically occur behind closed doors and often go unreported.[85] Statistics show that these forms of household violence frequently co-occur, so cross-training and cross-reporting among the animal and human welfare services who interact with the victims of such abuse can lead to detection of additional, hidden abuse—directed at either humans or animals—within a home that may not have been discovered otherwise.[86]

Many U.S. communities encourage cross-training between law enforcement, animal welfare agencies, and human health and social services so that workers are able to recognize signs of animal abuse as potential indicators of child or intimate partner abuse and vice versa.[87]

---

82. Siebert, supra note 17.

83. NAT'L DIST. ATT'YS' ASS'N, COUNSELING LAWS FOR CONVICTED ANIMAL ABUSERS, (2013), http://www.ndaa.org/pdf/Counseling%20Laws%20for%20Convicted%20Animal%20Abusers%20-%20February%202013.pdf [hereinafter COUNSELING LAWS FOR CONVICTED ANIMAL ABUSERS].

84. Sarah DeGue & David DiLillo, Is Animal Cruelty a "Red Flag" for Family Violence?: Investigating Co-Occurring Violence Toward Children, Partners, and Pets, 24 J. INTERPERSONAL VIOLENCE 1036, 1036–38 (2009).

85. See Suzanne Barnard, Taking Animal Abuse Seriously: A Human Services Perspective, in CHILD ABUSE, DOMESTIC VIOLENCE, AND ANIMAL ABUSE: LINKING THE CIRCLES OF COMPASSION FOR PREVENTION AND INTERVENTION 101, 106–07 (Frank R. Ascione & Phil Arkow eds., Purdue U. Press 1999).

86. See Siebert, supra note 17.

87. Id. In addition to law enforcement, animal control, and human welfare services, some states also extend the duty to cross-report to veterinarians.

Cross-reporting statutes are a practical approach to identifying, deterring, and preventing animal abuse, child abuse, and intimate partner abuse because "[w]hen any form of family violence is suspected, the appropriate agency should be informed so its experienced personnel can evaluate whether a further investigation is warranted."[88] The goal of cross-training and cross-reporting is not to merge the individual and distinct forms of household abuse under one all-encompassing umbrella.[89] Rather, the goal of this multifaceted approach is simply to educate specialists on the connection and relationship between animal abuse, child abuse, and domestic violence so that they may familiarize themselves with each form of maltreatment, recognize red flags indicating the potential existence of abuse, and know to whom to report that information.[90] When animal and human health and social services come together to cross-report suspected or known forms of abuse that may not be detected otherwise, the result is a more efficient and effective response to families and animals in need.[91]

B. Psychological Treatment Provisions in Animal Cruelty Laws

Traditional types of punishment for criminal behavior—fines and imprisonment—have little to no deterrent value in the animal cruelty context because these punishments are "ineffective at reducing recidivism or preventing future acts of violence against animals and humans."[92] Animal abuse is often part of a cyclical pattern of violence, and the only way to break the cycle is through intervention and adequate treatment.[93] Simply requiring an animal abuser to pay a fine or serve minimal jail time does not address underlying "physiological deficits" that may have influenced the

---

Id. However, the laws regarding cross-reporting and veterinarians greatly vary among states and, as such, are not included within the scope of this Note.

88. What is the Link, supra note 23.

89. Phillips, supra note 68, at 41.

90. Id.

91. See id.

92. Muller-Harris, supra note 39, at 315.

93. See Children Abusing Animals, NAT'L LINK COALITION, http://nationallinkcoalition.org/faqs/children-abusing-animals (last visited Oct. 7, 2016).

offender's behavior.[94] Such punishment is comparable to "an orthopedist telling someone with a broken arm to lift weights."[95]

It is widely accepted that violence towards animals signals more than just a slight personality flaw; it is an "indicator of potentially deeper psychological problems . . ., especially where the animal abuser is a child."[96] In 1987, the American Psychiatric Association ("APA") recognized the relationship between animal abuse and one's mental health by adding physical cruelty to animals as a diagnostic symptom for conduct disorder.[97] Conduct disorder is defined as a "persistent pattern of conduct in which the basic rights of others and major age-appropriate societal norms or rules are violated."[98] Committing acts of animal cruelty can also have detrimental effects on a person's social development as harming or killing a vulnerable animal erodes or distorts empathy.[99] "The inability to empathize with others" and a desensitized response to violence may harden one to the prospect of treating the lives of animals and humans alike "with callous disregard, and without feelings of regret or remorse."[100]

Neurologists are beginning to understand the physical implications and neurophysiology of empathy, or lack thereof. In a recent study, a research team at the University of Chicago performed functional MRI scans on a group of teenage boys diagnosed with aggressive-conduct disorder and a group of teenage boys who showed "no unusual signs of aggression."[101] The groups were "shown videos of people enduring both accidental pain, like stubbing a toe, and intentionally inflicted pain, like being punched

---

94. Siebert, supra note 17.

95. Id.

96. Brimer, supra note 44, at 651–52.

97. Clifton P. Flynn, Why Family Professionals Can No Longer Ignore Violence Toward Animals, 49 FAM. REL. 87, 89 (2000). The APA explained that "the presence of cruel or abusive behavior toward animals may be a serious indicator of child psychopathology that deserves the attention of parents, researchers, and professionals alike." Id.

98. Id. (quoting AM. PSYCHIATRIC ASS'N, DIAGNOSTIC AND STATISTICAL MANUAL OF MENTAL DISORDERS 53 (3d rev ed. 1987)).

99. See id. at 90.

100. Id.

101. Siebert, supra note 17.

in the arm."[102] The study found that when watching intentionally inflicted pain, the boys with aggressive conduct disorder "displayed extremely heightened activity in the part of our brain known as the reward center, which is activated when we feel sensations of pleasure," and, unlike the boys who showed no unusual signs of aggression, they displayed "no activity at all in those neuronal regions involved in moral reasoning and self-regulation."[103] Yet, just as a person's empathy can be destroyed, it can also be learned and cultivated.[104] Researchers are confident that an individual's physiological inability to empathize can be rehabilitated with the proper treatment, especially with early detection and intervention.[105]

The three general diagnostic categories of animal abuse—criminogenic-based,[106] traumagenic-based,[107] and psychogenic-

---

102. Id.

103. Id.

104. Id. In 2008, a group of researchers from the University of Wisconsin, Madison, released a study explaining their findings that "the mere act of thinking compassionate thoughts caused significant activity and physical changes in the brain's empathic pathways." Id.

105. See id.; Children Abusing Animals, supra note 93.

106. Philip Tedeschi, Methods for Forensic Animal Maltreatment Evaluations, in ANIMAL MALTREATMENT: FORENSIC MENTAL HEALTH ISSUES AND EVALUATIONS 309, 324 (Lacey Levitt, Gary Patronek, & Thomas Grisso eds., 2016). The following features are characteristic of an offender with criminogenic based treatment needs:

> 1. Presents as convincing or charming, with few indicators of vulnerability. 2. Presentation or history of manipulative or controlling behavior. 3. Displays jealousy, dislike, or animosity towards victims. 4. Has been physically cruel, or caused physical pain or injury to persons or animals. 5. Bullies, threatens, or intimidates others. 6. History of fights, aggression, or property destruction. 7. Family history of aggression, criminal conduct, and/or chemical dependency. 8. Has used a weapon against others. 9. Illegal drug use or abuse, or early use of alcohol. 10. Parental emotional and disciplinary inconsistencies (double messages).

Id.

107. Id. The following features are characteristic of an offender with traumagenic based treatment needs:

> 1. Has experienced, witnessed, or was confronted with an event or events that involves actual or threatened death or se-based[108]—serve to diagnose the underlying causes in each case and to assess the best course of treatment for each offender. When animal abuse is criminogenic-based, appropriate treatment interventions might focus on personal accountability, cognitive behavior > rious injury, or threat to the physical or sexual integrity of self or others. 2. Reactive avoidance of stimuli that arouse recollections of trauma (e.g., thoughts, feelings, conversations, activities, places, people). [3]. Intense psychological distress and/or behavioral reactivity upon exposure to internal or external cues that symbolize or resemble an aspect of traumatic event. [4]. Noticeable regression from normally expected levels of personal, social, and intrapsychic stability and competencies, response to stimulation from trauma-related issues. [5]. Behavior may represent the reenactment or resolution of traumatic events. [6]. Youth reports images, thoughts, dreams, illusions, flash back episodes, or a sense of re-living the experience; or distress on exposure to reminders of the traumatic event. [7]. Youth demonstrate a reduction from normal levels or awareness and appropriate responsiveness to his or her surroundings (appears dazed or disorganized) when trauma issues are triggered. [8]. Youth shows elevated symptoms, when compared to his or her normal functioning, of anxiety or increased arousal (e.g., difficulty sleeping, irritability, poor concentration, hypervigilance, exaggerated startle response, motor restlessness). [9]. Difficulties with sleep or appetite (excess or avoidance).

---

Id.

108. Id. at 324–25. The following features are characteristic of an offender with psychogenic based treatment needs:

> 1. Low birth-weight or IQ relative to siblings or peers. 2. Diagnosis of developmental or autistic disorder. 3. Bizarre or inappropriate affect (not including flat affect, or elective withdrawal/avoidance). 4. Present or past intervention with psychotropic medications. 5. History of psychiatric-hospitalization. 6. Family history of mental illness or psychiatric hospitalization. 7. History of unusually difficult pregnancy or childbirth. 8. Inability to develop stable relationships due to perceptual inaccuracies around relationships and interactions with others (difficulties not due to emotional/traumatic resistance, or hostility). 9. Social role as a scapegoat or outcast). 10. The youth is displaying significant difficult or impairment in social, educational, family, or other important areas of functioning.

Id.

strategies, and victim empathy development.[109] Criminogenic-based treatment will likely include "criminal justice oversight and supervision."[110] On the other hand, appropriate treatment interventions for traumagenic-based and psychogenic-based animal abuse will consist of specialized therapy and psychiatric management and medication, and will likely include therapeutic and psycho-medical oversight.[111]

Against this backdrop, many states have amended their animal cruelty laws to include psychological evaluation[112] and treat-

---

109. Treatment Interventions, COLORADO LINK PROJECT, http://coloradolinkproject.com/treatment-and-supervision/ (last visited Oct. 7, 2016).

110. Id.

111. Id.

112. The following states require offenders convicted of animal cruelty to undergo psychological evaluation: Arkansas (ARK. CODE ANN. § 5-62-103(c)(3)(A)(i) (Supp. 2013)); Colorado (COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. §18-9-202(2)(a.5)(III) (2012)); Delaware (DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 11, § 4362(b) (2007) (for pardon or commutation of sentence)); Illinois (510 ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. 70/3.03(c) (West, Westlaw current through P.A. 99-904 of the 2016 Reg. Sess.)) (for torture); Iowa (IOWA CODE ANN. § 717B.3A(3)(a)(1) (West 2013)) (for torture)) and (IOWA CODE ANN. § 717C.1(3) (West 2013)) (for bestiality); Kansas (KAN. STAT. ANN. § 21-6412(b)(1) (Supp. 2012)); Nevada (NEV. REV. STAT. ANN. § 62E.680(1) (LexisNexis 2012)) (for juvenile offenders); West Virginia (W. VA. CODE ANN. § 61-8-19(h)(1) (LexisNexis 2010)) (for probation). The following states permit offenders convicted of animal cruelty to undergo psychological evaluation at the court's discretion: Arizona) (ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 13-1411(B)(1) (2009)) (for bestiality only); Colorado (COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 19-2-918.5(2) (2012)) (for juveniles); Connecticut (CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 46b-140(c) (2009) (for juveniles); Delaware (DEL. CODE ANN. tit. 11, § 1326(h) (West, Westlaw through 80 Laws 2016, ch. 427)); District of Columbia (D.C. CODE ANN. § 22-1001(a)(2)(A) (West, Westlaw through Sept. 19, 2016)); Georgia (GA. CODE ANN. § 16-12-4(f) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Legis. Sess.)); Illinois (510 ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. 70/3.02(c) (West 2014)) and (720 ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. 5/12-35(f)(3) (Supp. 2013) (bestiality only); Louisiana (LA. STAT. ANN. § 14:102.1(2)(d) (Westlaw through the 2016 Regular Sess.); Maine (Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. tit. 7, § 4016(1)(D) (2002)); Michigan (MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. §§ 750.50(5), 750.50b(5) (West, Westlaw through P.A.2016, No. 280 of the 2016 Regular Sess.)); Mississippi (MISS. CODE ANN. § 97-41-16(3)(b)(ii)(1) (Supp. 2013); Missouri ((MO. REV. STAT. § 566.111(3)(3) (2012)) for bestiality); Nevada (NEV. REV. STAT. ANN. § 176A.416(1)(a) (LexisNexis 2011)); New Mexico (N.M. STAT. ANN. § 30-18-1(G) (West 2016)); Ohio (OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 959.99(7) (LexisNexis Supp. 2016); Oregon (OR. REV. STAT. ANN. § ment[113] provisions. At the time of writing, thirty-one states, as well as the District of Columbia, address the mental health aspect 167.334 (2011)); Rhode Island (4 R.I. GEN. LAWS § 4-1-36) (West 2016, Westlaw current through January 2016 session); Tennessee (TENN. CODE ANN. § 39-14-212(f) (2014)); Utah (UTAH CODE ANN. § 76-9-301(11)(a) (LexisNexis 2012); Washington (WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 13.40.127(5) (West Supp. 2013)) (for juveniles).

---

113. The following states require offenders convicted of animal cruelty to complete some form of therapeutic counseling: Arkansas (ARK. CODE ANN. § 5-62-103 (Supp. 2013)); California (CAL. PENAL CODE § 597(h) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)); Florida (FLA. STAT. ANN. § 828.12(2)(a) (West 2016)) (for torture); Illinois (510 ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. 70/3.03 (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)) (for torture) and (510 ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. 70/3.01–3.02 (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)) (for juveniles and hoarders); Iowa (IOWA CODE ANN. § 717C.1(3) (West 2013)); Kansas (KAN. STAT. ANN. § 21-6412(b)(1) (Supp. 2012)); Nevada (NEV. REV. STAT. ANN. § 62E.680 (LexisNexis 2012)) (for juveniles); New Jersey, N.J. STAT. ANN. § 4:22-17(g) (West, Westlaw through 2016)) (for juveniles); New Mexico (N.M. STAT. ANN. § 30-18-1(H) (Supp. 2012.) (for juveniles); Texas (TEX. FAM. CODE ANN. § 54.0407 (West 2014)) (for juveniles). The following states permit offenders convicted of animal cruelty to complete some form of therapeutic counseling at the court's discretion: Arizona (ARIZ. REV. STAT. ANN. § 13-1411(B)(1) (2010)) (for bestiality); Colorado (COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 18-9-202(2)(a)(II) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.) and (COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 19-2-918.5(1) (2012)) (for juveniles); Delaware (DEL. CODE. ANN. tit. 11, § 1326 (West, Westlaw through 80 Laws 2016)) (for animal fighting); District of Columbia (D.C. CODE ANN. § 22-1001(a)(2)(A) (West, Westlaw through 2016)); Illinois (510 ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. 70/3.01-2 (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)); Indiana (IND. CODE ANN. § 35-46-3-12(f)(1) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)); Louisiana (LA. STAT. ANN. § 14:102.1(2)(d) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)); Maine (ME. REV. STAT. ANN. tit. 17, § 1031(3-B) (West, Westlaw through 2015 Leg. Sess.)); Maryland (MD. CODE ANN., CRIM. LAW § 10-604–08 (LexisNexis 2012)); Michigan (MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN. §§ 750.50(5), 750.50b(5) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)); Minnesota (MINN. STAT. ANN. § 343.21(10)(4) (West 2012)); Mississippi (MISS. CODE ANN. § 97-41-16(b)(ii)(1) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)); Missouri (MO. ANN. STAT. § 566.111(3)(3) (West 2012)) (for bestiality); Nevada (NEV. REV. STAT. ANN. § 176A.416(1)(b) (LexisNexis 2011)); New Mexico (N.M. STAT. ANN. § 30-18-1(G) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)); Ohio (OHIO. REV. CODE ANN. § 959.99(E)(6) (West, Westlaw through 2015–2016 Legis. Sess.)); Oregon (OR. REV. STAT. ANN. § 167.350(4) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)); Rhode Island (4 R.I. GEN. LAWS § 4-1-36 (Supp. 2012)); Tennessee (TENN. CODE ANN. § 39-14-212(f) (LexisNexis 2014)); Utah (UTAH CODE ANN. § 76-9-301(11)(a) (LexisNexis 2012)); Ver-of animal cruelty by permitting or requiring courts to order psychological evaluation and treatment for certain offenders. For example, Illinois requires judges to order psychological evaluation and treatment as part of sentencing in cases of animal hoarding, animal torture, or when the offender is a juvenile.[114] Iowa requires psychological treatment and evaluation upon conviction for animal torture or bestiality.[115] California requires offenders to undergo counseling "designed to evaluate and treat behavior or conduct disorders" as a condition of probation.[116]

IV. CLOSING THE LEGISLATIVE GAP IN PROTECTION

According to the Animal Legal Defense Fund's annual year-end report, Tennessee's animal protection laws currently rank twenty-second out of fifty-six in the nation for overall strength and comprehensiveness.[117] Despite its current middle-tier ranking, Tennessee has enacted several groundbreaking laws aimed at increasing protection for animals. Among these notable changes are the extension of the state's Good Samaritan law to include animals, and the creation of the nation's first statewide animal abuse registry. As originally enacted, Tennessee's Good Samaritan law relieved civilians from liability "for any damage resulting from the forcible entry of a motor vehicle for the purpose of removing a mont (VT. STAT. ANN. tit. 13, § 353(b)(4) (2009)); Virginia (VA. CODE ANN. § 3.2-6570(A) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.)); Washington (WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 13.40.127(5) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. and Spec. Sess.)) (for juveniles) and (WASH. REV. CODE ANN. §§ 16.52.200(9), 16.52.205(5)(b) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. and Spec. Sess.)); West Virginia (W. VA. CODE ANN. § 61-8-19(h)(2) (LexisNexis 2010) (anger management)).

---

114. 510 ILL. COMP. STAT. §§ 70/3.01–3.03 (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.).

115. IOWA CODE ANN. §§ 717B.3A(3)(1), 717C.1(3) (West 2016).

116. CAL. PENAL CODE § 597(h) (West, Westlaw through 2016 Reg. Sess.).

117. 2015 U.S. ANIMAL PROTECTION LAWS RANKINGS, supra note 78, at 7. In its tenth annual year-end report, the ALDF ranked the strength and overall comprehensiveness of each states' animal protection laws. Id. at 1–18. Also included in the rankings are the laws of the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, Puerto Rico, Guam, and American Samoa. Id.

minor from the vehicle."[118] In 2015, Tennessee amended the law and became the first state in the nation to extend immunity to civilians for breaking into a car to save an animal in distress.[119] Also in 2015, Tennessee lawmakers passed a historic bill that created a statewide animal abuse registry.[120] This online registry took effect January 1, 2016,[121] and is the first of its kind in the nation.[122] Several states have since followed Tennessee's lead in establishing a statewide animal registry, with similar bills currently pending in Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Washington, and West Virginia.[123]

A. Current Status of Animal Cruelty Laws in Tennessee

Tennessee, like many states, has a cross-reporting statute aimed at addressing the link between animal abuse and human violence. Current Tennessee law imposes a duty to report on "[a]ny state, county or municipal employee of a child or adult protective services agency, while acting in a professional capacity or within the scope of employment" who encounters an animal he or she knows or reasonably suspects has been abused or neglected.[124] Employees of child or adult protective services agencies must report such known or suspected animal abuse to "the entity or enti-

---

118. TENN. CODE ANN. § 29-34-209 (West, Westlaw through 2014 Reg. Sess.) (amended 2015).

119. TENN. CODE ANN. § 29-34-209 (Supp. 2016); see also Arin Greenwood, Groundbreaking Tennessee Law Lets Good Samaritans Save Dogs Trapped in Hot Cars, HUFFINGTON POST (July 7, 2015, 8:03 PM), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2015/07/07/tennessee-dog-hot-car_n_7746944.html. Although Tennessee is among several other states with laws pertaining to animals left in hot cars, Tennessee was the first state to extend immunity to civilians—rather than just law enforcement officers—for damage resulting from forcible entry of a car to save an animal in distress. Id.

120. See TENN. CODE ANN. §§ 40-39-101 to -103 (Suppl. 2016).

121. The Tennessee Animal Abuse Registry is available at: Tennessee Animal Abuse Registry, TENNESSEE BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION, https://www.tn.gov/tbi/topic/tennessee-animal-abuse-registry (last visited Sept. 14, 2016).

122. New State Animal Abuser Registries Proposed in 2016, NAT'L ANTI-VIVISECTION SOC'Y (Jan. 21, 2016), https://www.navs.org/news/new-state-animal-abuser-registries-proposed-in-2016.

123. Id.

124. TENN. CODE ANN. § 38-1-402(a) (2014).

ties that investigate reports of animal cruelty, abuse, and neglect in that county."[125] Tennessee is also one of the thirty-two states that address the mental health aspect of animal cruelty by either permitting or requiring courts to order psychological evaluation and treatment for certain offenders.[126] According to current Tennessee law, offenders convicted of aggravated cruelty to animals may—at the court's discretion—be required to undergo psychological evaluation and complete treatment or counseling.[127] Additionally, "[i]f a juvenile is found to be within the court's jurisdiction, for conduct that, if committed by an adult, would be a criminal violation involving cruelty to animals . . ., then the court may order the juvenile" to undergo a psychological evaluation and complete any necessary treatment.[128]

Although Tennessee's recent strides have increased the scope of protection for animals and thrust the state into the spotlight, the state's middle-tier ranking lends support to the notion that room for further improvement remains. As Tennessee is now in position to serve as a working model for other states hoping to bolster the strength of their animal-cruelty laws, Tennessee lawmakers should take this opportunity to improve its own existing laws. This Note proposes two statutory measures that would increase protection to animals, as well as humans, in Tennessee. First, Tennessee lawmakers should enact an inverse of the state's current cross-reporting statute, which requires health and human services agencies to report signs of animal abuse observed during the course of their employment, by imposing a reciprocal duty to report on animal welfare agents who encounter signs of domestic violence while acting in the scope of their employment. Second, Tennessee lawmakers should amend the penalty provisions in the state's current animal cruelty statutes to mandate—rather than merely allow—psychological evaluation and treatment both for juvenile offenders convicted of animal cruelty and for all offenders convicted of aggravated animal cruelty.

---

125. Id.

126. COUNSELING LAWS FOR CONVICTED ANIMAL ABUSERS, supra note 83.

127. TENN. CODE ANN. § 39-14-212(f) (2014).

128. TENN. CODE ANN. § 39-14-212(j) (2014).

B. The Duty to Cross-Report Needs to Be a Two-Way Street

Given the frequent co-occurrence of animal abuse and domestic violence within a home, many states have enacted various forms of cross-reporting legislation that permit or mandate the sharing of known or suspected abuse between animal welfare agencies and human health and social services. The majority of states with cross-reporting laws permit or require child and adult protective services employees to report any signs of animal abuse they encounter while acting in the scope of their employment.[129] Most states, however, do not impose this same duty to report on animal welfare agency employees who encounter signs of domestic violence while acting in the scope of their employment.[130]

Tennessee's current cross-reporting statute is a one-way street, as employees of child or adult protective services agencies must report possible cases of animal abuse that they encounter, but animal welfare agency employees who observe signs of domestic violence within a home while investigating reports of animal cruelty are under no duty to report the suspected abuse to child or adult protective services.[131] This one-sided duty to report is illogical and under-inclusive. Acts of animal cruelty are typically part of a cyclical pattern of violence that affects human victims as well.[132] Animal welfare agencies are often the "first responder" to a family or household in distress,[133] which provides them with a glimpse into the home and an opportunity to observe additional, hidden forms of abuse that might otherwise go undetected. In the course

---

129. NAT'L DIST. ATT'YS ASS'N, STATE CROSS-REPORTING MANDATES BY PROFESSION 1–11 (2014), http://www.ndaa.org/pdf/Cross-Reporting%20Mandates%20by%20Profession%20and%20State%20-%20Jan%202014%20-%20Jennifer's%20updates.pdf.

130. Id.

131. This deficiency in cross-reporting is somewhat remedied by a Tennessee law that requires all persons to report suspected cases of child abuse or neglect. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 37-1-403 (2014). However, older victims are left to fall through the cracks as no current or existing Tennessee law imposes a duty to report suspected domestic violence or elder abuse. See id.

132. See supra Part II.

133. What is the Link, supra note 23 (explaining that victims can be more comfortable disclosing details of animal abuse within the home than they are in discussing their own abuse, and neighbors are more likely to report suspected animal abuse than child or intimate partner abuse).

of investigating and responding to cases of animal abuse, animal welfare agencies may also encounter signs of children or women within the home who need help.[134] By not requiring animal welfare agencies to report this information to child and adult protective services, Tennessee's current statutory scheme allows victims of child abuse and intimate partner abuse to fall through the cracks. This must stop.

It is equally important for human health and social services to be familiar with signs of animal cruelty and to cross-report any suspected animal abuse to the appropriate agency. Screening for animal abuse by asking about companion animals and their welfare while speaking to victims of child and intimate partner abuse places mental health clinicians and social services employees in a unique position to discover multiple types of family violence.[135] Children who witness or perpetuate acts of violence towards animals[136] are at substantial risk of developing mental health problems and of becoming increasingly violent towards animals and fellow humans as he or she progresses into adulthood.[137] Social services professionals and mental health clinicians should incorporate questions about animals into their discussions with children

---

134. See Janet Mickish & Kathleen Schoen, Colorado Alliance for Cruelty Prevention: Safe Pets, Safe Families, Safe Communities, 33 COLO. LAW. 37, Apr. 2004, at 37. (2004). Interestingly, the nation's first legal intervention in a child abuse situation occurred in 1874 when a child was successfully removed from the abusive home using animal protection laws. Id. at 38.

135. What is the Link, supra note 23.

136. See Phillips, supra note 68, at 15–23. Several states have recognized the negative effects of childhood exposure to animal abuse and the potential harm such abuse can have on a child's mental health development. Id. Some states have amended their laws to reflect this growing concern by increasing penalties for animal abuse perpetrated in front of a child. Id. See FLA. STAT. ANN. § 800.04 (West Supp. 2016) (increasing penalty for bestiality when committed in front of a minor child); IDAHO CODE ANN. § 18-1506A(1)(a) (West 2004 & Supp. 2013) (classifying animal torture committed in front of a child as ritualized child abuse and a felony); 720 ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. 5/12-33(a)(1) (West 2002 & Supp. 2013) (classifying animal torture in front of a minor child as ritualized child abuse); OR. REV. STAT. ANN. § 167.320(4)(b) (2011) (committing animal abuse in front of a minor child is a first-degree felony); P.R. LAWS ANN. tit. 5, §§ 1668–70 (Westlaw through 2013) (enhancing the felony penalty for subsequent convictions of animal abuse if the offender has previously been convicted of abusing an animal in front of a minor child).

137. Phillips, supra note 68, at 15–23.

and battered spouses because victims who are hesitant to disclose details of their own abuse may be more open to discussing harm inflicted upon their pets.[138]

Accordingly, this Note proposes that Tenn. Code Ann. § 38-1-402(a) be amended to include the following italicized language:

> (a) Any state, county or municipal employee of either a child or adult protective services agency, or an animal welfare and control agency, while acting in a professional capacity or within the scope of employment, who has knowledge of or observes an animal or person that the person knows or reasonably suspects has been the victim of domestic violence, animal cruelty, abuse, or neglect, shall report the known or reasonably suspected domestic violence, animal cruelty, abuse, or neglect to the entity or entities that investigate reports of domestic violence, animal cruelty, abuse, and neglect in that county.

Expanding the scope of the duty to cross-report would lead to increased protection for humans and animals in Tennessee. The purpose behind cross-reporting statutes is to implement a multifaceted approach to better detect, resolve, and prevent these separate but often-interrelated forms of familial violence. The added value of cross-reporting amongst related entities and agencies is significantly diminished when the flow of information is one-sided. This illogical, one-sided duty to report has left a gaping hole that victims of child abuse and intimate partner violence continue to fall through. It is time for Tennessee lawmakers to fill this legislative gap in protection by imposing a reciprocal duty to report on any state, county or municipal employee of an animal control or welfare agency, who, while acting in a professional capacity or within the scope of his or her employment, encounters an individual he or

138. What is the Link, supra note 23 (explaining that when a victim is reluctant to talk about their abuse, discussing any abuse to pets within the home may "break the ice" and lead the victim to reveal details about his or her own abuse).

she knows or reasonably suspects has been the victim of domestic violence. Requiring animal welfare agencies to relay suspected child abuse or intimate partner violence to child and adult protective services is a rational extension of the already existing duty to cross-report. Expanding the scope of Tennessee's current duty to cross-report is a simple legislative act that could save lives.

C. The Need for Mandatory Psychological Evaluation and Treatment

Animal abuse offenders are unique in the sense that every perpetrator has individualized diagnostic factors, so the dynamics and underlying causes of each case must be individually assessed.[139] Required psychological evaluations are necessary not only to determine which offenders would stand to benefit from psychological treatment or counseling but also to formulate an individualized treatment approach once such a determination is made. "One size fits all" interventions, such as anger management, do not take into account the specific needs of each offender and may not address or treat the underlying issues that led to the initial animal abuse.[140] Each offender's potential risk to society varies depending on "the context and seriousness of the abuse, causative factors and the perpetrator's level of blameworthiness for their actions,"[141] so not all individuals who have engaged in acts of violence towards animals need therapeutic or mental health treatment.[142] Although not all abusers need to receive psychological treatment, it is important for all juvenile offenders convicted of animal cruelty and all offenders convicted of aggravated animal cruelty to undergo a diagnostic, psychological evaluation because

139. Treatment Interventions, supra note 109.

140. See What is the Best Form of Treatment for an Animal Cruelty Offender?, COLO. LINK PROJECT, http://coloradolinkproject.com/what-is-the-best-form-of-treatment-for-an-animal-cruelty-offender/ (last visited Sept. 14, 2016).

141. Treatment Interventions, supra note 109.

142. KEN SHAPIRO, STRATEGIZING THE LINK: A BRIEFING PAPER FROM THE NATIONAL LINK COALITION FOR MENTAL HEALTH PROFESSIONALS 1 (2015), https://www.researchgate.net/publication/277814626_Strategizing_the_Link. "At one end of the spectrum is a child of 4 years old who is curious about animals and pulls the wings off of butterflies; at the other end is a dual-diagnosed adult whose chronic delusions direct him or her to torture cats." Id.

simply subjecting an offender to traditional penalties—such as fines or imprisonment—is an ineffective response that fails to address or treat causative factors that contributed to the abuse.

The appropriate course of treatment will depend on the underlying behavioral typologies and experiences of a particular offender, and comprehensive evaluations should consider the following areas of each offender's background: cognitive functioning; blameworthiness; personality and mental health; social and developmental history; individual functioning and developmental competence; current family functioning; sexual and deviancy issues; employment and academic functioning; delinquency, conduct and behavioral issues; assessment of risk; protective factors; empathy and awareness of victim impact; substance abuse; offense and abuse characteristics; and supervision and legal issues.[143]

Tennessee law divides crimes of animal abuse into two separate offenses: cruelty to animals[144] and aggravated cruelty to animals.[145] Currently, the court has discretion in choosing whether to order juvenile defendants convicted of animal cruelty or defendants convicted of aggravated animal cruelty to undergo a psycho-

---

143. Animal Cruelty Specific Evaluation, COLO. LINK PROJECT, http://coloradolinkproject.com/assessment-and-intervention/animal-cruelty-evaluation/ (last visited Sept. 14, 2016).

144. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 39-14-202 (2014). A person commits an offense of animal cruelty when he > intentionally or knowingly (1) Tortures, maims or grossly overworks an animal; (2) Fails unreasonably to provide necessary food, water, care or shelter for an animal in the person's custody; (3) Abandons unreasonably an animal in the person's custody; (4) Transports or confines an animal in a cruel manner; or (5) Inflicts burns, cuts, lacerations, or other injuries or pain, by any method, including blistering compounds, to the legs or hooves of horses in order to make them sore for any purpose including, but not limited to, competition in horse shows and similar events.

Id.

145. See TENN. CODE ANN. §39-14-212 (2014) (defining "aggravated cruelty to animals" as intentionally killing or intentionally causing serious physical injury to a companion animal, through "conduct which is done or carried out in a depraved and sadistic manner and which tortures or maims an animal including the failure to provide food and water to a companion animal resulting in a substantial risk of death or death").

logical evaluation and receive counseling or treatment.[146] Tennessee lawmakers should amend the current penalty provisions to instead require that juvenile offenders convicted of animal cruelty, and all offenders convicted of aggravated animal cruelty, undergo psychological evaluation and, if deemed necessary, complete the appropriate mental health treatment or counseling. This Note proposes that the penalty provision of Tenn. Code Ann. § 39-14-202 be amended to include the following italicized language:

> (e) In addition to the penalty imposed in subsection (g), the court making the sentencing determination for a person convicted under this section shall order the person convicted to surrender custody and forfeit the animal or animals whose treatment was the basis of the conviction. Custody shall be given to a humane society incorporated under the laws of this state. The court may prohibit the person convicted from having custody of other animals for any period of time the court determines to be reasonable, or impose any other reasonable restrictions on the person's custody of animals as necessary for the protection of the animals. If the convicted offender is a juvenile, the court shall order the offender to undergo a psychological evaluation and, if deemed necessary, to complete the appropriate form of psychological treatment and/or counseling.

The link between childhood animal abuse and later violence towards humans supports mandatory psychological evalua-146. TENN. CODE ANN. § 39-14-212(f) (2014); see also § 39-14-212(j) (2014) (Although TENN. CODE ANN. § 39-14-202 does not explicitly address the court's authority to order psychological evaluation and treatment for any offender convicted of cruelty to animals, § 39-14-212(j) explains that "[i]f a juvenile is found to be within the court's jurisdiction, for conduct that, if committed by an adult, would be a criminal violation involving cruelty to animals or would be a criminal violation involving arson, then the court may order that the juvenile be evaluated to determine the need for psychiatric or psychological treatment. If the court determines that psychiatric or psychological treatment is appropriate for that juvenile, then the court may order that treatment.").

tion and treatment, if needed, for juvenile offenders convicted of animal cruelty. It is imperative that children who commit acts of violence towards animals receive the appropriate psychological treatment because such aggression, especially at an early age, signals a developmental lack of empathy and a desensitized response to violence. A child who lacks empathy for others and is incapable of internalizing "ordinary social constraints on violent actions" will likely "progress towards further and more deviant criminal behavior as he gets older" if his psychological condition goes untreated.[147]

Additionally, this Note proposes that the penalty provisions of Tenn. Code Ann. § 39-14-212 be amended to include the following italicized language:

> (f) In addition to the penalty imposed by subsection (d), the court shall order the defendant to undergo psychological evaluation and counseling, the cost to be borne by the defendant. If deemed necessary, the court shall order the defendant to complete the appropriate form of psychological treatment and/or counseling;
>
> (j) If a juvenile is found to be within the court's jurisdiction, for conduct that, if committed by an adult, would be a criminal violation involving cruelty to animals or would be a criminal violation involving arson, then the court shall order that the juvenile be evaluated to determine the need for psychiatric or psychological treatment. If the court determines that psychiatric or psychological treatment is appropriate for that juvenile, then the court shall order that treatment.

At whatever age an offender's violence against animals is detected, it is essential that he be held accountable for his actions and receive the appropriate mental health treatment, if needed. Animal abuse is often indicative of deep psychological issues, and traditional criminal punishments are "ineffective at reducing recidivism or preventing future acts of violence against animals and humans," because such penalties fail to address the causative factors at the root of the abuse.[148]

147. Livingston, supra note 31, at 45.

The importance of detecting and effectively treating those with a propensity to harm animals cannot be understated. Given the frequent overlap of animal abuse and interpersonal violence towards humans, treating the underlying causative factors of an offender's animal abuse will likely have a preventative effect on his later inclination to harm fellow humans. In cases where animal abuse and violence towards humans already co-exist within a home, properly addressing the mental health aspects behind the animal abuse would have a similar effect on decreasing other forms of abuse within the home as well. In sum, effectively treating the mental health deficiencies of animal abusers would directly benefit and protect society as a whole.

V. CONCLUSION

Research and statistics show a significant link between animal abuse, child abuse, and intimate partner abuse. These types of familial violence share a common theme involving power, control, and preying on the weak and vulnerable. Animal abuse, child abuse, and intimate partner abuse form an interrelated, cyclical pattern of violence, and states have responded to this cycle of abuse by enacting legislation to increase protection for both animals and humans. Already a trendsetter in the animal law world, Tennessee lawmakers can continue to pave the way for other states by enacting two statutory measures that would increase the overall strength and comprehensiveness of Tennessee's animal protection laws. First, Tennessee lawmakers should enact an inverse of the state's current cross-reporting statute, imposing a reciprocal duty to report on animal welfare agents. Second, Tennessee lawmakers should amend the penalty provisions in the state's current animal laws to include mandatory psychological evaluation and treatment for juvenile offenders convicted of animal cruelty and all offenders convicted of aggravated animal cruelty.

148. Muller-Harris, supra note 39, at 315.

Banning the Box in Tennessee: Embracing Fair Chance Hiring Policies for Ex-Offenders

MEGAN MCKENZIE REED*

I. INTRODUCTION 392
II. OVERVIEW OF CRIMINAL HISTORY AFFECTING JOB PLACEMENT..396
A. Implications of Ban the Box 396
1. Promote Hiring Based on Qualifications for the Job ..399
2. Encourage Individualized Assessment 401
3. Reduce Recidivism by Increasing Job Opportunities..402
4. Incorporate Prior-Convicts Back into the Workplace 404
III. EMPLOYERS' INTERESTS: THE TORT OF NEGLIGENT HIRING..405
A. Negligent Hiring in General..405
B. Negligent Hiring Laws in Tennessee..405
C. Ban the Box and Negligent Hiring 406
IV. FEDERAL ISSUES: TITLE VII AND THE FAIR CREDIT AND REPORTING ACT 407
A. Title VII and the EEOC 407
B. Fair Credit and Reporting Act 411
V. BAN THE BOX INITIATIVES ALREADY IN PLACE 412
A. Ban the Box Laws that Apply to Public Employers..413
B. Ban the Box Laws That Apply to Both Public and Private Employers..414
C. Why Ban the Box is Imminent for Tennessee 418
VI. PROPOSED BAN THE BOX LAW FOR TENNESSEE 424
VII. CONCLUSION 428

I. INTRODUCTION

In 2014, there were 636,346 people released from jail or prison in the United States, including 15,556 prisoners released in Tennessee.[1] In the most recent statewide recidivism study in Tennessee, forty-six percent of people released from jail or prison were re-incarcerated within just three years.[2] Recidivism, returning to prison for a new crime, stems in part from the inability of people with convictions to effectively assimilate back into the law-abiding community.[3] To combat recidivism, communities need to aid the flood of ex-offenders in their reentry to both the workplace and society at large.[4]

Over one hundred municipalities and twenty-four states have recently adopted a growing fair chance hiring policy called "ban the box," which refers to the commonly-used check box on job applications inquiring into an applicant's prior criminal record.[5] Ban the box laws mandate that employers remove the question from employment applications asking, "Have you ever been convicted for violation of the law other than minor traffic offenses?

---

* McKenzie is a third year law student at the University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law.

1. E. ANN CARSON, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, PRISONERS IN 2014 10 tbl.7 (2015).

2. CHRISTINE HERRMAN ET AL., VERA INST. OF JUSTICE, REPORT OF THE VERA INSTITUTE OF JUSTICE TO THE TENNESSEE GOVERNOR'S TASK FORCE ON SENTENCING AND RECIDIVISM 3 (2015).

3. Id. at 4.

4. Nancy B. Sasser, "Don't Ask, Don't Tell": Negligent Hiring Law in Virginia and the Necessity of Legislation to Protect Ex-Convicts from Employment Discrimination, 41 U. RICH. L. REV. 1063, 1063 (2007).

5. MICHELLE NATIVIDAD RODRIGUEZ & BETH AVERY, NAT'L EMP'T LAW PROJECT, BAN THE BOX: U.S. CITIES, COUNTIES, AND STATES ADOPT FAIR-CHANCE POLICIES TO ADVANCE EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR PEOPLE WITH PAST CONVICTIONS 1 (2016) [hereinafter CITIES, COUNTIES, AND STATES], http://www.nelp.org/content/uploads/Ban-the-Box-Fair-Chance-State-and-Local-Guide.pdf. Five states—Louisiana, Missouri, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and Wisconsin—just adopted Ban the Box policies in 2016, and Vermont amended its Ban the Box policy to apply to public employers as well as private employers in 2016. Id.

If yes, state the nature of the offense[.]"[6] The standard ban the box law removes this box on the employment application, ensuring that employers consider applicants on their merits before taking any past mistakes into consideration.[7] For example, Connecticut's ban the box policy requires employers to deem a potential employee as otherwise qualified for the position before conducting a criminal background check.[8] So, an employer is not prohibited from ever looking into the employee's criminal history; the employer must simply postpone the background check until some time after the initial application. This usually happens once the employer has deemed the employee otherwise qualified for the job, which can be evidenced by a conditional offer of employment.[9] If, after the employer has given a conditional offer of employment, the background check reveals a prior conviction or arrest history, the employer must then consider factors derived from Green v. Missouri Pacific Railroad Company.[10] In Green, the court established a list of factors to guide an employer's evaluation of whether to disqualify an applicant based on a prior criminal offense.[11] Under Green, an employer should consider: (1) the time elapsed since the conviction; (2) the nature and seriousness of the crime in relation to the job sought; (3) the degree of the individual's rehabilitation; and (4) the circumstances under which the crime was committed.[12]

---

6. Joey Garrison, Metro Adopts 'Ban the Box' for Most City Job Applications, THE TENNESSEAN (Nov. 10, 2015, 5:26 PM), http://www.tennessean.com/story/news/politics/2015/11/10/metro-adopts-ban-box-policy-most-city-jobs/75515562/.

7. See Michelle Natividad Rodriguez & Anastasia Christman, The Fair Chance / Ban the Box Toolkit, NAT'L EMP'T LAW PROJECT (Apr. 2, 2015), http://www.nelp.org/publication/the-fair-chance-ban-the-box-toolkit/.

8. CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 46a-80(b) (West 2009 & Supp. 2013).

9. See id.; Criminal Background Screenings and Employment – Fact Sheet for Job Applicants, OFFICE OF HUMAN RIGHTS, D.C., http://ohr.dc.gov/sites/default/files/dc/sites/ohr/publication/attachments/ApplicantFAQ_FINAL_120914.pdf (last updated Dec. 11, 2014).

10. See Green v. Mo. Pac. R.R. Co., 523 F.2d 1290, 1297 (8th Cir. 1975); see also CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 46a-80(c) (West 2009 & Supp. 2013).

11. Green, 523 F.2d at 1297.

12. See Green, 523 F.2d at 1297 (affirming an Iowa district court ruling that condemned employment practices that banned applicants with criminal records when "no consideration is given to the nature and seriousness of the crime in relation to the job sought, [t]he time elapsing since the conviction, the

These factors ensure that an employer has a legitimate business reason for disqualifying a potential employee based on his prior criminal history rather than systematically excluding all people with conviction histories. States need to implement this added protection because, while Title VII and the Fair Credit and Reporting Act provide some protection, there are still many holes in whom the law protects.[13] Ban the box policies offer fair chances for job opportunities to those with prior criminal records, which encourages rehabilitation, promotes community development, and reduces the recidivism rate.[14]

Throughout the United States, over 100 states and municipalities have already adopted hiring practices that prohibit employers from inquiring into an applicant's criminal history on an initial employment application.[15] As of 2016, twenty-four states from almost every region of the country had adopted some form of policy limiting employer inquiry into criminal backgrounds of job applicants.[16]

This Note will argue that Tennessee should enact a statute guiding both public and private employers in their use of criminal history in job applications. The proposed statute will serve as a means to encourage incorporation of ex-offenders into the workplace and into a productive community by allowing them to be considered for jobs. Municipalities in Tennessee, such as Nashville, Memphis, and Chattanooga, have already begun implementing ordinances governing employer use of criminal history in the hiring process.[17] A statewide statute embracing the goals of reducing recidivism and incorporating ex-offenders into the productive workforce is necessary to address this fast-growing national issue. Further, in what is likely to be a huge step for Tennessee, the state degree of the felon's rehabilitation, and the circumstances under which the crime was committed . . . ."); see also CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 46a-80(b) (West 2009 & Supp. 2013); D.C. CODE ANN. § 32-1342(d) (West, Westlaw through 2016).

---

13. See infra Part IV.

14. See Michelle Natividad Rodriguez, "Ban the Box" Is a Fair Chance for Workers with Records, NAT'L EMP'T LAW PROJECT (Aug. 1, 2015) [hereinafter Fair Chance], http://www.nelp.org/publication/ban-box-fair-chance-workers-records/.

15. CITIES, COUNTIES, AND STATES, supra note 5, at 1.

16. Id.

17. See, e.g., MEMPHIS, TENN., CITY CODE § 3-4-4 (2016).

legislature recently passed a ban the box law applying to all state employers, prohibiting them from inquiring into criminal history on an initial job application, with some exceptions.[18] The new Tennessee ban the box statute prevents a state employer from inquiring into an applicant's criminal history on the initial job application but allows the state to inquire about an applicant's criminal history after the initial screening if the applicant has the opportunity to explain the circumstances around the conviction.[19] However,

---

18. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 8-50-112 (2016); see also Kitty Capelle, "Ban the Box" Bill Passes Senate in Tennessee, LOCAL 8 (Mar. 8, 2016, 11:50 AM), http://www.local8now.com/content/news/Ban-the-Box-bill-passes-Senate-in-Tennessee-371401731.html. Governor Haslam subsequently signed this bill into law. See Joel Ebert, House Sends 'Ban the Box' Bill to Haslam, THE TENNESSEAN (Mar. 14, 2016, 10:17 PM), http://www.wbir.com/news/local/house-sends-ban-the-box-bill-to-haslam/82838484 ("Before the chamber's vote, Gov. Bill Haslam said he supported the bill and would likely sign the legislation."). But he signed a companion bill first on March 31, 2016, prohibiting any local government in Tennessee from prohibiting a private employer from requesting certain information on an employment application or during the hiring process. See Act of Mar. 31, 2016, Pub. Ch. No. 606 (to amend TENN. CODE ANN. § 7-51-1802). The Act states:

> Except as otherwise provided by state or federal law, a local government shall not, as a condition of doing business within the jurisdictional boundaries of the local government or contracting with the local government, prohibit an employer from requesting any information on an application for employment or during the process of hiring a new employee.

Id. So, before passing the proposed statewide ban the box statute for public employers, Tennessee first banned local governments from extending any ban the box policy to private employers. See id. This is at odds with the ultimate goal behind the ban the box movement—to offer fair chances of employment to ex-offenders and reduce the recidivism rate. Tennessee should not limit its fair chance hiring policies to public employers before it has had any chance to evaluate how a statewide ban the box policy for public employers affects recidivism.

19. TENN. CODE ANN. § 8-50-112(b) (2016) provides that:

> If an employer announces a position for employment that is not a covered position, the employer shall not inquire about an applicant's criminal history on the initial application form. An employer may inquire about an applicant's criminal history after the initial screening of applications. If an employer inquires about an applicant's criminal history, the employer shall provide the applicant with an opportunity to provide an explanation of the applicant's criminal history to the employer.

this new Tennessee statute does not apply to private employers, leaving many jobs completely unattainable for those with criminal records.[20] This Note will argue that a statute applying to both public and private employers is more in line with current public policy throughout the nation and best serves the goals of reducing recidivism and encouraging post-arrest employment in Tennessee.[21]

Part II of this Note will provide an overview of how criminal history affects job opportunities for ex-offenders. Part III will outline different interests of employers in the hiring process, focusing mainly on negligent hiring and how it relates to criminal background checks. Part IV will examine the different federal implications relating to criminal background checks in the hiring process, specifically Title VII, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission ("EEOC"), and the Fair Credit and Reporting Act. Part V will examine different ban the box laws in other states, as well as the Memphis, Tennessee, ban the box ordinance. Part V will then argue that the ban the box movement is imminent for Tennessee because of various underlying policy ramifications. Finally, Part VI will provide the elements of a proposed ban the box law for Tennessee.

II. OVERVIEW OF CRIMINAL HISTORY AFFECTING JOB PLACEMENT

A. Implications of Ban the Box

As many as 70 million adults in the United States have a prior arrest or conviction, and it is nearly impossible for those individuals to find employment in a time when employers can easily access background checks through the Internet, thereby systematically excluding anyone from employment who has a conviction

---

Id.

20. See id.

21. While the policies that have already been implemented prohibiting state and local government employers from inquiring into criminal history on initial job applications show that Tennessee is receptive to the idea of fair chance hiring policies, the recent legislation prohibiting localities in Tennessee from limiting private employers does not embrace the underlying goals of such legislation and is not in accordance with the direction these laws are moving. See supra note 18, Act of Mar. 31, 2016, Pub. Ch. No. 606 (to amend TENN. CODE ANN. § 7-51-1802) (banning local governments in Tennessee from extending ban the box policies to private employers).

record.[22] A majority of employers currently use criminal background checks as an integral part of their hiring processes, and this trend has continued to increase in the last several years.[23] Particularly in the aftereffects of September 11, 2001, background checks have become both easily accessible and inexpensive, making them a popular tool for employers.[24] One survey found that as many as ninety-two percent of employers use background checks when making hiring decisions.[25] Criminal background checks can promote safety in the workplace by allowing employers to exclude anyone with a criminal history, but it is still up to the employer to become informed about the individual it is hiring. "However, imposing a background check that denies any type of employment for people with criminal records is not only unreasonable, but it can also be illegal under civil rights laws."[26] Employers who use "blanket exclusions fail to take into account critical information, including the nature of an offense, the age of the offense, or even its relationship to the job."[27] This is important because blanket

---

22. NAT'L EMP'T LAW PROJECT, SEIZING THE "BAN THE BOX" MOMENTUM TO ADVANCE A NEW GENERATION OF FAIR CHANCE HIRING REFORMS 2 (2014) [hereinafter SEIZING MOMENTUM] http://www.nelp.org/content/uploads/2015/03/Seizing-Ban-the-Box-Momentum-Advance-New-Generation-Fair-Chance-Hiring-Reforms.pdf (estimating that 70 million U.S. adults have some arrest or conviction that makes the likelihood of a callback interview for an entry level position drop by fifty percent).

23. See MICHELLE NATIVIDAD RODRIGUEZ & MAURICE EMSELLEM, NAT'L EMP'T LAW PROJECT, 65 MILLION "NEED NOT APPLY": THE CASE FOR REFORMING CRIMINAL BACKGROUND CHECKS FOR EMPLOYMENT 1 (2011), http://www.nelp.org/content/uploads/2015/03/65_Million_Need_Not_Apply.pdf?nocdn=1 (noting that the criminal background check industry has grown in recent years, providing access to more employers and further limiting the pool of jobs that ex-offenders can attain).

24. See id.

25. See SOC'Y FOR HUMAN RES. MGMT., BACKGROUND CHECKING: CONDUCTING CRIMINAL BACKGROUND CHECKS 3 (2010) [hereinafter CONDUCTING CRIMINAL BACKGROUND CHECKS], https://perma.cc/4MKV-YKY7 (displaying the findings of a survey conducted by the largest association of human resources personnel of which the members consist mostly of large employers).

26. RODRIGUEZ & EMSELLEM, supra note 23, at 1.

27. Id.

exclusions that fail to take such information into account could be unconstitutional.[28]

For example, a fifteen-year-old nonviolent drug charge will likely have no effect on the job performance of a potential employee at a grocery store but can serve as a barrier to employment at the grocery store. Johnny Magee found himself in exactly this situation.[29] He was a developmentally disabled man in Dublin, California, who picked up a package for his uncle; Magee was completely unaware that the package contained drugs.[30] Although Magee had never used drugs or been convicted of any other offense, he was arrested and convicted of conspiracy to commit a drug offense in 1999.[31] Magee had held the same landscaping job for six years, but budget cuts forced him to search for a new job in 2008.[32] He applied to be a garden center attendant at Lowe's Home Improvement store in 2008, nearly ten years after his arrest.[33] Despite Magee's years of prior experience in the industry and good job performance, Lowe's denied Magee the job because of his single conviction.[34] Magee never had an opportunity to explain the circumstances of his arrest or demonstrate his fitness for the job.[35] Later, Magee petitioned the court for a dismissal of his conviction, which the court granted, setting aside his finding of guilt.[36] Companies with blanket-exclusion hiring policies for those with any arrest history deny employment to potentially better-qualified applicants without even reaching the applicant's qualifications or providing an opportunity for the applicant to explain the circumstances around his or her conviction.

---

28. See Green v. Mo. Pac. R.R. Co., 523 F.2d 1290, 1297–98 (establishing the list of factors for an employer to evaluate a prior criminal offense and reasoning that failing to consider these factors is likely to result in "an unnecessarily harsh and unjust burden" on certain racial groups, particularly black males).

29. See RODRIGUEZ & EMSELLEM, supra note 23, at 4.

30. Id.

31. Id.

32. Id.

33. Id.

34. Id.

35. Id.

36. Id.

Ban the box laws reduce discrimination in the hiring process by allowing a fair chance for ex-offenders to attain employment or to at least be considered for the position.[37] Ban the box laws encourage numerous goals: (1) they promote hiring based on qualifications for the job rather than placing a complete bar on employment due to a prior conviction; (2) they encourage individualized assessment of applicants, potentially leading to more efficient hiring practices; (3) they reduce the recidivism rate by increasing job opportunities for people with convictions; and (4) they incorporate ex-offenders back into the workplace.

1. Promote Hiring Based on Qualifications for the Job

Ban the box laws promote hiring decisions based on qualifications for the job rather than criminal histories.[38] "Ban the box laws do not preclude employers from ever looking into an applicant's criminal history, but do postpone the inquiry until later in the hiring process."[39] The rationale behind postponing an employer's inquiry into an applicant's criminal history is to promote hiring based on qualifications for the job, such as prior experience in the industry or educational background, rather than systematically denying every applicant with a conviction history.[40] The conviction may have been a youthful indiscretion that is remote in time and easily explained, or it may be a situation like Johnny Magee's, in which a court later set aside his finding of guilt.[41] Moreover, society should not continue to hold people accountable when they have already served their time and paid their debt to society; the criminal justice system does not intend a conviction to forever bar an individual from employment.[42]

---

37. See SEIZING MOMENTUM, supra note 22, at 2.

38. See Fair Chance, supra note 14.

39. Barbara L. Johnson & Stefanee J. Handon, State Employment Law Developments II.B. Mar. 26–28, 2015, Westlaw SW025 ALI-CLE 1441.

40. Id.

41. See RODRIGUEZ & EMSELLEM, supra note 23, at 4.

42. See, e.g., SEIZING MOMENTUM, supra note 22, at 1 ("Fair chance hiring policies are positioned like never before to change minds and open up job opportunities for the millions of people who have been unfairly locked out of the job market.").

Opponents of ban the box laws argue that employers should retain full discretion over hiring persons with criminal records, regardless of the effect on recidivism. Their concern is not without merit, but "[b]an the [b]ox laws do not require employers to hire people with criminal records."[43] Employers still retain control over the hiring process, and specific exceptions, such as sensitive jobs or jobs involving contact with vulnerable populations, would allow initial background checks.[44] Many ban the box laws provide a list of factors for employers to take into account when evaluating whether an employee is fit for the job.[45] These factors provide a framework for employers to evaluate potential employees based on qualifications for the job rather than criminal history alone; they also reduce employer liability under negligent hiring laws by requiring the employer to be aware of potential risks associated with each particular position and potential employee.[46]

Many of the factors employers must take into account in making employment decisions under ban the box laws stem from the factors the Eighth Circuit set out in Green v. Missouri Pacific Railroad Company.[47] In Green, the court struck down an employment practice that refused to consider any applicant convicted of a crime other than a minor traffic offense.[48] The court opined that:

> We cannot conceive of any business necessity that would automatically place every individual convicted of any offense, except a minor traffic offense, in the permanent ranks of the unemployed. This is

---

43. Johnson & Handon, supra note 39 at II.B. (emphasis added).

44. Id. at II.E.2.; see also infra note 133 (indicating the exception under New York law); infra note 161 (indicating the exception under the Memphis, Tennessee, City Code).

45. See D.C. CODE ANN. § 32-1342 (West, Westlaw through 2016); N.Y. CORRECT. LAW § 753 (McKinney, Westlaw through L.2016).

46. See James R. Todd, Comment, "It's Not My Problem": How Workplace Violence and Potential Employer Liability Lead to Employment Discrimination of Ex-convicts, 36 ARIZ. ST. L.J. 725, 727–28 (2004) (examining the factors an employer needs to take into account when deciding whether to hire a new employee, especially when looking to hire an ex-convict).

47. Green v. Mo. Pac. R.R. Co., 523 F.2d 1290, 1297 (8th Cir. 1975).

48. Id.

> particularly true for blacks who have suffered and still suffer from the burdens of discrimination in our society. To deny job opportunities to these individuals because of some conduct which may be remote in time or does not significantly bear upon the particular job requirements is an unnecessarily harsh and unjust burden.[49]

When evaluating whether an employer should disqualify an applicant based on a criminal offense, the employer should look at the time elapsed since the conviction, the nature and seriousness of the crime in relation to the job sought, the degree of the individual's rehabilitation, and circumstances under which the crime was committed.[50] These factors have become a basis of various topics in employment law, including suggested employment practices. For example, the EEOC has incorporated these factors into its guidelines for consideration of arrest and conviction records in employment decisions.[51] The EEOC guidelines outline "Targeted Exclusions that Are Guided by the Green Factors."[52] The Green factors and their salience in ban the box legislation are important for weight of authority reasons. They demonstrate that ban the box is justified by the judiciary and is not an entirely legislatively-created doctrine.

2. Encourage Individualized Assessment

Ban the box laws encourage individualized assessment by potential employers, which should result in the hiring of employees more suited to each job.[53] Under ban the box laws, employers

---

49. Id. at 1298.

50. Id. at 1297.

51. U.S. EQUAL EMP'T OPPORTUNITY COMM'N, EEOC ENFORCEMENT GUIDANCE: CONSIDERATION OF ARREST AND CONVICTION RECORDS IN EMPLOYMENT DECISIONS UNDER TITLE VII OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964 (2012), [hereinafter EEOC ENFORCEMENT GUIDANCE], https://www.eeoc.gov/laws/guidance/arrest_conviction.cfm.

52. Id.

53. See SEIZING MOMENTUM, supra note 22, at 2 ("The most effective fair chance hiring policies not only remove the conviction and arrest history questions from the application, they also ensure that employers take into account other important factors when considering an applicant's conviction history, incannot place a blanket ban on employment because of a conviction, so this allows the employer an opportunity to interview the candidate, observe his demeanor, and, if allowed by the particular statute, have him explain the circumstances around any conviction or arrest.[54] As discussed in Part III, this could also serve as protection against employer liability for negligent hiring because the employer did take time during the hiring process to assess the individual and his or her suitability for the particular job.[55] Part V discusses specific factors involved in ban the box laws that are supported by both the EEOC guidelines and case law.

3. Reduce Recidivism by Increasing Job Opportunities

Ban the box laws reduce recidivism by increasing employment opportunities for people with convictions. Studies suggest that up to seventy-seven percent of ex-offenders will be re-incarcerated within five years of initial release.[56] Allowing more job opportunities for ex-offenders has numerous and far-reaching benefits, including promoting public safety, saving costs associated with the criminal justice system such as court costs and prison costs, increasing tax revenue by generating more income tax, and improving the family lives of persons related to ex-offenders.[57] According to the National Employment Law Project, a nonprofit cluding the age of the offense, the relationship of the individual's record to the job duties and responsibilities, and evidence of rehabilitation.").

---

54. Id.

55. See generally Marshalls of Nashville, Inc. v. Harding Mall Assocs., 799 S.W.2d 239, 243 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1990) (holding that defendant was not negligent in hiring).

56. See Press Release, Bureau of Justice Statistics, 3 in 4 Former Prisoners in 30 States Arrested Within 5 Years of Release (Apr. 22, 2014), http://www.bjs.gov/content/pub/press/rprts05p0510pr.cfm (stating that two-thirds of a sample of prisoners released were arrested for a new crime within three years, and three-fourths were arrested within five years).

57. Christina O'Connell, Note, Ban the Box: A Call to the Federal Government to Recognize a New Form of Employment Discrimination, 83 FORDHAM L. REV. 2801, 2805–06 (2015); see also Anastasia Christman & Michelle Natividad Rodriguez, Research Supports Fair Chance Policies, NAT'L EMP'T LAW PROJECT (Aug. 1, 2016), http://www.nelp.org/publication/research-supports-fair-chance-policies/ (noting that nearly 700,000 people return to their home communities from incarceration every year).

organization that continually researches relevant issues in employment law:

> The reality that over one in four U.S. adults has a criminal record brings this issue and its public safety and economic consequences to the doorstep of every home in America. As U.S. Secretary of Labor Hilda L. Solis recently stated, "Stable employment helps ex-offenders stay out of the legal system. Focusing on that end is the right thing to do for these individuals, and it makes sense for local communities and our economy as a whole."[58]

When individuals are employed, recidivism goes down.[59] The Safer Foundation, an organization that helps to incorporate formerly incarcerated individuals back into productive society, offers a staffing service for people with criminal records.[60] The program offers initial transitional employment in ninety-day time slots and then offers support as participants move towards permanent employment.[61] The program started in 2005, and, in 2011, Loyola University conducted a recidivism study of the Safer Foundation's outcomes, finding that the program's recidivism rate was sixty-three percent lower than the statewide rate when the individuals maintained an initial employment for at least thirty days.[62]

---

58. See RODRIGUEZ & EMSELLEM, supra note 23, at 4 (quoting Press Release, U.S. Dep't of Labor, US Department of Labor Announces Grant Competition to Help Former Offenders Gain Career Skills and Rejoin Community Life (Feb. 10, 2011), http:// www.dol.gov/opa/media/press/eta/ETA20110185.htm).

59. See John M. Nally et al., The Post-Release Employment and Recidivism Among Different Types of Offenders with a Different Level of Education: A 5-Year Follow-Up Study in Indiana, 9 JUST. POL'Y J. 1, 20 (2012) (finding that "the 'employed' offenders had a lower recidivism rate than the 'unemployed' offenders after release from prison" and "African American males were likely to be recidivist offenders after release from IDOC custody").

60. Transitional Employment Program, SAFER FOUNDATION, http://www.saferfoundation.org/services-programs/transitional-employment-program (last visited Oct. 20, 2016).

61. Id.

62. Id.

4. Incorporate Prior-Convicts Back into the Workplace

Ban the box laws help to incorporate prior convicts back into both the workforce and society. Initiatives like ban the box laws > reduce barriers to employment, so that people with past criminal involvement – after they have been held accountable and paid their dues – can compete for appropriate work opportunities in order to support themselves and their families, pay their taxes, and contribute to the economy.[63]

Research of ban the box laws shows that employment of ex-offenders reduces recidivism, helps to strengthen family life, and allows parents to maintain child support.[64] Research also indicates that where ban the box policies do exist, there is an "unmistakable impact on employer hiring practices benefiting people with arrest and conviction histories."[65] In Minneapolis, "city officials found that removing the conviction or arrest history check-box from initial applications and postponing background checks until after a conditional offer of employment resulted in more than half of applicants with a conviction being hired."[66] Moreover, city officials in Atlanta discovered that ten percent of new hires were people with convictions due to its fair hiring policy.[67] These studies show that ban the box policies already in place are accomplishing their goal of encouraging productive employment for people with convictions.

---

63. Press Release, U.S. Equal Emp't Opportunity Comm'n, EEOC Files Suit Against Two Employers for Use of Criminal Background Checks (June 11, 2013), http://www.eeoc.gov/eeoc/newsroom/release/6-11-13.cfm.

64. SEIZING MOMENTUM, supra note 22, at 2.

65. Id.

66. Id.

67. Id.

III. Employers' Interests: The Tort of Negligent Hiring

A. Negligent Hiring in General

Opponents of ban the box movements, particularly ban the box policies that apply to private employers, may fear that policies limiting employer inquiry into criminal history put employers at risk for the tort of negligent hiring. But this risk is both minimal and unlikely because ban the box policies provide additional incentive and guidelines for employers to thoroughly interview potential employees before giving a conditional offer.

Employers can face liability for negligent hiring when an employer is negligent in employing an individual who poses an unreasonable risk of harm to others.[68] This liability is based in tort law rather than under an agency theory.[69] Liability under negligent hiring turns on whether a plaintiff can prove that the employer knew or should have known that an employee was unfit or possessed otherwise dangerous characteristics at the time of hiring.[70] Some jurisdictions involve unreasonable or foreseeable risk of harm as an additional element.[71]

B. Negligent Hiring Laws in Tennessee

To recover under a negligent hiring claim in Tennessee, a plaintiff must establish the elements of a negligence claim and that the employer had knowledge of the employee's unfitness for the job.[72] The prima facie elements of negligence in Tennessee are: "(1) a duty of care owed by defendant to plaintiff; (2) conduct below the applicable standard of care that amounts to a breach of that 68. 27 AM. JUR. 2D Employment Relationship § 372, Westlaw (database updated Sept. 2016) (citations omitted).

---

69. Id. (citations omitted).

70. Id. (citations omitted).

71. Id. (citations omitted).

72. See Marshalls of Nashville, Inc. v. Harding Mall Assocs., 799 S.W.2d 239, 243 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1990) (holding that defendant was not negligent in hiring the independent contractor because the plaintiff did not prove that the defendant knew or ascertained by reasonable means that the independent contractor was not qualified).

duty; (3) an injury or loss; (4) cause in fact; and (5) proximate, or legal, cause."[73]

"The tort of negligent hiring stems from the principle that a person conducting an activity through employees is liable for harm resulting from the negligent conduct in the employment of improper persons . . . involving risk of harm to others."[74] The risk described is a foreseeable one;[75] thus, in-depth interviews of candidates inherently reduce the foreseeable risk by ensuring that the employer takes the opportunity to find out additional information about the candidate, observing his demeanor during the interview, and otherwise assessing how good a fit the applicant would be for the job at issue. Antidiscrimination laws concerning criminal background explicitly address this concern by providing incentives to conduct in-depth interviews of potential employees and also by providing factors under which to evaluate a conviction if one is discovered.[76]

C. Ban the Box and Negligent Hiring

Ban the box laws create further incentive for employers to conduct in-depth job interviews in order to determine whether applicants pose foreseeable risks. Ban the box laws do not mandate that employers hire ex-offenders; they merely provide guidelines for use of information regarding criminal history in the hiring process and some timing requirements for obtaining that information.[77] Even though some might object to ban the box policies because of negligent hiring liability, a negligent hiring suit is unlikely under a ban the box policy.[78] Under a ban the box policy,

---

73. Giggers v. Memphis Hous. Auth., 277 S.W.3d 359, 364 (Tenn. 2009) (quoting McCall v. Wilder, 913 S.W.2d 150, 153 (Tenn. 1995)).

74. Phipps v. Walker, No. 03A01-9508-CV-00294, 1996 WL 155258, at *2 (Tenn. Ct. App. Apr. 4, 1996) (citation omitted).

75. See Doe v. Catholic Bishop for the Diocese of Memphis, 306 S.W.3d 712, 714 (Tenn. Ct. App. 2008).

76. See infra Part V.

77. Johnson & Handon, supra note 39.

78. An employer is allowed to revoke a conditional offer to a potential employee if he concludes that the nature and seriousness of the crime relate to the job sought. See Green v. Mo. Pac. R.R. Co., 523 F.2d 1290, 1297 (8th Cir. 1975) (quoting Butts v. Nichols, 381 F. Supp. 573, 580 (S.D. Iowa 1974)) ("There is no doubt that the State could logically prohibit and refuse employ-employer liability based on negligent hiring is a small risk because the employer uses the Green factors and individualized assessments to thoroughly evaluate potential employees.[79] Therefore, it is unlikely that this thorough investigation would be found negligent.

IV. FEDERAL ISSUES: TITLE VII AND THE FAIR CREDIT AND REPORTING ACT

A. Title VII and the EEOC

Ban the box laws provide protection for classes not fully shielded from discrimination by federal laws. This includes ex-offenders who cannot easily recover as part of a protected class, such as white males or women with criminal records.

While courts recognize both disparate impact and disparate treatment liability under Title VII, ban the box policies deal only with disparate impact. Under a disparate impact analysis, Title VII prohibits employment practices that, although facially neutral, exclude a "disproportionate percentage" of minorities unless the employer can prove that there was a "business necessity."[80] Under the burden-shifting analysis, a plaintiff must first establish a "prima facie case of substantially disparate impact."[81] Once the plaintiff establishes the prima facie case, the burden then shifts to the employer to demonstrate that the employment practice at issue is justified as a business necessity.[82]

An employment policy that uses an applicant's criminal background as a bar to employment could face a Title VII challenge based on a discriminatory impact on race.[83] Title VII claims are prevalent due to the high rate of individuals in prisons belonging to protected classes.[84] In Green, the court found the railroad ment in certain positions where the felony conviction would directly reflect on the felon's qualifications for the job . . . .").

---

79. See Green, 523 F.2d at 1297–98.

80. Id. at 1293 (citations omitted).

81. Id. (citations omitted).

82. Id. (citations omitted).

83. O'Connell, supra note 57, at 2808.

84. Inmate Race, Fed. Bureau of Prisons, https://www.bop.gov/about/statistics/statistics_inmate_race.jsp (last updated Oct. 20, 2016).

company's employment practice of placing an absolute bar on employment for applicants with conviction records had a discriminatory impact on race and, therefore, violated Title VII.[85] Further, Johnny Magee[86] filed Title VII charges with the EEOC against Lowe's after the home improvement store denied him employment based on his criminal conviction record.[87] An ex-offender can prevail under Title VII if he can show that the particular hiring practice of the business had a disparate impact on a protected class and that the employer cannot prove a business necessity.[88] Courts have held that a criminal conviction is not prima facie job related and requires a more in-depth analysis of the nature of the specific criminal behavior compared to the nature of the job for which the individual is applying.[89] This means that an individual cannot bring an action under Title VII solely because a policy discriminated against people with convictions.

Disparate impact claims only come into play if the employment practice has a significant impact on a protected class.[90] Ex-offenders are not a protected class under Title VII.[91] Further, disparate impact liability does not protect classes such as women

85. Green, 523 F.2d at 1298–99.

86. See supra Part II.

87. See RODRIGUEZ & EMSELLEM, supra note 23, at 4.

88. See Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 431 (1971) ("If an employment practice which operates to exclude Negroes cannot be shown to be related to job performance, the practice is prohibited."); see also 42 U.S.C.A § 2000e-2(k)(1)(A)(i) (2013) ("[A] complaining party demonstrates that a respondent uses a particular employment practice that causes a disparate impact on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin and the respondent fails to demonstrate that the challenged practice is job related for the position in question and consistent with business necessity.").

89. Compare El v. Se. Pa. Transp. Auth., 479 F.3d 232 (3rd Cir. 2007) (holding that an aggressive crime could disqualify an applicant from a job involving transporting disabled persons), with Green, 523 F.2d at 1298 (striking down an employment practice that refused to consider any applicant convicted of a crime other than a minor traffic offense because "fear of cargo theft," "employment disruption caused by recidivism," and "alleged lack of moral character" were not business necessities).

90. 42 U.S.C.A. § 2000e-2 (2013) (enumerating "race, color, religion, sex, and national origin" as the categories of which discrimination is expressly prohibited).

91. Id.

or white citizens.[92] This is one of the holes in federal protection. In a state such as Tennessee without additional state law protection for ex-offenders, many prospective employees who are discriminated against based on having a criminal record only have a claim through state versions of Title VII as a member of a protected class.[93] White citizens, females, and certain other minorities are unlikely to be able to prove the prima facie case of significant impact. This leaves them without a remedy in states that lack additional anti-discrimination protection.[94]

The EEOC endorsed the movement to limit inquiry into criminal records on job applications in its Enforcement Guidance of 2012.[95] Courts typically look to EEOC guidelines as guiding and very persuasive authority. The EEOC's guidance states, "As a best practice, and consistent with applicable laws, the Commission recommends that employers do not ask about convictions on job applications . . . ."[96] The EEOC provides stricter guidelines for employer consideration of arrest and conviction records in relation to Title VII.[97] The EEOC notes that an arrest, as opposed to a conviction, does not establish that the individual has engaged in criminal conduct and does not prove a business necessity.[98] However, "an employer may make an employment decision based on the conduct underlying an arrest if the conduct makes the individual unfit for the position."[99] In most circumstances, a conviction (as opposed to an arrest) can be "sufficient evidence" that an applicant engaged in criminal activity, and, when otherwise allowed by the guidelines, an employer may rely on the conviction when considering potential employees.[100]

Employment practices not conforming to the EEOC guidelines might be subject to Title VII challenges. Because the EEOC and private parties file suits in this area based on disparate treatment and disparate impact of the hiring process, the guidance thor-

---

92. Id.
93. Todd, supra note 46, at 744.
94. See generally Green, 523 F.2d at 1293.
95. EEOC ENFORCEMENT GUIDANCE, supra note 51.
96. Id.
97. Id.
98. Id.
99. Id.
100. Id.

oughly discusses when a potential violation may occur.[101] A disparate treatment violation may occur if an employer treats conviction or arrest history differently for different applicants based on race.[102] A disparate impact violation may also occur if an employer's facially neutral employment practice disproportionately impacts a protected class and there is no legitimate business necessity.[103] Factors the EEOC consistently recognizes as job related and as a business necessity are: (1) whether the employer's policy follows the Uniform Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures or (2) whether the "targeted screen considers at least the nature of the crime, the time elapsed, and the nature of the job."[104] The second factor above provides for individualized assessment and notes that, while not required, "individualized assessment" significantly decreases the likelihood of a Title VII violation.[105]

The EEOC outlined suggestions for best employer practices, including:

> Eliminate policies of practices that exclude people from employment based on any criminal record. Train managers, hiring officials, and decision makers about Title VII and its prohibition on employment discrimination . . . . Develop a narrowly tailored written policy for screening potential applicants and employees for criminal conduct . . . . Determine the specific offenses that may demonstrate unfitness for performing such jobs . . . . Include an individualized assessment . . . . When asking questions about criminal records, limit inquiries to records for which exclusion would be job related for the position in question and consistent with business necessity.[106]

---

101. Id.
102. Id.
103. Id.
104. Id. Note that these are the factors identified by the Eighth Circuit in Green v. Missouri Pacific Railroad, 523 F.2d 1290, 1297 (8th Cir. 1975).
105. Id.
106. Id.

State ban the box statutes reflect many of these factors and guidelines.[107] These guidelines signal the EEOC's intent to monitor and pursue litigation in the area described in the above section more aggressively.[108] The EEOC's intent is also evidenced by the EEOC's recent increase in litigation in the area of employer use of criminal background checks.[109] The EEOC's growing concern in the area of criminal background checks in the employment process shows that public policy is moving towards broader protection, such as ban the box laws, for people with convictions.

B. Fair Credit and Reporting Act

The Fair Credit and Reporting Act (FCRA) also provides some protection against absolute bans on employment based on prior convictions or arrests, but, like Title VII, it fails to provide enough protection for ex-convicts. The FCRA regulates both employer use of criminal background information and also the credit reporting agencies (CRAs) that compile criminal background information.[110] The FCRA's goal is to "monitor accuracy in credit reporting by regulating CRAs and employer disclosure once a report is consulted."[111] The FCRA requires employers to provide notice of adverse actions to applicants along with an opportunity to correct the information.[112] The FCRA uses three main guidelines to regulate certain aspects of employer use of background checks: (1) the applicant must provide the employer with signed permission before conducting the background check; (2) if the employer intends to use information gleaned from the background check to deny employment, the employer must provide the applicant with a report and a summary of the applicant's FCRA rights; and (3) the 107. See, e.g., D.C. CODE ANN. § 32-1342 (West, Westlaw through 2016).

---

108. See EEOC ENFORCEMENT GUIDANCE, supra note 51; see also Theodore W. Reuter, Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's War on Background Checks, 57 ADVOCATE 24 (2014); Press Release, U.S. Equal Emp't Opportunity Comm'n, supra note 62 (reporting that the EEOC filed suit against both BMW and Dollar General for using criminal background policies resulting in disproportionate exclusion of African Americans).

109. See Press Release, U.S. Equal Emp't Opportunity Comm'n, supra note 63.

110. O'Connell, supra note 57, at 2812.

111. Id.

112. Johnson & Handon, supra note 39.

employer must provide notice if he intends to take adverse action against the applicant based on the background check.[113]

The FCRA, however, is relatively narrow in its scope and application to criminal background checks and employment applications. First, the FCRA only provides a private cause of action to individuals who can show that a CRA was negligent or willfully noncompliant.[114] Second, courts require a high showing of error or inaccuracy in the reporting itself to provide a cause of action under the FCRA.[115] The remedy is based on the presence of a misleading report, not just the use of a report in general.[116] Moreover, courts are reluctant to hold the credit reporting agencies liable since the Federal Trade Commission has failed to provide adequate guidelines in evaluating inaccuracies.[117] Because the FCRA does not provide significant protection for people with convictions, many states have enacted policies like ban the box laws to provide additional opportunities for people with convictions to attain employment.

States and localities have increasingly passed laws governing the use of criminal histories in employment applications because, under Title VII and the FCRA, federal law fails to provide adequate protection for individuals with criminal histories to allow them to assimilate back into productive society.[118]

V. BAN THE BOX INITIATIVES ALREADY IN PLACE

Throughout the United States, twenty-four states and over 150 cities and counties have adopted ban the box policies.[119] Most states have policies that remove the conviction history question on

---

113. See 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(b)(2)–(b)(3) (2014); O'Connell, supra note 57, at 2813.

114. O'Connell, supra note 57, at 2814.

115. Id.

116. See 15 U.S.C. § 1681(b) (providing that the FCRA's purpose is "to require that consumer reporting agencies adopt reasonable procedures for meeting the needs of commerce for consumer credit, personnel, insurance, and other information in a manner which is fair and equitable to the consumer, with regard to the confidentiality, accuracy, relevancy, and proper utilization of such information. . . .").

117. O'Connell, supra note 57, at 2814.

118. Johnson & Handon, supra note 39.

119. See CITIES, COUNTIES, AND STATES, supra note 5, at 1.

job applications for public employers only, but nine states and the District of Columbia have policies that extend to both public and private employers, representing a new and crucial step in the movement.[120]

A. Ban the Box Laws that Apply to Public Employers

The states that prohibit initial inquiry into criminal history by public employers are: California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Hawaii, Illinois, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Vermont, Virginia, and Wisconsin.[121] Along with these states, many cities and municipalities have ban the box policies that apply to public employers.[122] In Tennessee, these include Memphis, Nashville, and Chattanooga.[123]

Connecticut's ban the box policy, like many others, requires public employers to deem a potential employee otherwise qualified for the position before conducting a criminal background check.[124] Connecticut is a good example of a recently adopted ban the box statute because it contains a standard list of factors or guidelines that an employer must consider when evaluating an applicant's criminal history. If the background check reveals a prior conviction or arrest, the employer must consider: "(1) the nature of the crime and its relationship to the job for which the person has applied; (2) information pertaining to the degree of rehabilitation of the convicted person; and (3) the time elapsed since the conviction or release . . . ."[125]

Connecticut's ban the box statute is also a good example of the policy underlying the movement. The statute provides that:

---

120. Id.

121. Id.

122. See, e.g., MEMPHIS, TENN., CITY CODE § 3-4-4 (2016); Garrison, supra note 6; Valeria Sistrunk, City Council Votes to "Ban the Box", WDEF.COM, (Dec. 1, 2015, 11:02 PM), http://www.wdef.com/2015/12/01/city-council-votes-to-ban-the-box/.

123. See MEMPHIS, TENN. CITY CODE § 3-4-4 (2016); Garrison, supra note 6; Sistrunk, supra note 122.

124. See CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 46a-80(b) (West 2009 & Supp. 2013).

125. Id. § 46a-80(c).

> The General Assembly finds that the public is best protected when criminal offenders are rehabilitated and returned to society prepared to take their places as productive citizens and that the ability of returned offenders to find meaningful employment is directly related to their normal functioning in the community. It is therefore the policy of this state to encourage all employers to give favorable consideration to providing jobs to qualified individuals, including those who may have criminal conviction records.[126]

The Connecticut statute embodies the movement towards incorporating ex-offenders back into society and recognizes the positive impact on the rest of the public that occurs by allowing these individuals to find gainful employment. Further, it is noteworthy here that the house and the senate both unanimously passed the ban the box bill and overrode a veto by the governor.[127] This demonstrates the receptiveness of many state legislators to adopt fair hiring practices that provide a chance for ex-offenders to attain gainful employment. It also reveals the significance of the underlying goals of these policies—to return ex-offenders to gainful employment and to reduce the recidivism rate. These goals are best served by policies applying to both public and private employers. Dual policies provide a larger pool of jobs and a better opportunity to reincorporate ex-convicts into productive society, thereby reducing the recidivism rate and bettering the public good.

B. Ban the Box Laws That Apply to Both Public and Private Employers

The states that prohibit initial inquiry into criminal history by public and private employers are: Connecticut, Hawaii, Illinois, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, and Vermont, and also the District of Columbia.[128]

---

126. Id. § 46a-79.

127. Connecticut's Fair Chance Law, VERIFYPROJECT.COM, http://www.verifyprotect.com/ban-the-box/connecticut/ (last visited Oct. 20, 2016).

128. See CITIES, COUNTIES, AND STATES, supra note 5.

New York's Antidiscrimination Statute is an example of a fair chance hiring policy that applies to both public and private employers, but it focuses more on the reasons for using criminal history in an employment decision rather than the timing of when an employer can use that information.[129] This statute is a good example of the goals behind fair chance hiring policies—allowing job opportunities for ex-convicts while still protecting employers and preserving their control over hiring decisions.

New York's statute applies to:

> any application by any person for a license or employment at any public or private employer, who has previously been convicted of one or more criminal offenses in this state or in any other jurisdiction . . . . Nothing in this article shall be construed to affect any right an employer may have with respect to an intentional misrepresentation in connection with an application for employment.[130]

New York's antidiscrimination statute prohibits an employer from rejecting an applicant convicted of a crime, or from finding a lack of "good moral character" based solely on the fact that the applicant was convicted of the crime.[131] New York's statute prohibits a blanket denial of employment based on a prior conviction.[132] The statute then lays out exceptions to the prohibition:

> (1) there is a direct relationship between one or more of the previous criminal offenses and the specific license or employment sought or held by the individual; or (2) the issuance or continuation of the license or the granting or continuation of the employment would involve an unreasonable risk to

129. See N.Y. CORRECT. LAW § 751 (McKinney, Westlaw through L.2016).

130. Id.

131. Id. § 752.

132. See id.

> property or to the safety or welfare of specific individuals or the general public.[133]

In considering a potential employee, the public agency or private employer must look to several factors: (a) New York's public policy to "encourage the licensure and employment of persons previously convicted of one or more criminal offenses"; (b) the duties and responsibilities related to the employment; (c) the effect the crime for which the applicant was convicted will have on performance of the job; (d) the time elapsed since the crime; (e) the age of the person at the time of the criminal offense; (f) the seriousness or nature of the offense; (g) any information related to the potential employee's rehabilitation and good conduct; (h) "[t]he legitimate interest of the public agency or private employer in protecting property, and the safety and welfare of specific individuals or the general public."[134]

In making an employment determination, the employer must also consider any "certificate of relief from disabilities or a certificate of good conduct issued to the applicant, which certificate shall create a presumption of rehabilitation in regard to the offense or offenses specified therein."[135] Note that the certificate of good conduct is similar to the certificate of employability in Tennessee, which provides judicial authorization that a specific individual has rehabilitated to a substantial degree and will be able to contribute and perform in employment.[136] This further demonstrates the need for a similar statute in Tennessee—Tennessee has already taken one of the crucial steps listed in the New York Antidiscrimination Statute.[137]

Washington D.C.'s ("D.C.") Antidiscrimination Statute is an example of a statute that has specific and individualized assessment requirements.[138] D.C.'s antidiscrimination statute prohibits an employer from inquiring about or requiring an application to reveal an arrest or criminal accusation.[139] Employers cannot ask

---

133. Id.
134. Id. § 753(1).
135. Id. § 753(2).
136. TENN. CODE ANN. § 40-29-107 (2015).
137. See id.
138. D.C. CODE ANN. § 32-1342 (West, Westlaw through 2016).
139. Id. § 32-1342(a).

an employee or require disclosure of a criminal conviction until after a conditional offer of employment is given.[140] A conditional offer of employment is defined as an offer that is conditional based only on results of subsequent inquiry into a criminal background or another "employment-related contingency expressly communicated to the applicant at the time of the offer."[141] Employers may only revoke conditional offers for a legitimate business reason, which must be reasonable in light of the following factors:

> (1) The specific duties and responsibilities necessarily related to the employment sought or held by the applicant; (2) The bearing, if any, of the criminal offense for which the applicant was previously convicted will have on his or her fitness or ability to perform one or more such duties or responsibilities; (3) The time which has elapsed since the occurrence of the criminal offense; (4) The age of the applicant at the time of the occurrence of the criminal offense; (5) The frequency and seriousness of the criminal offense; and (6) Any information produced by the applicant, or produced on his or her behalf, in regard to his or her rehabilitation and good conduct since the occurrence of the criminal offense.[142]

These factors are nearly identical to the factors in the New York Anti-discrimination statute, and they are also consistent with the business necessity defense in similar actions under federal law, particularly Title VII actions of discriminatory impact.[143]

The D.C. statute exempts companies that employ people who will work in sensitive industries or with vulnerable populations.[144] For example, the statute exempts employers "[w]here a federal or District law or regulation requires the consideration of an applicant's criminal history for the purposes of employment"

140. Id. § 32-1342(b).

141. Id. § 32-1341(3).

142. Id. § 32-1342(d).

143. See N.Y. CORRECT. LAW § 753 (McKinney, Westlaw through L.2016); see also supra Part IV.A.

144. D.C. CODE ANN. § 32-1342 (West, Westlaw through 2016).

and employers that "provide[] programs, services, or direct care to minors or vulnerable adults."[145]

C. Why Ban the Box is Imminent for Tennessee

In March 2016, both houses of the Tennessee legislature voted in favor of a ban the box bill applying to all state employers in Tennessee.[146] The law provides that any state employer announcing an employment position that is not covered shall not inquire into an applicant's criminal history on the application form, but "[a]n employer may inquire about an applicant's criminal history after the initial screening of applications."[147] However, this does not apply to private employers.[148] During the inquiry, an employer must provide the applicant an opportunity to explain any conviction, and the employer must consider factors such as:

> (1) The specific duties and responses of the position;
>
> (2) The bearing, if any, that an applicant's criminal history may have on the applicant's fitness or ability to perform the duties required by the position;
>
> (3) The amount of time that has elapsed since the applicant's conviction or release;
>
> (4) The age of the applicant at the time of the commission of each offense;
>
> (5) The frequency and seriousness of each offense;
>
> (6) Any information produced by the applicant regarding the applicant's rehabilitation and good conduct since the occurrence of an offense; and

---

145. Id.

146. S.B. 2440, 109th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2016); H.B. 2442, 109th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2016), which became TENN. CODE ANN. § 8-50-112 (2016).

147. TENN. CODE ANN. § 8-50-112(b) (2016).

148. See id. § 8-50-112(f)(2) ("'Employer' [m]eans the state and any agency, authority, branch, bureau, commission, corporation, department, or instrumentality of the state. . . .").

> (7) Any public policy considerations with respect to the benefits of employment for applicants with criminal histories.[149]

A "[c]overed position" in Tennessee would be "a position for employment for which a criminal background check is required under federal law or for which the commission of an offense is a disqualifying event for employment under federal or state law[.]"[150]

The Tennessee ban the box law represents a huge milestone for Tennessee in embracing fair chance hiring policies for ex-offenders.[151] While this is a significant step in the right direction for reducing recidivism and incorporating ex-convicts back into productive society, evidence shows that the best way to fulfill these goals is through a fair chance hiring policy that applies to both public and private employers.[152] The current legislation alone shows that the ban the box movement is imminent for Tennessee. And evidence of localities in Tennessee willingly embracing fair chance hiring policies is further proof that Tennessee should adopt a statewide ban the box policy.

The National Employment Law Project, which researches the latest developments in fair hiring practices and widely promotes ban the box laws, recently outlined several "Lessons Learned from Fair Chance Hiring Campaigns[.]"[153] The study found that it is helpful to establish strong ban the box policies in major metropolitan areas in a state before enacting a statewide reform.[154] Many of the current statewide ban the box laws were passed following enactment of local ordinances (California, Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, Minnesota, and Rhode Island are 149. Id. § 8-50-112(c). Note the similarities to the Green factors. Green v. Mo. Pac. R.R. Co., 523 F.2d 1290, 1297 (8th Cir. 1975).

150. Id. § 8-50-112(f)(1).

151. See id.

152. See supra, Part II.A. Further, the thousands of individuals released from prison in Tennessee each year will likely be applying for jobs not limited to state employment. To best meet the goals of these policies, a Tennessee ban the box policy should apply to both public and private employers, encouraging employment for individuals fit for the job across the board, not just in government jobs.

153. SEIZING MOMENTUM, supra note 22, at 4–5.

154. Id. at 5.

a few examples).[155] The study found that this "is especially true in more politically conservative states, like Georgia, Florida, Indiana, Michigan, North Carolina, Texas, and Wisconsin, where there are local campaigns that can help lay the groundwork for statewide initiatives."[156]

Memphis, for example, has a ban the box law applying to the city as an employer.[157] This demonstrates that some Tennessee citizens, through their legislatures, have been thinking about, and are receptive to, the idea of promoting job opportunities for individuals with criminal records.[158] The Memphis ordinance bans inquiry by the city into an applicant's criminal history until "after it has been determined that the applicant is otherwise qualified for the position."[159] This prohibits initial, automatic disqualification of an applicant based solely on criminal record. The ordinance also explicitly prohibits the "box" on the job application regarding inquiry into criminal history.[160] It specifically excludes "police, fire and emergency medical services positions," allowing those positions to have initial background checks for safety reasons.[161] This is similar to the exceptions in statewide statutes for sensitive jobs.

The Memphis ordinance then outlines the specific steps an employer must make to inquire into a criminal background once a candidate has been deemed otherwise qualified for the position.[162] The employer must give a conditional offer of employment, pending a history check, and the applicant must complete a form listing any previous convictions.[163] The city then must provide the applicant with written notification: (1) that a criminal background check will be conducted, (2) that the applicant has an opportunity to rebut a decision of withdrawal of the conditional offer, and (3) what evidence the applicant can provide to rebut information.[164] If

---

155. Id.
156. Id.
157. MEMPHIS, TENN. CITY CODE § 3-4-4 (2016).
158. See id.
159. Id. § 3-4-4(B).
160. Id.
161. Id.
162. Id. § 3-4-4(C).
163. Id.
164. Id. § 3-4-4(C).

the city does choose to rescind an offer after the criminal background check, it must provide a copy of the background check with the specific incident disqualifying employment highlighted.[165] The applicant then has ten days to rebut the denial of employment.[166]

The Memphis ordinance identifies factors the city may use to evaluate previous convictions: (1) the nature of the crime in relation to the job at issue, (2) information concerning the applicant's rehabilitation, (3) time elapsed since the conviction, (4) other information about the degree of rehabilitation or good conduct, (5) the applicant's age at the time of the conviction, (6) the gravity of the offense, and (7) the public policy of the city to encourage employment for ex-offenders.[167]

Other Tennessee cities also support ban the box policies. For instance, Nashville has a significant ban the box movement, and efforts to add a ban the box referendum for all Nashville employers to the August 2015 ballot nearly passed.[168] The Nashville Metro Civil Service Commission recently adopted a ban the box statute effective January 1, 2016, that applies to all potential employees for the Metro Civil Service Commission.[169] Further, Chattanooga voted to remove the criminal history question on city job applications in December 2015.[170] The presence of ban the box legislation in all of the major metropolitan areas in Tennessee, along with the newly-passed statewide ban the box policy for public employers, demonstrates that Tennessee is receptive to the goals behind this movement. A statewide ban the box policy

---

165. Id. § 3-4-4(D)(1).

166. Id. § 3-4-4(D)(2) ("The applicant or current employee shall have ten business days, after notice and the photocopy of the conviction history report from the city, to respond to the city regarding the conviction history report. The city shall provide the applicant with an opportunity to present information rebutting the accuracy and/or relevance of the conviction history report, including information pertaining to any of the factors listed in this subsection D. The city must review all information and documentation received from the applicant prior to taking any final action as to whether to hire said applicant.").

167. Id. § 3-4-4(E). Again, note the similarities to the Green factors. Green v. Mo. Pac. R.R. Co., 523 F.2d 1290, 1297 (8th Cir. 1975).

168. See Garrison, supra note 6.

169. Garrison, supra note 6.

170. Sistrunk, supra note 122.

would align with current views and promote uniformity across the state.

Moreover, in 2014, Tennessee enacted a law to "help reformed former felons find employment and lead lawful lives as productive members of society."[171] The law creates a certificate of employability, in which a judge determines that a specific person with a conviction is sufficiently rehabilitated to be deemed fit for employment.[172] The certificate is meant to help create jobs for those with criminal histories, reduce crime by decreasing the recidivism rate, and protect employers from claims of negligent hiring.[173] When determining whether to grant the certificate of employability, the judge will consider whether the petitioner has sustained an honest, respectable character and whether granting of the petition will materially assist the petitioner in attaining gainful employment; the judge will also ensure that the petitioner does not pose an unreasonable risk to public safety or the safety of any individual.[174]

While the certificate of employability is a step in the right direction, it does not fully address the issue.[175] The certificate neither guarantees hiring nor prevents an employer from inquiring into the criminal background of the applicant; it is more so aimed at providing legal protection to the employer.[176] It also puts a financial burden on the applicant by requiring a filing fee of up to $450.[177] This is a huge burden for a person who has been incarcerated and is seeking a job. Further, the process requires an individual to prepare a petition, find references, and appear before a court; some situations may even require the petitioner to hire an attor-

---

171. Suzanne Robertson, Senate Approves Bill for Felons' Employability Certificate, TENN. B. ASS'N (Mar. 11, 2014, 4:15 PM) http://www.tba.org/news/senate-approves-bill-for-felons-employability-certificate; see also TENN. CODE ANN. § 40-29-107 (2015).

172. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 40-29-107 (2015).

173. Robertson, supra note 171.

174. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 40-29-107(2015).

175. Josh Spickler, New Certification Law Seeks to Give Tennesseans with a Record a Better Chance in the Job Market, SHELBY COUNTY PUB. DEFENDER (July 18, 2014), http://defendshelbyco.org/new-certification-law-seeks-to-give-tennesseans-with-a-record-a-better-chance-in-the-job-market/.

176. See id.

177. Id.

ney.[178] A certificate of employability, though, is one way states begin to address the problem of recidivism and incorporating ex-convicts back into the workforce. Tennessee has already adopted the certificate of employability, which shows that Tennessee is ready to address recidivism and incorporate ex-convicts into the workplace.

In addition to the evidence within Tennessee showing the state is receptive to the policies behind the ban the box movement, there is evidence of similar states embracing ban the box laws. Georgia, a similar southern and conservative state, has a ban the box law that applies to public employers.[179] Georgia became the first state in the South to ban the box in 2015 when Governor Nathan Deal signed the policy into law through an executive order.[180] In Atlanta, Georgia, research showed that a separate city-wide fair chance hiring policy resulted in people with previous arrest or conviction histories making up ten percent of the City's new employees between March and October of 2013.[181] In North Carolina, another southern and conservative state with a similar policy background, many counties and cities have adopted ban the box laws as well: Charlotte, Carrboro, Durham County, Durham City, Spring Lake, Cumberland County.[182]

Throughout the United States, the trend among both public and private employers is to move away from initially inquiring into criminal history in order to promote effective assimilation into the workplace for ex-offenders. In addition to similar southern states moving towards fair chance hiring policies, some private sector companies have abandoned inquiry into criminal history on job applications, which shows how broad and far-reaching this issue is. For example, nationwide employers such as Target are enacting ban the box policies to increase job opportunities for those who

---

178. Id.

179. Victory! Georgia Becomes the First State in the South to "Ban the Box" on State Employment Applications, GA. JUST. PROJECT (Feb. 23, 2015), http://www.gjp.org/news/victory-georgia-becomes-the-first-state-in-the-south-to-ban-the-box-on-state-employment-applications/.

180. Id.

181. See SEIZING MOMENTUM, supra note 22, at 2.

182. See North Carolina's Fair Chance Law: Cities or Counties with a Fair Chance Policy, VERIFYPROJECT.COM, http://www.verifyprotect.com/ban-the-box/north-carolina/ (last visited Oct. 20, 2015).

have served their time for an offense and are ready to assimilate back into productive society.[183] Because many private sector companies and states have implemented fair hiring practices like ban the box, employers already have to comply with numerous variations in fair hiring practices.[184] Montserrat Miller, a partner in the D.C. office of Arnall Golden Gregory, who deals closely with varying ban the box policies, advised, "[t]he trend on passage of ban-the-box measures will continue at the state levels and should therefore be considered holistically by companies as they consider their overall hiring and retention practices with respect to the use of criminal history records."[185]

State ban the box statutes serve as a remedy for those affected by this largely unregulated area of federal law. Because ban the box laws help to solve significant problems, and are gaining nationwide attention, the Tennessee legislature should adopt a statewide ban the box policy applying to both public and private employers. This will provide avenues of aid to those, such as white males, who have no other remedies under Tennessee law for employment discrimination based on criminal convictions. It will also aid tremendously in reducing the recidivism rate and paving the way for more stable communities.

VI. PROPOSED BAN THE BOX LAW FOR TENNESSEE

To accommodate for the integration of the 15,556 individuals who were released from incarceration in Tennessee in 2014 (along with the tens of thousands of individuals released from prison in Tennessee in previous years), who will need to assimilate back into society and the workforce, the Tennessee legislature should enact a policy that restricts the use of criminal convictions and arrest records in the hiring process for both public and private

183. Maxwell Strachan, Target to Drop Criminal Background Questions in Job Applications, HUFFINGTON POST (Oct. 30, 2013, 6:24 PM), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/10/29/target-criminal-history-questions_n_4175407.html.

184. See Roy Maurer, Ban-the-Box Movement Goes Viral, SOC'Y FOR HUM. RESOURCE MGMT., http://www.shrm.org/hrdisciplines/safetysecurity/articles/pages/ban-the-box-movement-viral.aspx (last visited Oct. 21, 2016).

185. Id.

employers.[186] The national ban the box movement, supported by federal institutions such as the EEOC, has been steadily gaining momentum in Tennessee. This is evidenced by Nashville, Memphis, and Chattanooga passing city ordinances banning the box for public employers and the Tennessee legislature voting in favor of a ban the box law applying to all state employers.[187] Taking into account the effectiveness of laws in other states, as well as the enforcement guidelines provided by the EEOC, this Note proposes a ban the box law to apply across the state of Tennessee.

The proposed Tennessee law will apply to both public and private employers. This is important because it provides the most significant protection for ex-offenders and best accommodates the policies behind the ban the box movement—decreasing recidivism by increasing employment opportunities. A law applying to only state employers increases the job opportunities available to individuals released from incarceration, but it leaves out a significant portion of jobs for which those individuals could apply and possibly attain. This proposed law does not mandate that any private employer hire people with convictions. It would simply allow the opportunity for all persons deemed otherwise fit for the job to be interviewed and given a chance for employment. The timeline for my proposed Tennessee law provides that employers may not inquire into criminal history until the employer has determined that the applicant is otherwise qualified for the position. This will provide an opportunity for the candidate to explain or provide other evidence relating to the conviction. Further, only a relevant conviction will be used as grounds for denial of a position.

The law will provide exceptions for sensitive jobs or jobs associated with vulnerable populations, meaning that the ban the box law will not apply to those positions. This will be developed on a case-by-case basis rather than specifically listing the jobs that come into contact with vulnerable populations, but the statutory comments will purposely mention several examples.[188] The statute will also provide an exception for employers that "provide[] pro-

---

186. See CARSON, supra note 1, at 10 tbl.7.

187. See MEMPHIS, TENN. CITY CODE § 3-4-4 (2016); Garrison, supra note 6; see also Capelle, supra note 18.

188. Some examples could include teachers, social workers, firefighters, and child care providers.

grams, services, or direct care to minors or vulnerable adults," or any job required by state or federal law to have a background check.[189] This provision includes teachers and adult caregivers, along with positions such as therapists, doctors, or other positions of significant fiduciary authority.

My proposed Tennessee ban the box law will also provide an exemption for employers who have ten or fewer employees. This is meant to protect and encourage small businesses that do not have the resources to screen potential employees, in contrast to larger businesses with dedicated human resources departments.

When the employer, in compliance with the rest of the statute, has otherwise deemed a potential employee fit for the position, the employer may then conduct a background check into the applicant's criminal history. If the background check reveals a prior arrest or conviction, the employer must use the following guidelines to evaluate the offense:[190] (1) specific duties and responsibilities necessarily related to the position sought by the applicant; (2) whether the prior conviction will bear upon the applicant's fitness or ability to perform a duty or responsibility of the position; (3) the time elapsed since the criminal offense; (4) the applicant's age at the time of the offense; (5) the frequency and seriousness of the offense; and (6) any information produced by the applicant or on his or her behalf regarding rehabilitation and good conduct since the offense.[191] These factors align with those set forth in the guidelines provided by the EEOC and the Green factors recognized by federal courts in determining a business necessity.[192]

---

189. See D.C. CODE ANN. § 32-1342(c) (West, Westlaw through 2016).

190. See, e.g., D.C. CODE ANN. § 32-1342(d) (West, Westlaw through 2016) ("legitimate business reason" factors); N.Y. CORRECT. LAW § 753(h) (McKinney, Westlaw through L.2016); MEMPHIS, TENN. CITY CODE § 3-4-4(E) (2016).

191. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 40-29-107 (2015) (providing for a certificate of employability if a judge determines certain factors of rehabilitation are met); see also Green v. Mo. Pac. R. Co, 523 F.2d 1290, 1297 (8th Cir. 1975) (identifying factors to consider when assessing whether an exclusion is consistent with a business necessity: the nature and gravity of the offense, time passed since the offense, and the nature of the job held or sought).

192. See Green, 523 F.2d at 1298 (striking down an employment practice refusing to consider any applicant convicted of a crime other than a minor traffic offense because "fear of cargo theft," "employment disruption caused by recidi-

If an employer follows the above guidelines but deems the applicant unfit for the position, the employer must provide written notice to the applicant containing the reason (the specific factor that the applicant did not meet) for refusing the position.[193] The written notice requirement will align with the guideline from the EEOC that provides for identifying the specific offenses that would make a candidate unfit for the particular job.[194] It would also ensure that the employer thoroughly assessed the candidate and provide some protection against misuse of the guidelines. Understandably, many may argue that this proposed law is a meaningless hurdle for employers who will likely just dismiss the applicant from consideration as soon as the law will allow them to, but, as mentioned previously, statistics taken from other states and municipalities suggest that such an argument is likely to fail because ban the box policies have led to employers hiring more people with convictions.[195] Opponents of ban the box policies may also argue that a policy limiting inquiry into criminal background during the application process puts an undue burden on small businesses without human resources offices because they will be forced to waste valuable resources interviewing potential candidates and providing conditional offers to later discover a hurdle to employment because of a criminal history.[196] However, concerns like these are not as significant as they might seem because many ban the box laws, including my proposed law for Tennessee, exempt employers who have ten or fewer employees, recognizing their lack of vism," and "alleged lack of moral character" were not business necessities); EEOC ENFORCEMENT GUIDANCE, supra note 51.

---

193. See MEMPHIS, TENN. CITY CODE § 3-4-4(D) (2015) (providing guidelines for how a public employer must inform the potential employee of revocation of the conditional offer).

194. EEOC ENFORCEMENT GUIDANCE, supra note 51.

195. See SEIZING MOMENTUM, supra note 22, at 2 (describing how city officials in Atlanta discovered that, in the seven months after the ban the box policy took force, ten percent of new hires were people with convictions).

196. Tennessee Considers Ban the Box, NAT'L FED'N OF INDEP. BUS. (Mar. 31, 2015), http://www.nfib.com/article/tennessee-considers-ban-the-box-68581/. Josh Boyd, a small business owner in Nashville, indicates that ban the box will cause him to waste "hours of time" on the wrong candidate, increase the likelihood of his hiring a felon, and will overall make work environments more dangerous due to the risk of hiring a prior felon. Id.

resources to conduct such in-depth hiring practices.[197] This exemption of small businesses, along with the exemption for sensitive jobs or those associated with vulnerable populations, stems from balancing the concern of safety against the concern of improving job opportunities for ex-offenders.[198] Current ban the box laws take into account the conflicting concerns of the employer's interest in hiring the best candidate for the job and protecting against negligent hiring versus the public concern for ex-convicts to assimilate back into the productive workforce, reducing the recidivism rate and improving the overall public good.

VII. CONCLUSION

Tennessee should adopt a statewide ban the box law applying to both public and private employers to encourage employment and assimilation back into productive society of individuals who do not pose a threat to others and who have already served time for their prior offenses. The nationwide trend is to move towards fair hiring practices for those with criminal convictions and arrest records, and there is also significant evidence that Tennessee is ready to embrace an expanded policy. Other states have adopted statewide ban the box policies after a major metropolitan area in the state enacted a ban the box ordinance. For example, Tennessee's fellow southern state, Georgia, enacted a statewide ban the box policy on February 23, 2015, less than a year after Atlanta had enacted its own city ordinance limiting inquiry into criminal history on job applications.[199] In Tennessee, Nashville, Memphis, and Chattanooga have all adopted ban the box policies that apply to public city employers, demonstrating that Tennesseans are receptive to the idea and setting the stage for a statewide ban the box policy. The Tennessee legislature seemingly took a huge step forward by passing a statewide ban the box bill applying to public employers.[200] This has the potential, based on statistics from other states, to significantly increase job opportunities for people with convictions. But to fully meet the goals of reducing recidivism and bettering the public good by incorporating ex-convicts into the productive workforce, Tennessee should enact a statewide ban the box policy applying to both public and private employers.

197. See id.

198. See D.C. CODE ANN. § 32-1342 (West, Westlaw through 2016).

199. See Roz Edward, Atlanta City Council Approves Ban the Box Legislation, ATLANTA DAILY WORLD, http://atlantadailyworld.com/2014/10/06/atlanta-city-council-approves-ban-the-box-legislation/ (last visited Oct. 21, 2016); Mollie Reilly, Georgia Governor Signs 'Ban the Box' Order Helping Ex-Offenders Get Jobs, HUFFINGTONPOST (Feb. 24, 2015, 4:17 PM), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2015/02/24/georgia-ban-the-box_n_6746006.html.

200. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 8-50-112 (2016).

THE UNIVERSITY OF MEMPHIS LAW REVIEW

VOLUME 46 | SUMMER 2016 | NUMBER 4

Copyright © 2016 The University of Memphis Law Review

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION

FOSTERING A CULTURE OF SOLUTIONS: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE URBAN REVITALIZATION SYMPOSIUM ISSUE
Daniel M. Schaffzin 793

ARTICLES

ABATING NEIGHBORHOOD BLIGHT WITH COLLABORATIVE POLICY NETWORKS—WHERE HAVE WE BEEN? WHERE ARE WE GOING?
Kermit Lind
Joe Schilling 803

REGULATORY CREATED BLIGHT IN A LEGACY CITY: WHAT IS IT AND WHAT CAN WE DO ABOUT IT?
Steve Barlow
Tommy Pacello
Josh Whitehead 857

COMMUNITY CONTROL SUPERVISION OF BUILDING CODE OFFENDERS IN CLEVELAND'S HOUSING COURT: MAKING THE MOST OF OHIO'S DIRECT SENTENCING FOR MISDEMEANORS
Judge Raymond L. Pianka 903

SAVING OUR CITIES: LAND BANKING IN TENNESSEE
Sohil Shah 927

REVITALIZING URBAN CITIES: LINKING THE PAST TO THE PRESENT
A. Mechele Dickerson 973

AFFIRMATIVELY FURTHERING NEIGHBORHOOD CHOICE: VACANT PROPERTY STRATEGIES AND FAIR HOUSING
James J. Kelly, Jr. 1009

INCLUSIVE COMMUNITIES: GEOGRAPHIC DESEGREGATION, URBAN REVITALIZATION, AND DISPARATE IMPACT UNDER THE FAIR HOUSING ACT
J. William Callison 1039

Fostering a Culture of Solutions: An Introduction to the Urban Revitalization Symposium Issue

DANIEL M. SCHAFFZIN*

In opening this year's Law Review Symposium, I proclaimed that no city is better positioned than Memphis to host scholarly discussion on the many-layered topic of Urban Revitalization: The Legal Implications of Restoring a City. Memphis, of course, was among the cities hardest hit by the historic housing crisis that resulted from the subprime mortgage and predatory lending schemes of the 2000s.[1] For a city that had suffered steady population decline[2] and long ranked among the nation's leaders in bankruptcies,[3] those practices exacerbated an already extreme situation, inflicting a new brand of devastation marked by unprecedented levels of home abandonment, severely diminished property

* Assistant Professor of Law, Director of Experiential Education, and Co-Director of the Neighborhood Preservation Clinic, University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. I am humbled to have been asked by Greg Wagner, Editor-in-Chief of the University of Memphis Law Review, and Kelly Peevyhouse, Law Review Symposium Editor and Neighborhood Preservation Clinic alumnae, to give the welcome address at the Symposium and introduce the articles published in this Symposium issue.

1. See Corky Neale, Subprime Loans and Bankruptcy: The Memphis Experience Post-BAPCPA, 28 AM. BANKR. INST. J. 50, 51 (2009) (detailing Memphis' relatively high rate of foreclosures among Top 100 metro areas in 2006 and 2007).

2. See Jimmie Covington, Memphis Population is Down, BEST TIMES (June 6, 2014, 8:54 AM), http://thebesttimes.com/news/2014/jun/06/memphis-population-down/ (noting that "[h]istorical data reflect that people have been steadily moving out of the city since 1960. Population gains since that time have been the result of annexations rather than any increase in residents within city limits.").

3. See Jacqueline Marino, We Do Bankruptcy Right, MEM. FLYER (Dec. 22, 1997), http://www.weeklywire.com/ww/12-22-97/memphis_cvr.html (detailing Memphis' emergence as "the Bankruptcy Capital of America" despite the economic boom of the late 1990s).

values, and entire neighborhoods changed forever.[4] Today, nearly ten years removed from the crisis' peak and amidst cautious talk of local and national economic recovery, an estimated 13,000 vacant housing units and 53,000 vacant lots linger as blighted properties threaten the stability of Memphis and its citizens.[5]

My proclamation did not find its roots in this problem of admittedly epidemic proportion; rather, it instead had everything to do with the creative and collaborative strategies Memphis is using to confront it.[6] Guided by the collective vision and sheer will of many who participated in this Symposium, including several authors who have contributed to this volume, Memphis has become a model for the innovation and cooperation necessary to fight the scourge of blighted properties and to reenergize the communities in which they sit.[7] And the Law Review's decision to devote its Symposium to the often controversial legal and policy issues connected to any community revitalization effort is just the latest example of the leading role that the University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law ("the Law School") and its students have come to play in that important fight.

In January 2015, the Law School and the City of Memphis Law Division partnered to form the Neighborhood Preservation Clinic.[8] In what is believed to be a first-of-its-kind construct, Clin-

---

4. See Eric Smith, Roulette: How the National Foreclosure Crisis is Playing out Locally – Where it stops, Nobody knows, MEMPHIS NEWS, Sept. 3–9, 2008, http://www.chandlerreports.com/Site/Docs/ForeclosureUpdate-TheMemphisNews3.pdf (describing the impact of the housing and foreclosure crisis of the late 2000s on Memphis).

5. See Our Crisis, MEM. BLIGHT ELIMINATION SUMMIT, http://www.memphisfightsblight.com/#our-crisis (last visited May 17, 2016); see also Ruth McCambridge, What's the Prescription for the Blight Contagion in Memphis? A New Nonprofit?, NONPROFIT Q. (Jan. 26, 2016), https://nonprofitquarterly.org/2016/01/26/whats-the-prescription-for-the-blight-contagion-in-memphis-a-new-nonprofit (noting that "[w]ithin the Memphis City Limits, there are more than 53,000 vacant properties, and since vacancies are the leading cause of blight, the city is plagued by the problem.").

6. See J.B. Wogan, It Takes A Village: The Idea Behind Memphis' Anti-Blight Strategy, GOVERNING (May 17, 2016), http://www.governing.com/topics/urban/gov-memphis-blight-elimination-charter.html.

7. Id.

8. See Peggy Burch, Demolition of Executive Inn Kicks Off Anti-blight Law Clinic, COM. APPEAL (Jan. 9, 2015), http://www.commercialappeal.com/ic students represent the City of Memphis in lawsuits aimed at abating the public nuisance caused by abandoned properties.[9] Clinic students investigate property ownership and conditions, communicate with and train Code Enforcement professionals, and prepare civil actions seeking enforceable orders of compliance with property maintenance and other local housing and building code standards. Just as importantly, to inform their casework, Clinic students learn—and teach[10]—about the history and causes of blighted properties and the pervasive impact those properties have on the children that walk by them on the way to school, the families that live next to them, and the neighborhoods that surround them.[11] Over the course of just three semesters, 24 students news/government/city/demolition-of-executive-inn-kicks-off-anti-blight-law-clinic-ep-867136357-324499121.html; Bianca Phillips, New Anti-Blight Clinic Launched at U of M Law School, MEM. FLYER (Jan. 9, 2015, 1:40 PM), http://www.memphisflyer.com/NewsBlog/archives/2015/01/09/new-anti-blight-clinic-launched-at-u-of-m-law-school.

---

9. The Clinic files its lawsuits pursuant to the Tennessee Neighborhood Preservation Act, TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-6-101. Under the statute, "public nuisance" is defined as > any vacant building that is a menace to the public health, welfare, or safety; structurally unsafe, unsanitary, or not provided with adequate safe egress; that constitutes a fire hazard, dangerous to human life, or no longer fit and habitable; a nuisance as defined in § 29-3-101; or is otherwise determined by the court, the local municipal corporation or code enforcement entity to be as such.

Id. § 13-6-102(8).

10. Among their other responsibilities, Clinic students conduct workshops and training sessions designed to educate community representatives groups about the Tennessee Neighborhood Preservation Act, their casework in the Shelby County Environmental Court, and the causes and impact of neglected property. See Westwood Students, Alumni Attack Blight at School, WMCACTIONNEWS5.COM (Apr. 26, 2016, 6:39 AM), http://www.wmcactionnews5.com/story/31800357/westwood-students-alumni-attack-blight-at-school.

11. See Jarrett Spence, Neighborhood Building in Memphis: A Strategy of Hope, CEOS FOR CITIES (May 7, 2015), https://ceosforcities.org/neighborhood-building-in-memphis-a-strategy-of-hope. In his excellent piece Perspectives on Abandoned Houses in a Time of Dystopia, Professor Kermit Lind explores the "various perspectives on abandoned houses in urban neighborhoods" and "how conflicting reactions perpetuate the crisis of blight for individual residents and their communities." 24 J. AFFORDABLE HOUSING & COMMUNITY DEV. L. 121, have participated in the Clinic, assisting in the filing of more than 100 new blight lawsuits for the City and helping to achieve positive community outcomes in hundreds more.[12]

Yet the Neighborhood Preservation Clinic is just one of many ways in which the Law School has emerged as a centerpiece of Memphis' remarkable community revitalization movement. A week before the Symposium, the Law School's Public Action Law Society convened an Alternative Spring Break program in which more than 60 students from across the county (including many of our own) provided supervised legal assistance and participated in service project initiatives focused on a theme of "Building Community Hope Through Blight Reduction."[13] And just a day before the Symposium, the Law School hosted a summit of community leaders at which its partner, Neighborhood Preservation Inc., unveiled the Memphis Neighborhood Blight Elimination Charter[14] a comprehensive consensus document "intended to serve as both a playbook and a game plan for current and future blight abatement actions."[15]

Indeed, the articles published as part of the 2016 Symposium reflect the blend of creative, committed, and multi-faceted thinking that has characterized Memphis's recent rise against the ills of vacant, abandoned, and neglected properties. The volume's authors, an exceptional group of national scholars and local change 121 (2015). Lind makes the compelling argument that "real solutions for management of abandonment must be based in local communities and tailored to local conditions." Id.

---

12. See Lance Wiedower, Memphis Law Students Help Shape City's Blight Fight, HIGH GROUND NEWS (Jan. 14, 2016), http://www.highgroundnews.com/features/BlightClinic.aspx.

13. See the University of Memphis School of Law Alternative Spring Break Video, 2016 Alternative Spring Break at Memphis Law, https://video.search.yahoo.com/search/video;_ylt=AwrBT4ajNj1X08oAtTNXNyoA;_ylu=X3oDMTEyMm43aWFsBGNvbG8DYmYxBHBvcwMxBHZ0aWQDQjE5MTBfMQRzZWMDc2M-?p=Memphis+Alternative+Spring+Break+Blight&fr=aaplw#id=7&vid=e378940b81b1f62099223eae56fcf053&action=view.

14. See MEMPHIS NEIGHBORHOOD BLIGHT ELIMINATION CHARTER (Mar. 16, 2016), http://static1.squarespace.com/static/56ba157ab654f9986538a18c/t/56e9f94b86db430e409acfc3/1458174297659/Blight+Elimination+Charter+final+3-14-15.pdf.

15. Id.; Our Charter, MEM. BLIGHT ELIMINATION SUMMIT, http://www.memphisfightsblight.com/#our-charter (last visited May 20, 2016).

agents, pragmatically consider both the opportunities and the risks associated with urban revitalization. They admonish us not to forget the complicated causes of the blight epidemic and the predominantly low-income and minority communities that have suffered most because of it. But they also offer solutions.

Kermit Lind and Joe Schilling, patriarchs of the national blight policy movement and architects of the aforementioned Blight Elimination Charter, begin their article Abating Neighborhood Blight with a Collaborative Policy Network—Where Have We Been? Where Are We Going by examining the complex legal and policy influences that have combined to confound the meaning of the word "blight"[16] and to create a culture that accepts property neglect and neighborhood decline as societal norms.[17] Lind and Schilling detail their own work over much of the last 25 years establishing and collaborating with networks of communities and professionals on strategic initiatives designed to thwart, redress, and reclaim blighted properties.[18] Reflecting on lessons learned from these initiatives, Lind and Schilling conclude with a call for even broader collaboration among public, private, and community actors, and recommendations for the implementation of "a more systematic suite of neighborhood preservation and revitalization strategies"[19]—including clarifying the legal principles of blight and nuisance in state and local law,[20] expanding capacity-building opportunities for strategic code enforcement,[21] and the development of local teams or councils for supporting cross-sector coordination and collaboration.[22]

In their article Regulatory Created Blight in a Legacy City: What is It and What Can We Do About It?, Memphians Josh 16. Kermit Lind & Joe Schilling, Abating Neighborhood Blight with Collaborative Policy Networks—Where Have we Been? Where are we Going?, 46 U. MEM. L. REV. 803, 806 (2016) (explaining "blight . . . is a term encumbered with a history of associations that have diffused and diminished its clarity").

17. Id. at 812–15.

18. Id. at 818–39.

19. Id. at 840.

20. Id. at 841–44.

21. Id. at 844–48.

22. Id. at 849–51.

Whitehead, Tommy Pacello, and Steve Barlow[23] posit that, separate and apart from traditional causes of blight,[24] land use regulations and building codes designed to encourage growth and development instead act often to create additional stimuli for the abandonment and decline upon which blighted communities emerge.[25] To make their case, Whitehead, Pacello, and Barlow delve into the rich history and complex evolution of Memphis's regulation of land use and construction, demonstrating how such regulation continues to counteract good faith efforts by government actors and others to eliminate vacant and abandoned properties.[26] To do away with regulatory created blight, the authors conclude, cities like Memphis should "identify and focus on small neighborhood target areas and start by finding ways to remove such regulatory barriers at that level, thereby stimulating small re-development projects that were previously impossible in that location."[27]

Judge Raymond Pianka, one of our country's preeminent housing court jurists, writes in Community Control Supervision of Building Code Offenders in Cleveland's Housing Court: Making the Most of Ohio's Direct Sentencing for Misdemeanors about his Court's novel use of community control sentencing to ensure owner compliance beyond just the single blighted or code-violating property that may be at issue.[28] After giving insight into the Court's development, jurisdiction, and evolution into a "problem-solving" advocate,[29] Judge Pianka explores the statutory underpin-

23. I note with pleasure that Mr. Whitehead, Mr. Pacello, and Mr. Barlow are all distinguished alumni of The University of Memphis School of Law. Both Mr. Whitehead and Mr. Barlow serve as adjunct Law School faculty, and Mr. Barlow (or Professor Barlow, as I call him) is both the Co-Director of the Neighborhood Preservation Clinic and the undisputed leader of the remarkable blight-fighting effort in Memphis. I am proud to partner with and learn from him at every turn.

24. Josh Whitehead, Tommy Pacello & Steve Barlow, Regulatory Created Blight in a Legacy City: What Is It and What Can We Do About It?, 46 U. MEM. L. REV. 857 (2016).

25. Id. at 857–63.

26. Id. at 869–89.

27. Id. at 901.

28. Judge Raymond Pianka, Community Control Supervision of Building Code Offenders in Cleveland's Housing Court: Making the Most of Ohio's Direct Sentencing for Misdemeanors, 46 U. MEM. L. REV. 903 (2016).

29. Id. at 906–09.

nings of community control sanctions in Ohio and explains how the Court's use of such sanctions operates in line with the direct sentencing method recommended by the Ohio Criminal Sentencing Commission.[30] Judge Pianka then details the community control obligations posed on offending owners—namely the provision of a list of all properties the defendant owns, the duty to keep all properties in good repair, and a requirement to regularly visit and inspect each property to ensure it remains in good repair—and the manner in which the Court's Housing Specialists operate to enforce these obligations.[31] Concluding with a candid assessment of the efficacy, opportunities, and challenges of community control supervision as demonstrated in his Court,[32] Judge Pianka endorses this sentencing alternative as one supplying the flexibility needed by courts specializing in housing issues.[33]

In Saving Our Cities: Land Banking in Tennessee, Sohil Shah offers land banking as a "novel and assertive approach" capable of succeeding where other efforts to address vacant and neglected properties have not.[34] After explaining land banking—Shah notes that "[a] land bank, at its essence, converts vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties into productive use"[35]—Shah details the evolution of the Tennessee Local Land Bank Act before comparing the Tennessee legislation to template legislation created by land banking expert Professor Frank Alexander.[36] Shah ends with an assessment of the three land banks presently active in Tennessee (Oak Ridge, Chattanooga, and Memphis),[37] upon which he reaffirms his conclusion that local governments across Tennessee should create and devote significant resources to land banks as a means of combatting vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties.[38]

---

30. Id. at 909–13.
31. Id. at 913–94.
32. Id. at 907–26.
33. Id. at 926.
34. Sohil Shah, Saving Our Cities: Land Banking in Tennessee, 46 U. MEM. L. REV. 927, 928. (2016).
35. Id. at 929.
36. Id. at 939–66.
37. Id. at 966–69.
38. Id. at 973.

Although her article is also solution-focused, University of Texas School of Law Professor A. Mechele Dickerson's leads off Revitalizing Urban Cities: Linking the Past to the Present with a strong caution to policymakers against using the nebulous concept of "blight" to defend traditional urban revitalization remedies that have concentrated on communities consisting of low-income, primarily black or Latino residents.[39] Dickerson roots her admonition in a thorough review of the role that federal, state, and local government actors—through discriminatory laws and practices, pretextual zoning laws, and racially and demographically-segregated public housing programs—and private actors, most notably urban landlords and lenders, have historically played in planting the seeds of blight in low-income neighborhoods.[40] She then takes to task the eminent domain and urban removal programs traditionally used by cities to counteract blight. Though these programs have often revitalized blighted neighborhoods, Dickerson notes, they have done so only after destroying entrenched and potentially sustainable communities while "pushing" their low-income, minority residents to other blighted areas.[41] Rather than defaulting to demolition of troubled buildings and relocation of poor resident in the neighborhoods most threatened by blight, Dickerson closes with a call for early and innovative interventions that strive to save and rehabilitate buildings where possible, restore economic viability, and encourage investment, and keep long-standing neighborhoods intact by revising zoning restrictions, using land banks, and supporting other initiatives designed to grow affordable housing stock.[42]

In similar fashion, James Kelly's Affirmatively Furthering Neighborhood Choice: Vacant Property Strategies and Fair Housing reminds that even the most innovative efforts to address vacant properties must operate in line with the Fair Housing Act's new mandate to Affirmatively Further Fair Housing ("AFFH").[43] Kelly first offers a comprehensive analysis of AFFH's place within the 39. A. Mechele Dickerson, Revitalizing Urban Cities: Linking the Past to the Present, 46 U. MEM. L. REV. 973, 973–79 (2016).

40. Id. at 979–94.

41. Id. at 994–1002.

42. Id. at 1002–08.

43. James Kelly, Jr., Affirmatively Furthering Neighborhood Choice: Vacant Property Strategies and Fair Housing, 46 U. MEM. L. REV. 1009 (2016).

broader FHA context and the obligations it can be said to impose upon local government entities following HUD's issuance in 2015 of the Final Rule for AFFH.[44] HUD's clear focus on AFFH, Kelly advises, requires that "[l]ocal governments seeking to make their distressed neighborhoods attractive to potential residents choosing new homes must be able to express these revitalization goals as consonant with the promotion of fair housing even as they contend with accusations their market-sensitive approaches to vacant properties reinforces segregation patterns."[45] Kelly uses the common approaches of market-sensitive code enforcement and land banking to demonstrate his point, offering guidance as to how each revitalization mechanism can satisfy the dual aims of affirmatively furthering neighborhood choice and ensuring fair housing compliance.[46]

J. William Callison's article, Inclusive Communities: Geographic Desegregation, Urban Revitalization, and Disparate Impact Under the Fair Housing Act likewise offers helpful insight into the impact of fair housing law on urban revitalization efforts.[47] Delving into the Supreme Court's 2015 decision in Texas Department of Housing and Community Affairs v. Inclusive Communities Project, Inc.,[48] Callison begins by noting that the Court's decision should quell the concerns of many that its repeated acceptance of disparate impact cases on certiorari spelled doom for the theory.[49] Beyond affirming the viability of disparate impact claims under the FHA and the need for both government and private actors to act with related liability in mind, however, Callison posits that Inclusive Communities represents a deterioration of disparate impact theory as a weapon in the fight for racial desegregation and the elimination of race considerations in housing.[50] With this in mind, and pointing to specific language in the Court's opinion, he antici-

---

44. Id. at 1009–13.
45. Id. at 1025.
46. Id. at 1025–38.
47. J. William Callison, Inclusive Communities: Geographic Desegregation, Urban Revitalization, and Disparate Impact Under the Fair Housing Act, 46 U. MEM. L. REV. 1039 (2016).
48. 135 S. Ct. 2507 (2015).
49. Id. at 1039–42.
50. Id. at 1042–48.

pates that future fair housing claims may fail unless able to show discriminatory intent.[51]

Collectively, this Symposium volume offer valuable insight and ideas to those working so hard to breathe new life into many of our country's urban centers. Amidst novel suggestions and distinctive viewpoints, the authors are consistent in the passion with which they emphasize the benefits of creative, collaborative approaches, the crucial need to appreciate the history that has led us to this point, and the paramount importance of taking action in a way that truly acknowledges the many perspectives of blight and the many constituencies impacted by it.[52] To overcome the pervasive culture of blight that has taken hold over decades,[53] we must revitalize our cities and communities by instead fostering a culture of solutions.

---

51. Id. at 1048–54.

52. See also Lind, supra note 11, at 126 ("Some piecemeal solutions actually make things worse because they serve only the interests of the politically and economically powerful at the expense of the poorly represented. Real solutions are not possible from only one or even two perspectives.").

53. See Our Crisis, supra note 5 (describing the "self-perpetuating . . . culture of blight" that has been "allowed to take hold, eroding the aesthetic standards of a community and frustrating other abatement efforts").

Abating Neighborhood Blight with Collaborative Policy Networks—Where Have we Been? Where are we Going?

KERMIT LIND* AND JOE SCHILLING

I. WHAT IS THE LEGAL AND POLICY CONTEXT OF NEIGHBORHOOD BLIGHT?....................806
A The Legal Roots of Blight in Public Nuisance Doctrine 807
B. Definition and History of Blight 810
C. A Culture that Perpetuates Blight, Property Abandonment, and Neighborhood Decline 812
D. Blighted Houses and the Mortgage Crisis 815
II. LEGAL AND POLICY CHALLENGES IN ADDRESSING NEIGHBORHOOD BLIGHT—THE FORMATION OF NATIONAL AND LOCAL NETWORKS 818
A. Code Enforcement's Evolution and Prominence 819
B. Formation of the National Vacant Properties Campaign 822
C. Expanding the Network in Response to National Crisis of Vacant Properties 827
D. Developing a Systematic, Data-Driven Policy Framework for Strategic Code Enforcement 833
III. REFLECTIONS ON HOW FAR WE HAVE COME AND HOW FAR WE NEED TO GO 839
A. Clarifying the Legal Principles of Blight and Nuisance in State and Local Laws and Policies. 841
B. Developing New Systems and Capacities for Strategic Code Enforcement 844
C. Developing Local Teams or Councils for Supporting Cross Sector Coordination and Collaboration 849
D. Developing New Collaborative Models—Insights from the Memphis/Shelby County Neighborhood Blight Elimination Charter 851

Blight is a term with multiple meanings and a complex legal and policy history in the United States.[1] Currently, blight and its community costs are frequently associated with vacant and often foreclosed homes, defective and abandoned buildings, litter, vacant lots, and graffiti. As a legal and policy term, blight has roots in the common law definitions of public nuisance.[2] Researchers and scholars in other disciplines have cited blighted neighborhoods as both a cause and symptom of larger socio-economic problems such as poverty, crime, poor public health, educational deficits, and other personal or systemic distress.

Traditionally neighborhood blight has long been considered a city problem, especially in Rust Belt cities such as Detroit, Cleveland, Flint, and Youngstown. These older, industrial "legacy cities" have become property abandonment's poster children as the result of global waves of socio-economic calamity: first, the deindustrialization of the 1970s and 1980s, and more recently, the mortgage meltdown and Great Recession. Today, blight's geography knows no boundaries as its impacts can be felt in first tier suburban cities, rural towns, and even in the fast growing Sun Belt regions from Phoenix and Las Vegas in the West to Atlanta, New Orleans, and Memphis in the South.

For the past twenty-five years, local government officials and community-based organizations have launched numerous initiatives to combat blighted properties. Cities such as New Orleans, Detroit, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Cleveland have been at the forefront of innovation, adapting traditional legal tools and experimenting with new policy and planning strategies to address neighborhood blight. Several of these cities formed local coalitions of lawyers, local officials, community developers, and university professors to fix out-of-date and ineffective policies and programs to reclaim vacant properties. Emerging from these local collabora-

---

* Clinical Professor Emeritus, Cleveland State University.

 Senior Researcher, Urban Institute.

1. See Vacant Properties Research Network, Charting the Multiple Meanings of Blight—A National Literature Review on Addressing the Community Impacts from Blighted Properties, KEEP AMERICA BEAUTIFUL (May 20, 2015), https://www.kab.org/sites/default/files/Charting_the_Multiple_Meanings_of_Blight_Executive_Summary_FINAL.pdf.

2. Kermit J. Lind, Can Public Nuisance Law Protect Your Neighborhood from Big Banks?, 44 SUFFOLK U. L. REV. 89, 117–18 (2011).

tions and experiments is a national network of practitioners, policymakers, and researchers—often supported by national and regional foundations—who have developed a common language, shared strategies, and stretched legal and policy boundaries. These coalitions of early adopters helped facilitate the development and transfer of innovative laws, policies, plans, and programs that can more systematically prevent, abate, and reclaim vacant and blighted properties.

This Article traces the evolution of these local and national networks and the seeds of a blight policy movement through the experiences of two of its pioneering members: Clinical Professor Emeritus Kermit Lind and Senior Researcher Joe Schilling. Lind and Schilling will offer insights on the movement's legal and policy foundations while reflecting on the challenges that lie ahead for lawyers and policymakers.

Part I defines the legal and policy parameters of neighborhood blight by examining its origins and linkages with public nuisance principles and eminent domain as well as blight's social and cultural dimensions.

Part II outlines the characteristics, members, and elements of a vacant property policy movement from 1990 to 2015. Lind and Schilling describe their collaborations in Cleveland and other cities in helping local practitioners and leaders revise and reform their vacant property policies with a special focus on local government code enforcement programs. They outline a new model—strategic code enforcement—that communities will need to adopt and deploy in light of dramatic shifts in real estate markets, the globalization and securitization of the mortgage industry, and dwindling public resources. Lind and Schilling will offer critical legal and policy lessons from the second wave of vacant properties and neighborhood decline caused by the Mortgage Foreclosure Crisis and Great Recession that still reverberates throughout communities today.

Part III concludes with further reflections about the vacant property policy movement and how its local and national networks can help communities build greater legal and policy capacity as well as facilitate the sharing and development of innovative strategies through collaborative working groups and coordinating councils. Using recent developments in Memphis with the introduction of the nation's first Neighborhood Blight Elimination Charter, Lind and Schilling stress the pivotal roles that community development intermediaries, law schools, and nonprofit lawyers must play in developing and sustaining these local problem-solving networks.

I. WHAT IS THE LEGAL AND POLICY CONTEXT OF NEIGHBORHOOD BLIGHT?

Blight is often associated with a particular property or building, but perhaps its most pernicious impacts occur when it accumulates multiple vacant and abandoned properties in the same place; thus, the neighborhood scale of human habitat—the immovable land and occupied structures—becomes the critical intervention point. These defined habitats have unique characteristics derived from their location and their inhabitants over time. This neighborhood focus is important because millions of people living in neighborhoods, both urban and suburban, are in a battle against blight for the survival of their neighborhood and their health, safety, security, and property values. Interventions for survival must be implemented at the neighborhood level, on a neighborhood scale, and with neighborhood participation in order to be successful. Moving neighborhoods is not an option. Maintaining them is a possibility that depends on policies and programs that operate at the appropriate neighborhood scale.

A discussion of neighborhood blight must first recognize the inherent difficulties in the definition and uses of the term "blight." It is a term encumbered with a history of associations that have diffused and diminished its clarity. Indeed, its attachment to terms like economic, social, crime, health, architecture, and aesthetics push its dimensions to diverse fields of study. Even the use of blight by scholars and practicing professionals in housing, neighborhood, community and urban redevelopment has contributed to confusion about what it means.[3]

---

3. A study conducted by the Vacant Property Research Network ("VPRN"), provides a thorough review of academic and policy literature on the subject of urban blight. Charting the Multiple Meanings of Blight, supra note 1. A large majority of the 300+ articles and reports were written after 2000. Id. This study was led by co-author Schilling.

A. The Legal Roots of Blight in Public Nuisance Doctrine

The term "nuisance" has technical legal meaning that is not the same as its popular meaning. The popular use of the word connotes an annoyance, inconvenience, irritation or offensiveness, like unwanted telephone robocalls.[4] Its technical legal meaning for use in law and public policy is more complex and consequential. The legal doctrine of public nuisance is still not completely settled law and continues to be shaped in the battles over a large range of environmental and product liability issues.

The Restatement (Second) of Torts is perhaps the most convenient guide to current public nuisance law. Nuisance first entered the Restatement of Torts in 1979 and included, for the first time, a discussion of public nuisance doctrine.[5] The venerable torts scholar, Dean William L. Prosser, chaired the committee that drafted the Restatement (Second) of Torts' chapter on nuisance.[6] Prosser said a public nuisance was always a crime and sometimes might be a tort.[7] The common law action of private nuisance emerged from ancient root as the tort we recognize today.

According to Prosser, the term nuisance was also used in connection with a different type of action, one involving an interference with the property rights of the Crown.[8] As such, those interferences—typically obstruction of the king's highway—were

4. U.S. Senator Charles Schumer from New York has fought this nuisance unsuccessfully for several years. Dana Sauchelli & Emily Saul, Chuck Schumer is Sick of Robocalls, NEW YORK POST (Mar. 6, 2015 6:05 PM), http://nypost.com/2016/03/06/chuck-schumer-is-sick-of-robo-calls/. Their use in electoral politics makes relief a remote possibility.

5. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 821A reporter's note (AM. LAW INST. 1979); Kermit J. Lind, Can Public Nuisance Law Protect Your Neighborhood, 89 SUFFOLK U. L. REV. 90, 114–22 (2011) (discussing in detail the history of the doctrine of public nuisance law and its expression in the Restatement (Second) of Torts).

6. See Craig Joyce, Keepers of the Flame: Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts (Fifth Edition) and the Prosser Legacy, 39 VAND. L. REV. 851 (1986) (discussing Prosser's invaluable contributions to the Restatement); John W. Wade, William L. Prosser: Some Impressions and Recollections, 60 CALIF. L. REV. 1255 (1972) (recounting Prosser's unwavering devotion to the law of torts).

7. William L. Prosser, Private Action for Public Nuisance, 52 VA. L. REV. 997, 997 (1966).

8. Lind, supra note 5, 114–17.

deemed crimes and were exclusively prosecuted by the king's officers.[9] Interference with the rights common to all royal subjects came to be regarded as a type of nuisance that could result in criminal sanctions.[10] Activities such as disruption of public markets, emission of noxious smoke or foul odors, diversion of water for a mill, unlicensed plays, and keeping diseased animals were treated as nuisance offenses against these public rights.[11] In these instances, the interference with the public right was so clearly unreasonable that it was often codified as a crime by statute or ordinance.[12]

This, according to Prosser, led to diverse and confusing use of the same term for two entirely different legal matters.[13] The confusion of the principles of private tort and public nuisance theory continues to the present. Since the early 1970s, plaintiffs have used public nuisance law in attempts to abate and obtain compensation for the harm attributed to the private manufacture and distribution of lead paint, poisons and toxins, guns, and climate-changing activities.[14] Municipalities and community groups are using public nuisance law to rein in the predatory practices of financial institutions that are alleged to be the cause of massive blight, abandonment, and devastation to local tax bases.[15] The decisions in these cases over the past several decades have not produced a clear and consistent doctrine. Today the law of nuisance, especially the law of public nuisance, remains unsettled.

Nevertheless, public nuisance law plays a crucial role in the deployment of municipal police power both in the making and the enforcing of laws that protect public health, safety, welfare, security and property rights.[16] Where legislative bodies identify conduct or conditions that need to be prevented or abated, they legislate to ban them and authorize police to enforce those regulations and

---

9. Id.
10. Id.
11. Id.
12. Id.
13. Id. at 115–18.
14. Id. at 118.
15. Id. at 128.
16. Stephen R. Miller, Community Rights and the Municipal Police Power, 55 SANTA CLARA L. REV. 675 (2015) (exploring the nature of police power and its application by communities to defend against predatory business practices of invasive corporations).

assign penalties for noncompliance or remedies.[17] The civil remedies for public nuisance can include a court-ordered abatement of nuisances by or at the expense of those owning a legal interest in the property.[18] Owners who refuse or fail to comply with nuisance remedial orders are most likely to lose their property through liens—either property tax foreclosure or creditor foreclosure on unpaid liens and a sale of property to satisfy those debts.[19]

Civil nuisance remedies to abate nuisance conditions are now becoming a standard tool for housing and neighborhood environmental code enforcement in many local jurisdictions.[20] While it is very effective in dealing with individual properties, the use of civil nuisance abatement against individual owners of large numbers of derelict properties is difficult and expensive.[21] Enforcement of housing and neighborhood codes against abuses by global corporations and other absentee property owners remains a serious problem, especially in neighborhoods of average or depressed housing demand.[22]

As a legal matter, then, public nuisances are clearly a form of blight; a form of blight that may be acted upon by both civil and criminal sanctions. Hitching nuisance and blight together in local

---

17. See Joseph Schilling, Code Enforcement and Community Stabilization: The Forgotten First Responders to Vacant and Foreclosed Homes, 2 ALB. GOV'T L. REV. 101 (2009) (dealing thoroughly with code enforcement issues).

18. Co-author Lind's practice included litigation of numerous civil nuisance abatement cases using Ohio Revised Code Section 3767.41 and foreclosing on receivers' judgment liens to pay for abatement costs. See Lind, supra note 5. Practice aids for attorneys published by the Urban Development Law Clinic at Cleveland State University in support of this type of litigation may be found at https://sites.google.com/site/cmudlc1/Home/public-nuisance-abatement-and-receivership-a-guide-to-ohio-revised-code-3767-41.

19. It should be noted that the involuntary loss of property ownership described here is not a taking in violation of constitutional requirements for just compensation. The loss of title arises from the collection of a debt secured by a lien against the real property for legally authorized expenses to abate nuisance conditions. There is no condemnation for expropriation. See Steven J. Eagle, Does Blight Really Justify Condemnation? 39 URB. LAW. 833, 858 (2007).

20. ALAN MALLACH, BRINGING BUILDINGS BACK 150 (Rutgers Univ. Press ed., 2d ed. 2010) (providing model provisions based on the author's study of many state statutes and participation in drafting some).

21. Lind, supra note 5, at 129.

22. See generally id. at 122–37 (exploring civil nuisance remedies in greater depth and detail).

and state property maintenance codes has the advantage of expanding remedial options to include police power not only to punish owners but also to abate nuisance conditions when owners do not. At the neighborhood level, the statutory designation of specific harmful conditions as public nuisances in public policy is critical for policing seriously harmful blight. Making abatement of nuisance conditions a preparation for redevelopment or reuse of land may incidentally provide an alternative to the eminent domain taking process.[23]

B. Definition and History of Blight

The term blight was appropriated from the field of plant pathology by urban reformers in the early twentieth century to describe the increasing urban disorder associated with crowded, poor, working class neighborhoods. At the turn of the century, many rapidly industrializing cities had woefully inadequate municipal regulation or social services to cope with unhealthy and many times dangerous living and working conditions brought on by rapid urbanization. Blight was used by real estate development and financing enterprises and by governments at all levels to identify and segregate people whose mere presence was deemed a blight on neighborhoods intended to be reserved for white people.[24] Seeing people as blight has been at the root of residential, neighborhood and school segregation by custom and law for much of this country's existence. Using blight in discriminatory urban renewal and suburban development infused it deep in our societal institutions and habits.[25] Blight was a dominant term in describing the urban

---

23. The debate over the role of housing and building maintenance code enforcement in eminent domain proceedings is beyond the scope of this Article. It is, however, clear that the use of the term "blight" interchangeably with the term "nuisance" is a source of some confusion.

24. See Florence Wagman Roisman, Intentional Racial Discrimination and Segregation by the Federal Government as a Principal Cause of Concentrated Poverty: A Response to Schill and Wachter, 143 U. PENN. L. REV. 1351, 1369 (1995) (critiquing strongly federal housing policies that concentrate poverty and blight).

25. While this Article was being written, the national conversation about racism and white supremacy's role is at new levels of intensity. If any evidence of this is to be noted, one needs only to read the publications and speeches of Ta-Nehisi Coates and the responses to his call to consider reparations. See, e.g., Ta-Nehisi Coates, The Case For Reparations: An Intellectual Autopsy, slums which justified urban renewal campaigns that replaced whole neighborhoods of poor people with new economic development. [26]

Blight still plays a big role in the vocabulary of public policy and statutory law. Evidence of this is provided in the exhaustive survey of the meaning of blight found in statutory and case law by Hudson Hayes Luce published in 2000.[27] Luce poses twelve categories of blighting criteria: (1) Structural Defects; (2) Health Hazards; (3) Faulty or Obsolescent Planning; (4) Taxation Issues; (5) Lack of Necessary Amenities, and Utilities; (6) Condition of Title; (7) Character of Neighborhood; (8) Blighted Open Areas; (9) Declared Disaster Areas; (10) Uneconomical Use of Land; (11) Vacancies; and (12) Physical and Geological Factors.[28] He found that language common to all the statutes surveyed include phrases such as: "constitutes an economic and social liability," "conducive to ill health, transmission of disease, infant mortality, juvenile delinquency, and crime," and "detrimental (or a menace) to the public safety, welfare, or morals."[29] Here we can see blighting criteria in a legal and public policy context applied to factors not apparent to casual observation: namely, invisible health hazards, bad planning, taxation, and condition of title.

The VPRN's 2015 national literature review undertaken for the national nonprofit, Keep America Beautiful, sheds some additional light on the current use of the term.[30] Intending to aid in the national campaign to support neighborhood beautification, the study logs recent literature on economic, social, environmental, ATLANTIC (May 22, 2014), http://www.theatlantic.com/business/archive/2014/05/the-case-for-reparations-an-intellectual-autopsy/371125/.

---

26. See Charting the Multiple Meanings of Blight, supra note 1, at 10–11.

27. Hudson Hayes Luce, The Meaning of Blight: A Survey of Statutory and Case Law, 35 REAL PROP., PROB. & TR. J. 289 (2000) (reviewing the statutory definitions of blight in the fifty United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands). First, common characteristics of blight as defined by these statutes are grouped into categories, and standards of evidence for finding blight are examined. Id. Next, standards of review for the various jurisdictions are analyzed. Finally, case law on each of the enumerated categories of blight is analyzed. Id.

28. Id. at 395–96.

29. Id. at 403.

30. Charting the Multiple Meanings of Blight, supra note 1.

and legal dimensions of blight.[31] It illustrates how a multiplicity of uses of the term resists a clear and certain definition.[32] That prompts some people to remember what former United States Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart said in his concurring opinion in a famous case about pornography, "I could never succeed in intelligibly [defining it]. But I know it when I see it."[33]

C. A Culture that Perpetuates Blight, Property Abandonment, and Neighborhood Decline

The blight now threatening to become a chronic crisis across much of the American urban landscape thrives on a culture of neglect and abandonment. Since the days when Manifest Destiny justified our nation's inherent right to expand westward, the American experience expresses a compulsion to advance from the present into something new. While this compulsion can result in valuable gain, such a persistent drive to move forward instead of sustaining what is already built can have serious consequences: threats to individual security, social status, or economic advancement. This expansionist tendency is demonstrated in the development and population of suburban neighborhoods with homeowners seeking to realize the American Dream through newer, bigger houses and lawns.[34] That surging sprawl leaves a destructive impact on the neighborhoods abandoned by their most prosperous and energetic residents.[35] Owners planning to move are more like-

---

31. Id.

32. Id. at 2.

33. Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184, 196 (Stewart, J. concurring) (emphasis added). Incidentally, the case was about a film being shown at a theater in the Coventry Village neighborhood of Cleveland Heights, Ohio. One of the co-authors once lived across the street but did not see the movie.

34. See RICHARD DRINNON, FACING WEST: THE METAPHYSICS OF INDIAN-HATING AND EMPIRE-BUILDING (Univ. of Okla. Press, 1997) and ANDERS STEPHANSON, MANIFEST DESTINY: AMERICAN EXPANSION AND THE EMPIRE OF RIGHT (Hill & Wang 1995), for examples of the literature on the ideology and history of American expansionism. See ANDRES DUANY, ELIZABETH PLATER-ZYBERK AND JEFF SPECK, SUBURBAN NATION: THE RISE OF SPRAWL AND THE DECLINE OF THE AMERICAN DREAM (North Point Press 2000), for a powerful critique of sprawling expansion from urban to suburban lifestyles.

35. See generally JOHN KROMER, FIXING BROKEN CITIES. THE IMPLEMENTATION OF URBAN DEVELOPMENT STRATEGIES, (Routledge 2010) (providing experience-based guidance on restoring abandoned places in cities);

ly to defer or lower maintenance of present structures.[36] The huge investment in sprawling development of housing and infrastructure—such as schools, roads, water systems, sewers, and, commercial amenities—diverts material and human resources away from previously established places.[37]

The cultural priority of building up and moving out diminishes the priority and the value of maintaining and improving existing homes and communities. Neighborhoods once cared for religiously become neglected as the attraction for the new, bigger, and better housing opportunities are promoted.[38] As housing trickles down from people with abundant economic power and social status to those of lesser economic and social status, the means and the standards of neighborhood and housing maintenance eroded.[39] This erosion is exacerbated by the ethnic and racial discrimination

---

ALAN MALLACH, BRINGING BUILDINGS BACK: FROM ABANDONED PROPERTIES TO COMMUNITY ASSETS: A GUIDEBOOK FOR POLICYMAKERS AND PRACTITIONERS 1–9 (2d ed., National Housing Institute 2010) (providing an excellent description of abandonment at the neighborhood level). The authors must acknowledge that Mallach and Kromer are colleagues with whom we have worked and talked regularly and often over the past two decades. Their publications express much of what has been shared among us.

36. MALLACH, supra note 35, at 1; see also Kermit J. Lind, Collateral Matters: Housing Code Compliance in the Mortgage Crisis, 32 N. ILL. U. L. REV. 445, 446–49, 454–55 (2012) (describing neglect and abandonment in the context of the mortgage crisis).

37. ALAN MALLACH, FACING THE URBAN CHALLENGE: THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND AMERICA'S OLDER DISTRESSED CITIES (2010), http://www.brookings.edu/~/media/research/files/papers/2010/5/18-shrinking-cities-mallach/0518_shrinking_cities_mallach.pdf (describing loss of urban populations and neighborhood structures with recommendations for federal policies to deal with the situation).

38. See generally Lind, s*upra* note 36 (discussing neglected and abandoned properties as a result of the mortgage crisis).

39. The Broken Windows theory made famous by Kelling and Wilson in 1982 uses broken windows left unrepaired as a metaphor for the emergence of a culture of lower standards of care and order that enables blight to be acceptable and to spread. Its later application to policing personal conduct may be a departure from its initial focus on the visual appearance of neglected buildings and neighborhood environments. George L. Kelling & James Q. Wilson, Broken Windows: The Police and Neighborhood Safety, ATLANTIC (Mar. 1982), http://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/1982/03/broken-windows/304465/.

that permeates a society frequently described as separate and unequal. Mid-twentieth century suburban sprawl in America is a realization of a white American Dream by those in a supreme position to abandon not only a place they consider undesirable but also a social diversity they reject as well.

As blight becomes more common it becomes more acceptable. As it becomes more acceptable, neglect, abandonment, and even destruction become more evident.[40] It also contributes to the decisions made by local leaders, legislators, elected officials, and administrators who set priorities, make budgets, and allocate resources. Their policy making demonstrates the prevailing values of their constituents. That is at the heart of the Broken Windows theory.[41] Today many state legislatures are cutting taxes, mostly on high incomes and large accumulations of wealth of people in upscale suburban neighborhoods, which then requires the reduction of tax generated revenue going to local municipalities, public schools and the infrastructure maintenance of older communities.[42] As a result, municipalities have to cut services and raise local taxes to subsidize the cuts in state taxes and revenue distributions.[43] This reinforces the cultural notions that old is bad and new is better; poor is unworthy and riches are evidence of worthiness; and abandoning the structures and land in inner cities is justified by the easier, more lucrative development outside of them. By a mixture of design and disdain, the culture accepts the lowering level of

---

40. Id.

41. Id.

42. In an example, many Ohio cities and towns are seeking tax increases in 2016 to replace cuts in state revenue. Local municipalities complain bitterly that the State's governor campaigning for President claims he cut state taxes but ignores the fact that municipalities paid for those cuts with reduced services and increased local taxes. Rich Exner, Ohio Tax Changes Under Gov. John Kasich Leave Villages, Cities Scrambling To Cope with Less, CLEVELAND.COM (Mar. 9, 2016 5:21 PM), http://www.cleveland.com/datacentral/index.ssf/2016/03/ohio_tax_changes_under_gov_joh.html.

43. Id. A 2011 report by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities details state budget cuts to localities in 46 states and the District of Columbia showing the services people most affected. NICHOLAS JOHNSON ET AL., CTR. ON BUDGET & POLICY PRIORITIES, AN UPDATE ON STATE BUDGET CUTS: AT LEAST 46 STATES HAVE IMPOSED CUTS THAT HURT VULNERABLE RESIDENTS AND CAUSE JOB LOSS (2011), http://www.cbpp.org/sites/default/files/atoms/files/3-13-08sfp.pdf.

maintenance by both individuals and the public; defers and diminishes the upkeep of urban water systems, sewer systems, bridges, roads, power grids, and utility facilities; and is sanguine about the way large, remote corporations treat homeowners, borrowers, debtors, and the neighborhoods are being stripped of economic value and social significance.

It is now past time to take a wider look at neighborhood blight, a look that includes the cultural, social, economic, and political factors that are the context for sustaining and growing blight. The struggle against cultural values that allow blight requires more than these new strategies, policies, programs, and data systems. It requires a counter-culture that does not accept blight but instead advances the values of healthy neighborhoods and engaged communities against blight, whether it be intentional or by neglect. What matters most in resisting a culture of blight is a willing coalition of collaborators at the local community level capable and determined to remove blight and resist all that causes or allows it in their community and neighborhoods.

D. Blighted Houses and the Mortgage Crisis

Recent reports suggesting that the U.S. housing market has largely recovered from the 21st century Mortgage Crisis are premature.[44] A closer look reveals that the country is composed not of one market, but of thousands of smaller, local housing markets that have experienced dramatically uneven levels of recovery.[45] Repeated waves of home mortgage failures have inundated certain communities (the "Hardest Hit Communities") resulting in what amounts to a permanent transition to a lower value plateau or, in some cases, to repurposing of previously used land.[46] Homeown-

---

44. HUD posts a monthly scorecard on the housing market recovery. See e.g., Katherine O'Regan, Measuring Progress in the Housing Market, HUDDLE (Jan. 11, 2016), http://blog.hud.gov/index.php/2016/01/11/measuring-progress-housing-market-16/.

45. For a study estimating recovery times of metropolitan markets up to ten years, see Mark Lieberman & Thomas C. Frohlich, Housing Markets Facing Longest Road to Recovery, USA TODAY (Mar. 28, 2015, 8:30 AM), http://www.usatoday.com/story/money/personalfinance/2015/03/28/24-7-wall-st-housing-markets-tough-recovery/70551350/.

46. See, e.g., Joe Light, Why the U.S. Housing Recovery is Leaving Poorer Neighborhoods Behind, WALL STREET J., http://www.wsj.com/articles/in-u-s-ers in these predominantly low and middle income and/or minority communities who endured the Crisis lost significant equity in what is typically their principal asset.[47] Many, including the co-authors, have been closely involved with the tsunami of housing distress, abandonment, chronic vacancy, fraud, and abuse that has overtaken neighborhoods and, in some cases, utterly destroyed them. When we use the word blight to describe the devastation that has happened, and is still happening, to the housing in neighborhoods hardest hit by mortgage abuses and failures, there is no larger or deeper category of blight with which to compare it. The property loss visible to the eye is only the surface.[48] Not so visible is the loss of municipal revenue, the increase cost of virtually every public service provided by municipalities and public schools, and the increasing fiscal instability of many municipalities.[49] And the loss poorer-areas-have-yet-to-see-housing-rebound-1435091711 (last updated June 23, 2015); Nelson D. Schwartz, Poorest Areas Have Missed Out on Boons of Recovery, Study Finds, N.Y. TIMES (Feb. 24, 2016), http://www.nytimes.com/2016/02/25/business/economy/poorest-areas-have-missed-out-on-boons-of-recovery-study-finds.html?smprod=nytcore-iphone&smid=nytcore-iphone-share&_r=0.

---

47. Matthew J. Rossman, Counting Casualties in Communities Hit Hardest by the Foreclosure Crisis 3 (Case W. Reserve Univ. Sch. Of Law, Case Studies Legal Research Paper No. 2015-22, 2015), http://ssrn.com/abstract=2698756 (assessing the scope and scale of damage not nearly and not likely ever to be, recovered by housing consumers). Another study published by the Haas Institute for a Fair and Inclusive Society draws attention to the concentration in African American communities of underwater mortgages and lost equity. See PETER DREIR ET AL., HAAS INST., UNDERWATER AMERICA: OW THE SO-CALLED HOUSING "RECOVERY" IS BYPASSING MANY AMERICAN COMMUNITIES 2 (2014), http://diversity.berkeley.edu/sites/default/files/HaasInsitute_UnderwaterAmerica_PUBLISH.pdf

48. The housing equity loss is estimated at $7 trillion out of some $16 trillion lost altogether. Recovery in the housing sector is going much slower than the rest of the economy and the concentration of high rates of loss by homeowners of color in middle and lower economic households means those who lost the most will recover the least, many not at all. See Rossman, supra note 46, at 1–3.

49. See generally, Raymond H. Brescia. Cities and the Financial Crisis, in in HOW CITIES WILL SAVE THE WORLD: URBAN INNOVATION IN THE FACE OF POPULATION FLOWS, CLIMATE CHANGE, AND ECONOMIC INEQUALITY (Ray Brescia and John Travis Marshall, eds., 2016); see also, Howard Chernick & Andrew Reschovsky, The Fiscal Health of U.S. Cities (2013), http://www.lincoln of dreams, hopes, expectations, and status of individuals and families is beyond counting. One needs to spend only a few hours in a courtroom where code violation cases are heard to see how housing blight is taking its high toll. The concluding chapter on the Mortgage Crisis is yet to be written.

The scale of blight represented in the abandonment of dilapidated housing by those with a legal obligation for or interest in the property is an unprecedented challenge in the neighborhoods of all cities; however, for those cities and older suburbs where most of the housing is occupied by people whose livelihood depends on wages, blight threatens the very survival of their neighborhoods. Removing those blighted structures or rehabilitating them is the essential blight strategy. Where houses are still occupied, blight may be anticipated by property tax and mortgage defaults, deferred or neglected maintenance, ineffective code enforcement, poor rental practices, disappearing equity, underwater mortgages, failure of dwellings for sale to attract purchasers, or replacement of owner occupants with renters. Those indicators call for early intervention.

In the Mortgage Crisis, neighborhood blight usually starts with things that are not apparent from the curb. For instance, in cities where predatory subprime lending was an emerging threat people were unaware that this was the beginning sign of a blight crisis.[50] Some cities that became aware of the threat were preempted by state legislatures from protecting residents and property owners from fraudulent financial practices until it was too late to prevent disaster.[51] The blight that results in structures being inst.edu/pubs/2338_The-Fiscal-Health-of-U-S--Cities (last visited May 22, 2016).

---

50. See, e.g., KATHLEEN C. ENGEL & PATRICIA A. MCCOY, THE SUBPRIME VIRUS: RECKLESS CREDIT, REGULATORY FAILURE, AND NEXT STEPS 3–11 (Oxford Univ. Press 2011).

51. Brett Altier, Municipal Predatory Lending Regulation in Ohio: The Disproportionate Impact of Preemption in Ohio's Cities, 59 CLEV. ST. L. REV. 125, 127 (2011) (analyzing the preemption of Cleveland's attempt to protect borrowers from predatory lending practices resulting in a surge of defaults and foreclosures). The use of preemptive legislation to undermine community resilience in the face of abusive business practices is routine. See id. at 129–30. Legislative proposals ostensibly to fast track mortgage foreclosure of abandoned vacant housing have language attached that would impede localities from code disposed of as solid waste is preceded by blighting influences—owner neglect, personal crises, predatory lending and debt collecting, poor maintenance code compliance, an abandoned dwelling next door.[52] Therefore, the Mortgage Crisis presents a situation in which the term blight needs to apply to the causes, especially the lawless causes, of the abandoned properties that are an immediate threat to public health, safety, welfare, and property interests. Preventing incipient blight from taking hold of properties and spreading by early intervention with strategically designed maintenance policies and programs is a good investment for neighborhoods and cities.

II. LEGAL AND POLICY CHALLENGES IN ADDRESSING NEIGHBORHOOD BLIGHT—THE FORMATION OF NATIONAL AND LOCAL NETWORKS

Against this conceptual framework of blight and nuisance abatement, the authors of this article were both working in the 1990s on the development and implementation of municipal housing codes and code enforcement policies to address community concerns over substandard housing and vacant and abandoned properties. In 2000, Joe Schilling, a former municipal prosecutor from San Diego, was then heading the brownfields redevelopment and smart growth programs for the International City/County Management Association ("ICMA") in Washington D.C. Kermit Lind, a Clinical Professor of Law at Cleveland State University, was in a teaching law practice representing inner city community development corporations whose neighborhood agenda included housing development and neighborhood maintenance.

---

enforcement efforts to ensure banks and other dealers in distressed foreclosed houses comply with community codes. See id. at 159.

52. See Lind, supra note 36, at 450. For more studies on this topic, see CLAUDIA COULTON, ET AL., CTR. ON URB. POVERTY & CMTY. DEV., FORECLOSURE AND BEYOND: A REPORT ON OWNERSHIP AND HOUSING VALUES FOLLOWING SHERIFF'S SALES, CLEVELAND AND CUYAHOGA COUNTY, 2000-2007, 2 (2008); CLAUDIA COULTON, ET AL., CTR. ON URB. POVERTY & CMTY. DEV., PATHWAYS TO FORECLOSURE: A LONGITUDINAL STUDY OF MORTGAGE LOANS, CLEVELAND AND CUYAHOGA COUNTY, 2005-2008, 3, 14 (2008); Kathleen C. Engel & Patricia A. McCoy, A Tale of Three Markets: The Law and Economics of Predatory Lending, 80 TEX. L. REV. 1255, 1260 (2002).

A conference in Cleveland co-sponsored by the Housing Division of Cleveland's Municipal Court and the Cleveland-Marshall College of Law in the spring of 2000 brought these two blight pioneers together for their first meeting. In light of the growing crisis of abandoned vacant houses in Ohio cities, the conference reexamined the use of civil nuisance litigation to abate the blighted conditions caused by abandonment of both local maintenance regulations and unmarketable houses. Although San Diego and Cleveland have dramatically different real estate markets and scales of blighted properties, they found common ground in assessing the challenges of capacity, structure, and code enforcement processes in both cities to adequately address neighborhood blight.

Since then the co-authors have partnered in a variety of technical assistance projects helping local government and community leaders across the country develop more effective legal tools and policy strategies for dealing with the multiple waves of neighborhood blight. Their individual contributions through research, writing, drafting legislation, litigation, speaking, and consulting, helped to lay the foundation for new concepts, such as strategic code enforcement, as well as facilitate the creation of local and national networks of communities and professionals dedicated to reclaiming vacant properties.[53] With a special focus on municipal code enforcement policies and programs, this next section describes their work with local government officials, community developers, and civic leaders to develop and design more collaborative, data driven strategies that can help communities prevent, abate and reclaim blighted properties in a more systematic way.

A. Code Enforcement's Evolution and Prominence

Although neighborhood blight has many drivers and takes different forms, it seems to move fast and takes hold where housing markets and local regulation are weak and fragmented. One common contributing factor that we have seen and studied is the failure of local government code enforcement—the traditional

53. A brief disclaimer is perhaps in order here. Our story is not unique for we have been fortunate to work with many amazing practitioners, policymakers, and community leaders in forging these national and local networks. Space does not allow us to name them, but we want to acknowledge the impact and influence of our fellow travelers upon us and this vacant property policy movement.

housing and neighborhood maintenance programs and associated public policies—to take systematic approaches to manage blight.[54]

Another factor is the inherent and historic isolation of code enforcement as a practice and as a policy strategy for helping preserve, protect, and revitalize neighborhoods. Few avenues exist for those "doing" code enforcement to learn innovative polices and model practices beyond their respective ranks and professions. Effective code enforcement demands breaking down organizational silos and specialized fields, but most code enforcement programs, leaders, and staff operate within a culture of isolation. Below we trace the recent evolution of code enforcement practices and policies as the field expands its horizon. These efforts to reform code enforcement policy and enhance its practice illustrate the work of individuals and the increasing impact and influence of local and national vacant property networks.

In reflecting back, code enforcement during the 1990s seemed to work best when it took actions against individual property owners on a case by case basis. Neglect was perhaps more of a side effect of sprawl and deindustrialization. From our litigation experience at the time, problem property owners were typically of two common types—(1) local rental property owners including the small time, "mom and pop" landlords that rented apartments, duplexes and a few single family homes; and (2) the indigent, unstable or elderly, single-family homeowners and tenants. Code enforcement management and inspection were still emerging as a profession with little formalized training, few resources, and a lack of technology to support it.[55]

---

54. Code enforcement ("CE") often means the legal and administrative processes and tools that local governments use to gain compliance with relevant property maintenance, housing, building and zoning codes designed to protect the public health, safety, and welfare under the municipal police power. See Karen Beck Pooley & Joseph Schilling, Emerging Research on Code Enforcement Strategies for Reclaiming Vacant Properties and Stabilizing Neighborhoods, VACANT PROP. RES. NETWORK (forthcoming summer 2016) (translation brief), http://vacantpropertyresearch.com/translation-briefs/code-enforcement.

55. For a general description of the state of code enforcement practice (the good, bad and ugly) during the 1980s and 1990s, see generally, Elizabeth Howe, Housing Code Enforcement in Eleven Cities, 60 U. DET. J. URB. L. 373 (1982–83); Peter J. May & Raymond J. Burby, Making Sense Out of Regulatory Enforcement, 20 L. & POL'Y 157 (1998); and H. Laurence Ross, Housing Code Enforcement Law in Action, 17 L. & POL'Y 133 (1995).

During our early days of practice, Cleveland and San Diego were gaining attention among their peers for testing new code enforcement strategies and approaches. Cleveland's Municipal Housing Court broke new ground with its innovative sentencing and effective deployment of court specialists to work with homeowners, including corporate defendants. By 2000, Cleveland State University's Urban Development Law Clinic came into its own by using Ohio's receivership statute to support its CDC clients in their efforts to acquire and revitalize vacant properties. By 1995, San Diego City Attorney's Code Enforcement Unit ("CEU") grew to five full time attorneys, three litigation investors, and three support staff prosecuting violations of zoning, building, housing, and other quality of life codes. In partnership with the University of San Diego Law School, CEU also adapted community mediation processes and models to help the city's Planning Department resolve nearly 600 zoning, noise, and other quality of life code cases long before they might need the attention of the courts.[56] CEU also experimented with civil injunctive action against owners of multiple substandard properties and even resurrected provisions of California's old drug and red-light abatement statutes.

By 2000, code enforcement practice seemed somewhat stable, even coming out of the Savings and Loan debacle of the late 1980s. However, as the financing and holding of property portfolios became more sophisticated, predatory, and located far from the community itself, these shifting dynamics within the real estate and lending industries started to expose the weaknesses and limitations of traditional code enforcement practices. Within a few short years the arthritic and fragmented code enforcement apparatus became inadequate for protecting ordinary communities in the path of more complex and pernicious forms neighborhood blight.

Based on our work then and now, we recognized that code enforcement programs and policies serve as the lynchpin for blight prevention and neighborhood preservation. Communities need effective code enforcement, which includes a wide range of legal

---

56. Joseph Schilling, Local Land Use and ADR—The San Diego Saga (1997) (paper presented before the Committee on ADR and Land Use and Development, Texas State Bar, Real Estate and Probate Section and the Center for Public Policy Dispute Resolution, University of Texas School of Law) (on file with co-author).

and administrative remedies, well written codes, more capacity, and new strategies to address the increasingly complex reality of declining housing markets, institutional owners, and a wide array of property conditions. Reforming code enforcement into a system that can be deployed strategically for maximum effect requires political will from a variety of public institutions and officials responsible for the public health, safety and welfare. It takes not only a community-wide commitment and political will to achieve change, we also found out that it would require the formation of and support for local and national networks.

B. Formation of the National Vacant Properties Campaign

The 2000 conference in Cleveland stimulated lots of ideas and subsequent discussions about the need for and value of sharing best practices across communities. A growing number of cities and organizations were looking for new solutions to address blight which threatened their work and investments in neighborhood revitalization. Community advocates wanted to adapt model practices from places as different as Cleveland and San Diego. National funders, public and private, were approached by alarmed community developers and intermediaries looking for help with the explosion of abandonment and vacancy undermining their rehabilitation and restoration work. Those working the front lines of code enforcement and vacant properties also wanted the benefit of new tools such as housing courts, code inspection technology, departmental reorganization, statutory authority for civil litigation, and code reforms—all things that were being tried and tested in those cities hit with the first waves of blight in the 1980s and 1990s.

Around the same time, the Fannie Mae and Ford Foundations became concerned about the threats to their community development and community building investments from neighborhood blight. In the fall of 2001, they brought together leading experts and local housing and community development officials to explore the dimensions of vacant property reclamation—from code enforcement and land banking to repair and rehabilitation.[57] Schilling shared his work with ICMA's vacant properties consortium while learning about similar educational efforts for community development professions through the Local Initiative Support Corporation ("LISC"). The convening also drew attention to the pioneering work of Emory Law Professor Frank Alexander on land banking[58] along with the deep insights about housing, community development, and neighborhood revitalization from national expert Alan Mallach.[59] What became apparent from this gathering was the desperate need for information sharing and collaborative problem solving by those policymakers and practitioners working on the front-lines of neighborhood blight.

57. Vacant Land and Abandoned Properties, FANNIE MAE FOUNDATION ROUNDTABLE (Nov. 5, 2001), co-sponsored by the Ford Foundation (Roundtable Binder and Briefing Papers on file with co-author).

From this gathering, ICMA and LISC formed a partnership with a new Washington, D.C. nonprofit Smart Growth America ("SGA") to launch the National Vacant Properties Campaign ("NVPC").[60] SGA served as its institutional home with significant contributions from ICMA and LISC offering their outreach and technical expertise. With initial support from the Fannie Mae and Surdna Foundations, the NVPC quickly went to work providing various forms of technical assistance to roughly 50 communities over the course of six short years. NVPC relied on the extensive networks and expertise of the three principle organizations—ICMA, SGA, and LISC—as they each represented both new and traditional players in the vacant property issue—local governments, community development organizations, and planners and policymakers interested in revitalization of existing neighborhoods to prevent further sprawl.[61] A wide range of national organizations

---

58. FRANK ALEXANDER, LAND BANK AUTHORITIES—A GUIDE FOR THE CREATION AND OPERATION OF LOCAL LAND BANKS (2005), https://www.hudexchange.info/resources/documents/LandBankAuthoritiesGuideforCreationandOperation.pdf.

59. See MALLACH, supra note 35,

60. See generally Policy Analysis, SMART GROWTH AMERICA, http://www.smartgrowthamerica.org/research/policy-analysis-vacant-properties (last visited May 22, 2016). NVPC's mission and goals included: (1) creating the national network of practitioners and experts trained to help communities implement and improve vacant property strategies and tools; (2) develop and deliver policy tools, research and information resources; (3) build capacity of local regional and national practitioners; and (4) communicate the "case" and brand the issue.

61. See generally Vacant Properties and Smart Growth: Creating Opportunities from Abandonment, FUNDERS NETWORK FOR SMART GROWTH AND

(such as American Planning Association, National Trust for Historic Preservation, etc.) and national experts engaged in different NVPC activities.[62] The NVPC produced a number of important policy assessments, none more influential than its first in Cleveland.

Its report—Cleveland at the Crossroads—set forth a comprehensive vacant property action plan for public officials and community leaders to adopt and adapt.[63] Together, this initial intervention in Cleveland and the Crossroads report served as the template for subsequent NVPC technical assistance projects. Its four-point policy and program framework—(1) real property data and information systems; (2) code enforcement, nuisance abatement, and housing rehabilitation; (3) demolition, land banking, vacant property acquisition and disposition; and (4) land reuse planning, urban greening, and redevelopment—arose from NVPC's compilation of model practices from other communities.[64] The NVPC model provided a menu of short and long term strategies with the goal of affecting positive changes not only to individual properties but also to neighborhoods and the public and nonprofit organizations involved in addressing neighborhood blight.[65]

Another program hallmark piloted in Cleveland was its collaborative process of engaging diverse groups of local stakeholders (e.g., representing local government, the community development field, universities, etc.) to guide the technical assistance team. Neighborhood Progress, Inc., a Cleveland community development

---

LIVABLE COMMUNITIES (Sept. 2004), http://www.fundersnetwork.org/files/learn/LCW_4_Vacant_Properties.pdf.

62. From 2005 to 2009, the NVPC's email list grew from 300 to over 3,000—a good indicator of the Campaign's importance and impact. Interview with Jennifer Leonard, Former NVPC Director (Apr. 6, 2016).

63. ALAN MALLACH, LISA LEVY & JOSEPH SCHILLING, CLEVELAND AT THE CROSSROAD: TURNING ABANDONMENT INTO OPPORTUNITY (2005), https://clevelandmunicipalcourt.org/docs/default-source/default-document-library/at_the_crossroads.pdf?sfvrsn=0.

64. Jennifer Leonard & Joseph Schilling, Lessons from the Field—Strategies and Partnerships for Preventing and Reclaiming Vacant and Abandoned Properties, 36 REAL EST. REV. 31, 31–39 (2007).

65. See generally Robert Beauregard, Strategic Thinking for Distressed Neighborhoods, in THE CITY AFTER ABANDONMENT 227–43 (Margaret Dewar & June Manning Thomas eds. 2013).

intermediary, formed a 25-plus person steering committee that provided feedback to Mallach and Schilling, the NVPC lead consultants. Based on the Cleveland experience, subsequent NVPC technical assistance work was typically led by one NVPC staff member with a team of two to three consultants or practitioners with expertise that closely matched the pressing vacant property challenges identified in preliminary "scoping" visits. Such peer-to-peer learning along with collaborative engagement with local stakeholders increased the likelihood of buy-in and follow-through with the assessments recommendations. The NVPC repeated this approach to technical assistance in other cities by conducting preliminary scoping meetings and study visits to build relationships, uncover the underlying issues, determine the most effective areas of engagement, and then facilitate coalitions of local official and community development practitioners to assess the gaps in their vacant property policies and programs.[66]

Now more than ten years since its release in the summer of 2005, the legacy of the Crossroad's process and the report's recommendations can be measured by the on-going work of the Cleveland's Vacant and Abandoned Property Council ("VAPAC").[67] With initial support from the Cleveland Foundation

66. Co-author Schilling led a series of comprehensive policy assessments, including Cleveland (2005), Dayton (2005), New Orleans (2006), Richmond, Virginia (2006), Buffalo (2006), Toledo (2007), and Youngstown (2009). Each was funded by a combination of resources from local governments, local foundations, and technical assistance grants supported by the Surdna Foundation and a HUD Community Development Block Grant Technical Assistance grant to LISC. The Campaign, under the direction of its first and only full time Director, Jennifer Leonard, also provided other types and levels of technical assistance on specific vacant property issues, such as land banking or code enforcement, etc. Several of these assessment reports can be found at Policy Analysis: Vacant Properties, SMART GROWTH AMERICA, http://www.smartgrowthamerica.org/research/policy-analysis-vacant-properties/.

67. VAPAC grew from the advisory group that helped guide the NVPC's Crossroad report. See generally FRANK FORD, CUYAHOGA COUNTY'S VACANT AND ABANDONED PROPERTY ACTION COUNCIL—VAPAC (Sept. 22, 2015), http://www.wrlandconservancy.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/12/Collaboration_VAPAC.pdf; David Morley, Leading the Charge on Neighborhood Stabilization in Cleveland, VACANT PROPERTY RESEARCH INSTITUTE, http://vacantproperty research.com/wp-content/uploads/2012/02/Ford_Final.pdf; Mary Helen Petrus, Growing Pains, FED. RESERVE BANK OF CLEVELAND (May 5, 2015) and the Enterprise Community Partners, this ad-hoc group of mid-level public officials, nonprofit leaders, and university and institutional experts have met monthly for more than ten years to trouble shoot policy issues and shepherd the adoption of policy actions recommended in the Crossroads Report. Two of those recommendations have in fact become national models such that other cities now look to Cleveland for expertise and advice—the Cuyahoga County Land Reutilization Corporation (a powerful land bank) and Case Western Reserve's real property information system, the Northeast Ohio Community and Neighborhood Data for Organizing ("NEO CANDO").[68]

Beyond its fieldwork, the NVPC leveraged its institutional home at SGA to expand its network and reach within the policy dynamics of Washington, D.C. Working with LISC's public affairs division, the NVPC helped design and draft federal legislation sponsored by Congressmen Higgins from Buffalo and Ryan from Youngstown that would have established a competitive federal technical assistance grant program specifically targeted to older industrial cities that had lost more than fifteen percent of their population.[69] NVPC released an influential survey of the literature documenting the costs and impacts form vacant properties—Vacant Properties—the True Costs to Communities.[70] Given his leadership in reforming state law and creating a new breed of land bank authorities in Michigan, former County Treasurer Dan Kildee and his Genesee Institute, the nonprofit research arm of the Gene-https://www.clevelandfed.org/en/newsroom-and-events/publications/notes-from-the-field/nftf-20150505-growing-pains.aspx.

---

68. For more in depth history and analysis of the VAPAC, NEO CANDO, the Cuyahoga County Land Reutilization Corporation, Reimaging a More Sustainable Cleveland, and other policies and programs that Cleveland developed and expanded, see JOSEPH SCHILLING, CLEVELAND CUYAHOGA COUNTY—A RESILIENT REGION'S RESPONSE TO RECLAIMING VACANT PROPERTIES, VACANT PROPERTIES RESEARCH NETWORK (2014), http://vacantpropertyresearch.com/case-studies/cleveland/.

69. See generally Support the Community Regeneration, Sustainability, and Innovation Act of 2009 (H.R. 932), SMART GROWTH AMERICA, http://www.smartgrowthamerica.org/documents/coalition/2009/08/CRSI-Fact-Sheet_House.pdf.

70. NATIONAL VACANT PROPERTIES CAMPAIGN, Vacant Properties: The True Costs to Communities (2005), http://www.smartgrowthamerica.org/documents/true-costs.pdf.

see County Land Bank Authority, became part of the NVPC's executive team. Perhaps its most enduring legacy is the Reclaiming Vacant Properties Conference, first convened in Pittsburgh in 2007, then subsequently in Louisville in 2009, and again in Cleveland in 2010.[71] Even today, now hosted by the Center for Community Progress, the Reclaiming Vacant Properties Conference remains the only national convening exclusively devoted to vacant property strategies and tools.[72] The NVPC served as the incubator for this national movement by catalyzing local action, synthesizing model practices across communities, and providing a conduit for national organizations, associations, and frontline practitioner and policymakers devoted to finding better ways for reclaiming vacant and abandoned properties. Many of these and other early relationships and connections made through the NVPC still endure today.

C. Expanding the Network in Response to National Crisis of Vacant Properties

By 2003, signs of the mortgage foreclosure crisis were visible in Cleveland—long before they were visible in other communities. As the proverbial "canary in the coalmine," many of Cleveland's thirty-six community development corporations were already documenting the stories of predatory lending as increasing numbers of mortgage foreclosures prompted homeowners, and eventually traditional lending intuitions, to abandon their investments, many of which were located in once stable or transitional neighborhoods.[73]

During NVPC's preliminary work on Cleveland's Crossroads Report, the team found that Dayton and Toledo, Ohio, had

---

71. See generally Reclaiming Vacant Properties Conference Champions Economic and Environmental Revitalization, SMART GROWTH AMERICA (Oct. 15, 2010), http://www.smartgrowthamerica.org/2010/10/15/reclaiming-vacant-properties-conference-champions-economic-and-environmental-revitalization/; Steve Davis, Second Reclaiming Vacant Properties Conference Begins Today, SMART GROWTH AMERICA (June 1, 2009), http://www.smartgrowthamerica.org/2009/06/01/second-reclaiming-vacant-properties-conference-begins-today/.

72. About, CTR. CMTY. PROGRESS, http://www.communityprogress.net/2015-archives-pages-423.php (last visited May 10, 2016).

73. Kermit J. Lind, The Perfect Storm: An Eyewitness Report from Ground Zero in Cleveland's Neighborhoods, 17 J. AFFORDABLE HOUS. & CMTY. DEV. L. 237, 240–41 (2008).

adopted local ordinances that would impose new disclosure requirements on predatory lenders.[74] Unfortunately, the powerful banking interests convinced the Ohio Supreme Court to take a narrow interpretation of the case law by striking down this local neighborhood protection effort under the rubric of state preemption.[75]

Symbolically, Cleveland's Slavic Village neighborhood became known as "ground zero" for the mortgage foreclosure crisis.[76] Cleveland, like many older industrial legacy cities from Detroit and Flint to Buffalo and Baltimore, was now in the middle of a second tsunami of vacant and abandoned properties that crushed many neighborhoods already diminished by decades of depopulation and deindustrialization.[77] News reports and documentaries reinforced the widespread negative impacts of the crisis in major cities across the country from Cleveland and Detroit in the Midwest to Phoenix and Las Vegas in the West.[78]

By 2008 to 2009, the United States' financial system was on the verge of collapse, led by the mortgage foreclosure crisis. As foreclosures escalated and smaller financial institutions failed, thousands of underwater homeowners and victims of predatory lending and debt collecting were forced out of their homes.[79] Local governments were left to figure out how to keep neighborhoods stable. The mortgage foreclosure crisis caused a myriad of "spillover" impacts to once stable neighborhoods, such as the decreases in property values and increases in crime and property abandon-

---

74. Altier, supra note 51 (reporting on this preemptive reaction to municipal self-protection from corporate abuse of land and consumers of housing).

75. Id. at 126–27.

76. Lind, supra note 77, at 237–38.

77. SCHILLING, supra note 68.

78. JUSTIN HOLLANDER, SUNBURNT CITIES: THE GREAT RECESSION, DEPOPULATION, AND URBAN PLANNING IN THE AMERICAN SUNBELT (2011); see David R. Godschalk, In Print: Sunburn Cities by Justin B. Hollander, URBANLAND (July 27, 2011), http://urbanland.uli.org/economy-markets-trends/in-print-sunburnt-cities-by-justin-b-hollander/.

79. See generally DAN IMMERGLUCK, FORECLOSED: HIGH-RISK LENDING, DEREGULATION, AND THE UNDERMINING OF AMERICA'S MORTGAGE MARKET (2011).

ment.[80] Homeowners and mortgagees alike were overwhelmed by the explosion of mortgage foreclosures.[81] Many community development corporations watched sadly as years of hard work and millions of dollars' worth of buildings and rehabbed housing became engulfed by foreclosed vacant abandoned properties.[82]

As the crisis of foreclosed and vacant homes spread across the nation, community development organizations and government associations, such as the Local Initiative Support Corporation, Enterprise Community Partners, NeighborWorks America, and the National Governor's Association, convened a series of workshops, conference calls, and developed online web resources with neighborhood based strategies.[83] They and others became deeply interested in the vacant property assessments and policy strategies, such as land banking and code enforcement, that had been developed and disseminated through the NVPC's emerging network of vacant property communities and practitioners.

For the first time in decades, perhaps since the creation of HUD as part of President Lyndon Johnson's Great Society program, the federal government launched several policy initiatives to combat the market collapse of the mortgage industry. Federal agencies, such as HUD, Treasury, and the Federal Reserve Bank's Community Affairs and Research Divisions convened meetings, workshops, symposiums, and commissioned case studies and research about vacant properties.[84] As the federal government

---

80. See generally Joseph Schilling & Jimena Pinzon, The Basic of Blight, VACANT PROPERTY RESEARCH NETWORK, http://vacantpropertyresearch.com/translation-briefs/blight/.

81. Joseph Schilling, Code Enforcement and Community Stabilization: The Forgotten First Responders to Vacant and Foreclosed Homes, 2 ALB. GOV'T L. REV. 101, 103 (2009).

82. Id.

83. See generally FORECLOSURE RESPONSE, http://foreclosure-response.org (last visited May 11, 2016) (listing a sampling of the foreclosure analysis and support from national community development NGOs that still continues today).

84. Co-author Schilling and NVPC Director Jennifer Leonard attended more than twenty meetings with federal government officials during the peak of the foreclosure crisis from 2008–2010. They were engaged with dozens of national, regional, and local community development organizations through the Neighborhood Stabilization and Foreclosure Prevention Task Force staffed by the National Housing Conference and Enterprise Community Partners. Schilling brought together members of NVPC to share strategies, it started to understand the need to address the potential spillover effects from this concentration of vacant and foreclosed homes. Until that point the federal government's focus was on the individual homeowners, banks, and the mortgage lending industry.[85] With the rather quick adoption of President Obama's stimulus plan, the Neighborhood Stabilization Program ("NSP") became in many respects the federal government's first line of defense against the mortgage foreclosure crisis.[86]

In light of this national crisis, it became apparent that NVPC's work and its network would need to scale up quickly. The Ford Foundation again brought together a critical mass of national leaders and experts, several of whom had been at their earlier meeting in Washington, D.C. that lead to the creation of the NVPC, to develop a game plan for addressing the nation's expanding needs.[87] From this convening, a plan emerged to merge the NVPC with Dan Kildee's Genesee Institute (GI) that would provide additional capacity and capabilities to help communities address the national vacant properties crisis. The new entity would leverage the NVPC's national leadership and holistic command of the issues with GI's deep expertise on land banking and tax foreclosure. With multi-year funding commitments from the Ford Foundation and the Mott Foundation in Flint, Michigan, a new entity arose, the Center for Community Progress ("CCP") led by former Genesee County Treasurer Dan Kildee,[88] the land bank pioneer who became CCP's first president and chairman. Former NVPC Director Jennifer Leonard along with Professor Frank Alexander, and Amy Hovey from the GI served as CCP's first leadership team. During its early days CCP quickly became the "go-to-group" for expanding land banks throughout the rust belt states and beyond along with hosting important events, such as the Reclaim-also made several presentations at workshops and conferences of the Federal Reserve Banks of Cleveland and Richmond.

---

85. Id.

86. Schilling, supra note 81, at 163.

87. Vacant Properties Strategy Meeting, May 7–8th, 2008. Ford Foundation Binder and Briefing Papers on file with co-author Schilling.

88. Dan Kildee has been the U.S. Representative for Michigan's 5th congressional district since 2013.

ing Vacant Properties Conference and the CP Leadership Institute at Harvard.

Today, under the leadership of President and CEO Tamar Shapiro, the Center for Community Progress ("CCP"), headquartered in Flint, Michigan, with offices in Washington, D.C., Detroit, New Orleans, and Atlanta, has continued to solidify itself as the primary hub for this growing national network of practitioners and policymakers.[89] Nothing illustrates Community Progress' role more than its signature event—the Reclaiming Vacant Properties Conference—which now draws over 1,000 participants to share model practices from data systems, code enforcement, land banking, tax foreclosure, and more recently emerging examples of innovative reuse, among other topics. With ongoing support from the Ford, Mott, Kresge Foundations, and others, CCP, with a full-time staff of nineteen and several senior advisors, now has a robust suite of initiatives including direct technical assistance, leadership and education, policy, and research.

As an outgrowth from the Campaign, the Vacant Property Research Network ("VPRN") plays complementary roles convening working groups of practitioners and researchers, translating the latest academic and policy research, documenting this emerging policy network, and producing comprehensive case studies.[90] Under the leadership of co-author Schilling, and with assistance from university researchers, graduate students and experts, VPRN synthesizes existing research about blight and vacant properties in order to support innovative policies and programs in the field. Many of the activities also engage new researchers and scholars to help build interest and expertise in vacant property reclamation as a field of applied policy and planning research.

Other strategic linkages in the emerging vacant property network include several state nonprofit organizations that engage in education, training, research, and state legislative advocacy. Over the past ten years, the Housing Alliance of Pennsylvania has been the driving force behind several important state law changes to expand the powers and ability of local governments to fight

---

89. See About, CTR. CMTY. PROGRESS, http://www.communityprogress.net/2015-archives-pages-423.php (last visited May 10, 2016).

90. See About the Network, VACANT PROP. RES. NETWORK, http://vacantpropertyresearch.com/about (last visited May 10, 2016).

blight, such as land banking and conservatorship (e.g., receivership).[91] It has also produced strategic and influential reports, including the popular and easily digestible practitioners guide "From Blight to Bright."[92] In Ohio, the Thriving Communities Institute in Cleveland and the Greater Ohio Policy Center in Columbus together have diffused and supported the state's growing number of city and county land bank authorities. Thriving Communities' President Jim Rokakis (former Cuyahoga County Treasurer) led the effort to enact land-banking legislation in Ohio.[93] He was the driving force behind the federal government's allocation of Hardest Hit Funds to Ohio and other rust belt states in need of demolition resources for vacant, abandoned, and unusable foreclosed homes.[94] Greater Ohio continues to examine the intersections of land use planning, sprawl, and the reuse of brownfields (former industrial properties with actual or perceived environmental contamination) and most recently greyfields (the design and reuse of vacant and underused commercial/retail properties).[95]

---

91. See VACANT PROP. RES. NETWORK, PHILADELPHIA'S VACANT PROPERTY JOURNEY: FOSTERING COLLABORATIVE ALLIANCE WITH CONVERGING POLICY REFORM (2013), http://vacantpropertyresearch.com/wp-content/uploads/2015/06/VPRN_Philadephia-full-report.pdf.

92. THE HOUSING ALLIANCE ON PENNSYLVANIA, FROM BLIGHT TO BRIGHT: A COMPREHENSIVE TOOLKIT FOR PENNSYLVANIA (2013), http://www.nxtbook.com/nxtbooks/swell/fromblighttobright.

93. See Jim Rokakis, WESTERN RESERVE LAND CONSERVANCY, http://www.wrlandconservancy.org/who-we-are/our-staff/jim-rokakis (last visited May 10, 2016).

94. See Neighborhood Initiative Program, OHIO FINANCE HOUSING AGENCY, https://ohiohome.org/savethedream/neighborhoodinitiative.aspx (last visited May 10, 2016).

95. MARIANNE EPPING & LAVEA BRACHMAN, REDEVELOPING COMMERCIAL VACANT PROPERTIES IN LEGACY CITIES, A GUIDEBOOK TO LINKING PROPERTY REUSE AND ECONOMIC REVITALIZATION (2014), http://www.greaterohio.org/files/pdf/eppigbrachman-vacantproperties-updatedoct14-lowres.pdf.

D. Developing a Systematic, Data-Driven Policy Framework for Strategic Code Enforcement[96]

The seeds for a new approach to code enforcement were sowed in 2009 to 2010 when Schilling returned to work with Professor Lind and Cleveland's VAPAC. Despite many positive changes, the City of Cleveland's building and housing code enforcement programs were still addressing vacant properties in a reactive way, responding on a case-by-case basis in light of the mounting mortgage foreclosure crisis. Even suburban cities with very good enforcement programs in traditionally stable communities, such as Shaker Heights and South Euclid, were challenged with how to effectively identify, locate, and take code enforcement actions against banks, flippers, and institutional investors. With a small grant to the Campaign from the Fannie Mae Corporation, Schilling was tasked to help a VAPAC working group reexamine traditional code enforcement approaches through a series of working sessions and site visits.

Schilling found that once again local community development organizations, the law school's clinic, and Cleveland's Municipal Housing Court were continuing to push code enforcement changes. Neighborhood Progress, Inc. ("NPI"), launched its Neighborhood Stabilization Team ("NST") project with assistance from NEO CANDO and co-author Lind's Urban Development Law Clinic. NST represented a new type of data driven problem solving using all available legal and administrative tools to identify a course of action against different types of problem properties owned by different individuals or corporations within a defined

96. Although this Article and section focus on strategic code enforcement, it is important to understand that code enforcement is part of a larger vacant property policy system that includes real property information systems, land banking, demolition, reuse planning, and urban greening. The executive summaries for VPRN's Cleveland and Philadelphia case studies sets forth a vacant property policy system model that illustrates how these pieces fit together and the policy process for design, adoption, and implementation. Our point is not to downplay the importance of land banking, urban greening, and other relevant legal and policy strategies and tools, but to recognize code enforcement does and can serve as a multiple prong policy intervention that can support many of the other vacant property reclamation strategies. Unfortunately, it has been the experience of the co-authors that code enforcement often gets the least attention and the least resources.

neighborhoods or geography.[97] NPI and Professor Lind gained nation-wide attention for filing civil nuisance abatement lawsuits against Wells Fargo and Deutsche Bank for failure to abate serious nuisance conditions at REO foreclosed residences they held title to as trustees.[98] In a classic battle of "David vs. Goliath," Cleveland's Housing Court Judge Raymond Pianka also issued criminal bench warrants against corporate officials from global financial institutions when the defendant corporations ignored criminal nuisance complaints for failure to secure and maintain vacant and foreclosed homes.[99]

During this engagement, Schilling brought to bear his code enforcement experiences and knowledge of model practices from other cities. By this time, Michael Braverman's transformation of Baltimore City's code enforcement program was becoming the gold standard by which major city code enforcement departments are now measured against today.[100] Braverman revamped reactive code enforcement processes by infusing business practices and systems that rely heavily on data driven program and policy decisions.[101] By taking a more proactive approach, Baltimore's code enforcement managers and inspectors could tailor their code enforcement interventions to address different types of problem properties. Baltimore's Housing Code Enforcement operation also included legal counsel and enforcement attorneys within the department, which made it more efficient to take more aggressive

---

97. See SCHILLING, supra note 68.

98. See Lind, supra note 5, at 103–12.

99. See SCHILLING, supra note 68; Raymond L. Pianka, Cleveland Housing Court—A Problem-Solving Court Adapts to New Challenges, TRENDS IN STATE COURTS, http://ncsc.contentdm.oclc.org/cdm/ref/collection/spcts/id/232.

100. Both authors have known Assistant Housing Commissioner Braverman for over ten years and presented with him at workshops and roundtables. Co-author Schilling conducted interviews and site visits with Braverman and some of his staff in 2008, 2011, and 2012. Unfortunately, this research has not yet found its way into a published article. Perhaps the best sources are the many presentations Braverman has made at national conferences. See generally MICHAEL BRAVERMAN, BUILDING CAPACITY & DEPLOYING IT STRATEGICALLY (2011), http://www.hcdnnj.org/assets/documents/braverman%20%20-%20final.pdf.

101. See Jim Chrisinger, Smart Management and the Turnaround of a City: The Right Management Tools Can Literally Help Rebuild a Blighted City, GOVERNING MAGAZINE, June 1, 2011.

civil receivership actions against those long-standing abandoned properties with serious title issues.[102] New Orleans was another city transforming its code enforcement approaches.[103] In the post Katrina world, the city adopted a new property maintenance/blighted property code but chose to design and manage an elaborate administrative hearing process to more aggressively gain compliance.[104]

In late 2010, CCP asked Schilling to develop ideas for expanding its code enforcement capacity building and technical assistance efforts. Schilling brought the usual suspects to Flint, Michigan, to take stock of the current state of the field, assess its needs and opportunities, and spend a day with the city of Flint's code enforcement officials.[105] CCP played another important role by featuring code enforcement issues and model practices at its March 2011 Community Progress Leadership Institute. In September 2011, as a follow up to these two activities, the CCP invited several teams from emerging code enforcement programs (e.g., Memphis, New Orleans, Atlanta, Newburg (New York), Flint, and Detroit) to tour Braverman's operation in Baltimore and further ex-

---

102. See e.g., Jason Hessler & Steve Barlow, The Code Enforcement 'Plaintiffs' Lawyer: Practitioner Notes and Observations From the Front Lines (paper and presentation at September 2014 workshop hosted by the International Municipal Lawyers Associations (IMAL) and CCP) (on file with co-author).

103. At the request of the NVPC Office in New Orleans Lind and Schilling participated in several study visits post Katrina to help guide NVPC's efforts to help the city transform its code enforcement operation and professionalize the staff. They reviewed the city's administrative hearing ordinances and hearing officer procedures, recommended the hiring of Doug Leeper as code enforcement executive in residence, and facilitated a visit by Michael Braverman and his team with New Orleans's existing code enforcement managers, inspectors, and administrative staff.

104. See CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, BLIGHT REDUCTION REPORT 16 (2014), http://www.nola.gov/getattachment/Performance-and-Accountability/Initiatives-and-Reports/BlightSTAT/Blight-Report_web.pdf for details on reorganization for the code enforcement and hearing bureau.

105. The usual suspects featured several well-known code enforcement practitioners and experts, including Professor Kermit Lind, John Kromer, author and former Housing Director for City of Philadelphia under former Mayor Rendell, Baltimore City's Deputy Housing Commissioner Michael Braverman, Former Code Enforcement Director for the City of Chula Vista, California (the first city to adopt a vacant property registration ordinance that applied to foreclosed properties) Doug Leeper.

plore the dimensions and range of possible code enforcement capacity building activities along with national experts Schilling, Lind, Leeper, and CCP staff. These CCP convenings and the intense discussions with Cleveland's VAPAC began to inform Lind and Schilling's thinking about the need for a new code enforcement model.

From these past and recent collaborations, Schilling and Lind have issued a call to action for local governments and their partners to design, adopt, and support a strategic approach to code enforcement. Although Lind and Schilling each stress different dimensions,[106] as an emerging concept, strategic code enforcement includes: (1) tactical decisions that involve specific code enforcement issues at particular properties; and (2) strategic policy and programmatic decisions that might apply to entire neighborhoods and/or address broader policy and planning goals. From the tactical perspective, strategic code enforcement encourages local governments to deploy their legal remedies and policy tools in a more effective and efficient way by targeting the right response to the right place at the right time. This approach requires investigative resources and expertise beyond site inspections that can identify and unravel the contemporary complexities of property owners and legal interests. Strategic code enforcement relies on improving operational, administrative, and legal processes so that code enforcement systems are more nimble, time-and-cost efficient, and, as a result, effective. Such a systematic approach demands close interagency and inter-departmental coordination and seamless integration with a jurisdiction's planning, land development, and housing and community development plan, policies and programs. Another core element is the pivotal role of community groups, neighborhood organizations, and local residents. Strategic code enforcement cannot be effective without transparent processes and meaningful public engagement and, in some cases, empowerment.

106. Note that Lind calls it strategic code "compliance" enforcement, stressing the ultimate goal of this endeavor is to bring properties into compliance with relevant rules and regulations regardless of the means. Kermit J. Lind, Code Compliance Enforcement in the Mortgage Crisis 3 (2012), http://www.communityprogress.net/filebin/pdf/new_resrcs/Kermit_Lind_Code_Enforcement_Paper.pdf. Enforcement actions—those formal administrative and judicial remedies and processes—are not necessary for the larger percentage of violation cases that local governments manage. However, for purposes of this Article we are using strategic code enforcement to include both compliance strategies, tools and techniques as well as the traditional enforcement mechanism.

The foundation of strategic code enforcement, however, rests on data and integrated real property information systems. Developing integrated data systems are now regarded as essential for dealing with neighborhood blight. Public policy makers and officials, neighborhood public interest advocates, and scholars search for data in various separate institutional silos. They are looking for information on individual properties as well as the connections among the changing variables related to large-scale blight. Since parcels of real property bear unique identifying codes (often a single unique parcel identification number issued and maintained by local government assessors and tax collectors), all real property related data can be assembled from many sources into an integrated data system for access, analysis, and mapping. Decision makers and program managers need this capacity to monitor and evaluate their work in real time. For example, many such systems often connect existing data from different local government departments and agencies, such as: (1) Code Enforcement Cases: common indicators of blight are the existing and past cases which outline violations of real property, building, health, or housing codes.[107] Most local governments have ordinances and processes that declare problem properties, often vacant and/or abandoned, as public nuisances and concentrations of public nuisances as blighted areas. (2) Mortgage Foreclosure: tracking the homes in the mortgage foreclosure process offers another common indicator of blight, such as neighborhoods or blocks with higher foreclosure rates, inactive or abandoned foreclosures, foreclosure sale of defective homes, and disposition by mortgagees of defective homes taken in foreclosure.[108] (3) Tax Foreclosure: Some tax-delinquent 107. R.C. Weaver, Re-framing the Urban Blight Problem with Transdisciplinary Insights from Ecological Economics, 90 ECOLOGICAL ECON. 168, 170 (2013).

108. See generally, Michael P. Johnson et al., What Foreclosed Homes Should a Municipality Purchase to Stabilize Vulnerable Neighborhoods?, 10 NETWORKS & SPATIAL ECON, 363–88 (2010); Ingrid Gould Ellen et al., The Foreclosure Crisis and Community Development: Exploring REO Dynamics in Hard-Hit Neighborhoods, FURMAN CTR. FOR REAL EST. & URB. POL'Y N.Y.U.

properties are seen as blighted by their communities.[109] Tax delinquency is often an indicator of abandonment and blight. One recent study showed that areas where there are high levels of city-owned properties and elevated rates of vacancies are more likely to experience housing abandonment.[110] (4) Vacant and Abandoned Lots, Homes and Buildings: Abandonment occurs when a property no longer has a steward who is responsible for the basic responsibilities of property ownership.[111] Vacancy describes property that is not occupied, which may or may not be a public nuisance—much depends on who monitors and can maintain the property during vacancy. The critical data reveals when, how, and why a vacant or abandoned building becomes a public nuisance—those problem properties that pose threats to public safety and neighborhood quality of life.[112]

Without these critical indicators, code enforcers and neighborhood community organizations cannot respond effectively. Sharing data and the knowledge it yields enables collaboration among data keepers across sectors and institutional boundaries. Sharing knowledge can result in more and better information for making policy decisions and resource allocations.

In today's climate of local government fiscal instability and dwindling revenues and resources, strategic code enforcement is even more critical as local leaders ask more from their code en-

---

1–13 (2013), http://furmancenter.org/files/publications/REOHardHitWorkingPaperApril2013.pdf.

109. Stephan Whitaker & Thomas J. Fitzpatrick, Deconstructing Distressed-Property Spillovers: The Effect of Vacant, Tax-Delinquent, and Foreclosed Properties in Housing Submarkets, 22 J. HOUSING ECON. 79, 3 (2012).

110. Robert Mark Silverman et al., Dawn of the Dead City: An Exploratory Analysis of Vacant Addresses in Buffalo, NY 2008-2010, 35 J. URB. AFF. 131, 133 (2013) (citing A.E. Hiller et al., Predicting Housing Abandonment with the Philadelphia Neighborhood Information System, 25 J. URB. AFF. 91–105 (2003)).

111. See generally Paolo Rosato et al., Redeveloping Derelict and Underused Historic City Areas: Evidence From a Survey of Real Estate Developers, 53 J. ENVTL. PLAN. & MGMT. 257, 257–81 (2010); Daniel Miller Runfola & Katherine B. Hankins, Urban Dereliction as Environmental Injustice, 9 ACME: AN INT'L E-JOURNAL FOR CRITICAL GEOGRAPHIES 345, 345–67 (2009); Miriam Hortas-Rico, Sprawl, Blight, and the Role of Urban Containment Policies: Evidence from U.S. Cities, 55 J. REGIONAL SCI. 298, 298–323 (2010).

112. Charting the Multiple Meanings of Blight, supra note 1, at 25–35.

forcement agencies and frontline inspectors in neighborhoods with ever changing conditions, markets, and local conflicts. Code enforcement agencies thus need a greater array of different code enforcement interventions—more arrows in their quivers—that can identify substandard properties, prevent them from becoming vacant, secure and save them when possible, demolish vacant and abandoned structures, abate a wide array of public nuisances, and recover the costs of doing so. If done right, strategic code enforcement programs can improve housing and property conditions, support neighborhood revitalization projects, and contribute to the overall health of its residents. However, as far as we can tell, only a handful of communities are actually taking a more strategic, proactive approach to code enforcement.

III. Reflections on How Far we Have Come and How Far we Need to Go

Great progress has been made over the past ten plus years to design and test new responses to the multiple dimensions of neighborhood blight. Thanks in part to the development of a national network of practitioners and policymakers, innovative policies and program such as land banking, real property information systems, and urban greening initiatives, have become prevalent and common practices. Relationships and partnerships continue to grow and expand among national, regional, and local organizations involved in this common quest to reclaim abandoned properties and revitalize neighborhoods. Sharing of best practices through conferences, workshops, web sites, and reports have become the lifeline to and the inspiration for many local governments and nonprofit organizations working the frontlines of the fight against blight.

Despite the efforts within these vacant properties networks, local code enforcement officials and community-based organizations now operate within a more complex world that demands increasing levels of collaboration and creativity. The diversity of the housing and real estate markets and property business models, the on-going community impact of the mortgage foreclosure crisis and economic dislocation from the Great Recession, along with decreasing government resources and increasing local government instabilities, all indicate that neighborhood blight will continue to spread and fester, especially in those communities with aging housing stock and surplus commercial and retail properties. Vacancy and abandonment is no longer just a big city problem. Many inner ring suburban cities are now seeing more vacant properties as they lose population and once strong real estate markets become weaker.[113]

There is no reason to expect neglected, poorly maintained structures to recover overnight or for neighborhoods with households of wage earners who lost savings and income prospects to now magically blossom and thrive. The economics of home repair and building rehabilitation does not deliver the benefits it once did. That reality makes it difficult for community development corporations, especially in legacy cities, to make the policy and economic case for the traditional model of substantial rehab and resale.[114] Credible economic analysis predicts what appears to be a permanent restructuring of many urban neighborhoods with less homeownership, more rental properties, fewer resources to maintain homes for family households, and a reduction in the coming generations' dreams or capacity for ownership of single family dwellings surrounded by yards.[115]

In light of this "new normal," municipal governments, civic organizations, community groups, the real estate and housing industries—with support from universities, nonprofits, and foundations—must collaborate to design, adopt, and implement a more systematic suite of neighborhood preservation and revitalizations strategies that can tackle these more complex and dynamic challenges. Cross sector collaboration becomes the political and community mortar that strengthens the campaign for better public poli-

---

113. Kathryn W. Hexter, et al., Revitalizing Distressed Older Suburbs. WHAT WORKS COLLABORATIVE & CLEV. ST. U. 1–2 (2011), http://cua6.urban.csuohio.edu/publications/center/center_for_community_planning_and_development/Final_11.28.11_RevitalizingDistressedSuburbs.pdf.

114. See Frank Ford et al., The Role of Investors in the One-to-Three Family REO Market: The Case of Cleveland, JOINT CTR. FOR HOUSING STUD. HARV. U. 10 (2013). As an addendum to this study, Ford and his team estimated the rehabilitation levels and costs for three neighborhoods and found only one first tier suburban community where the most basic rehabilitation would make economic sense. Id.

115. See id. at 3 (studying the post-foreclosure REO properties and their disposition in the housing market to make recommendations on curbing business practices harmful to neighborhood stability and renewal).

cies and more effective programs and actions—both in the prevention of blight's spread and the recovery and resilience of vitality at the neighborhood level. Below we offer a few ideas on how national and local networks can foster the collaboration, coordination, and capacity needed to address some of these emerging challenges.

A. Clarifying the Legal Principles of Blight and Nuisance in State and Local Laws and Policies

Referring to the opening discussion of the important legal uses of blight, nuisance (both public and private), police power, property rights, and public rights to protect public health, safety, and welfare, legal scholars and their practicing colleagues have more to do to defend neighborhoods from the rapaciousness ingrained in predatory business practices.[116] A new but powerful threat to community life has taken root. The titans of global commerce and finance have demonstrated a profound disregard for the way ordinary people in their ordinary neighborhoods are burdened with the external consequences of their business plans. Regulatory agencies appear to be feeble and out of touch with the impact on neighborhoods of titanic global profit seeking.[117] This new reality calls urgently for renewed vigor in public interest legal work and legal training and education—work that recognizes communities are coping with new, unfamiliar threats to their sustainability.

New remedies for blight must start with clear, up-to-date codes for local housing and neighborhood environmental maintenance stating in law what is properly to be deemed blight and setting forth model code enforcement processes. Municipal legislators and code officers responsible for the exercise of police power need to study in detail the harm that blight causes to the public and make sure the legislation necessary for policing blight is current and effective. Blight conditions that are public nuisances must be described clearly as such with appropriate remedies and sanctions levied in administrative and judicial proceedings. The regulations and the enforcement system need additional capacity and expertise to match the new realities of the land use, markets, structures, and the persons, both real and corporate, who are subject to the police power. Policing and adjudicating code enforcement cases can no longer function with uncertain regulations, ineffective sanctions, easily manipulated case management, and unqualified, untrained, or unmotivated personnel.

---

116. See supra Part I.A.

117. Lind, supra note 5, at 91–93; David P. Weber, Zombie Mortgages, Real Estate, and the Fallout for the Survivors, 45 N.M. L. REV. 37, 43–45 (2014); see also Nicholas Freudenberg & Sandro Galea, Cities of Consumption: The Impact of Corporate Practices on the Health of Urban Populations, 85 J. URB. HEALTH: BULL. N.Y. ACAD. MED. 462 (2008).

Criminal codes must be policed by a system strategically managed to achieve compliance first, without unreasonable delay and at the least cost to the public. Many municipal court dockets reveal a trend toward larger and slower moving caseloads with repeat offenders and repeated cases on the same property. Raymond L. Pianka, Judge of the Housing Division of the Cleveland Municipal Court, has described many of these problems he has confronted in his twenty years as a judge in a special purpose housing and environmental court where he sees most of the biggest challenges in code enforcement.[118] He advocates for the establishment of more special purpose courts (e.g., housing and environmental courts) with special jurisdictional and subject matter authority over legal issues involving housing, urban environments, real estates and neighborhoods. Such problem solving courts are better equipped to adapt creatively to new challenges[119] by using local rules to manage dockets, organizing special dockets according to the nature and difficulty of cases, establishing new programs of assistance for defendants with special needs, and using the court for educating the community at large, tenants, landlords, property management servicers, and elderly homeowners.[120] Innovations in service of notice to secure appearances by corporate officers, creative sentencing, and the use of parole in situations involving corporate owners to maximize compliance are among the court's tools.[121] The Cleveland Housing Court is one of the busiest courts in Ohio, handling more than 7,000 criminal cases and 11,000 civil

---

118. See Pianka, supra note 99, at 44–49; see also Kermit J. Lind, The People's Court, SHELTERFORCE, NAT'L HOUSING INST. (2011), http://www.shelterforce.org/article/2484/the_peoples_court2.

119. See Pianka, supra note 99, at 44–49.

120. Id.

121. Id. at 47.

cases a year at this point in time.[122] Among those are civil public nuisance abatement cases involving the appointment of receivers.[123] Finally, it should be noted that the court maintains relationships with other key institutions like the county's state-of-the-art land bank, the other courts, and local law school clinics, and bar associations.[124]

A strategic code compliance system should include programs of information, incentives, and assistance for those residents who will—with help—comply. The vast majority of housing and environmental code violations are corrected by responsible owners or occupants without a court appearance. Some communities have neighborhood-based programs to help people avoid citations with financial and/or self-help training, tool lending, or volunteer labor.[125] More advanced innovations involve training community members to assist in monitoring abandoned properties that are or need to be boarded up, making qualified complaints to the inspection officials to cut the time and expense of officers in the field.[126] The development of hand-held telecommunication devices for photography and direct data entry via the internet is opening up many new ways community organizations can expand the scope and immediacy of routine work in code compliance.[127]

Underlying these policies and programs should be a civic culture that will not tolerate either blighted places or blighting conduct. Without an organized and sustained community-based commitment to combat blight, the struggle for survival and sustainability, especially in hard hit neighborhoods, is unlikely to be

---

122. Id. at 45.

123. Id. at 46.

124. Id. at 47; see also Lind, supra note 118.

125. See, e.g., HOME REPAIR RESOURCE CTR., http://www.hrrc-ch.org (last visited May 11, 2016).

126. Cleveland's code enforcement partnership pilot program uses citizen code compliance inspectors assigned to local community development corporations. See MARK FRATER, COLLEEN M. GILSON & RONALD J. H. O'LEARY, THE CITY OF CLEVELAND CODE ENFORCEMENT PARTNERSHIP (2009), http://www.communityprogress.net/filebin/pdf/CLE_CE_Partnership.pdf.

127. Several cities have partnered with NGOs to conduct extensive property condition surveys that identify the vacant properties throughout an entire city. See City of Change: Evolutions in the Condition of Detroit's Housing Stock, DATA DRIVEN DETROIT (Nov. 18, 2014), http://datadrivendetroit.org/city-of-change/city-of-change-evolutions-in-the-condition-of-detroits-housing-stock.

successful. Indeed, public officials whose platform includes fighting blight cannot win the fight without wide-scale support from residents who want their neighborhood to be litter free and civic leaders who are prepared to give time and political force to making difficult changes in public policies and programs in the public interest, even when those changes may affect their own business or professional interests.

Changing a culture with new norms and expectations is difficult. It takes more than slogans and campaigns. It is more like a movement than a program. Yet the urgency for advancing such a movement has reached greater intensity with the obvious distress in many ordinary neighborhoods and communities fighting to survive the tsunami of housing abandonment and neighborhood distress. Being indifferent or neutral about advancing blight—in small matters like "free range litter" as well as whole blocks of empty row houses, apartments, and store fronts—is self-destructive. The acceptance of blight as either not a personal issue or as one too vast to care about by ordinary people guarantees that it will prevail. Ultimately, it is the community as a whole, not just its government, civic pillars, and neighborhood activists, who will be needed to meet the challenge of blight.

B. Developing New Systems and Capacities for Strategic Code Enforcement

Since our discussion centers on code enforcement, it seems appropriate and perhaps necessary that we reflect on its future. As this Article explains, our experience working with dozens of cities highlights that typical code enforcement programs spend most of their efforts reacting to individual cases of vacant properties and neighborhood blight. Given dwindling resources and greater complexities, policymakers and practitioners need help in transforming existing code enforcement policies and programs into more strategic and comprehensive enterprises. Here we consider how collaborative networks (local and national) could help communities recalibrate their code enforcement programs around the concepts of strategic code enforcement—the standard against which all future code enforcement program and policies should be measured.

The cornerstone of this transformation will rest with those who lead, manage, and direct code enforcement programs and neighborhood stabilization and revitalizations initiatives. This group of potential change agents includes local government managers, CDC directors, housing and community development department directors, municipal attorneys, prosecutors, and others in civic leadership positions. Collectively they can set and influence code enforcement's policy and program direction and they occupy the positions and perspectives to effectuate this type of change. Collectively, they comprehend the political, community, policy, and legal context as well as the micro level details and long standing culture of code enforcement organizations. They also work closely with and engage community leaders and neighborhood residents. Code enforcement managers are critical in leading this change as they can translate code enforcement's role in broader housing and community development policy goals to front line inspectors, community leaders, and state and local government officials.

Code enforcement managers will need help in guiding and directing this level of change. They could benefit from a deeper understanding about the process of changing organizations and policies as well as the practical techniques for developing, implementing and evaluating new sets of strategic procedures, remedies and policies for addressing neighborhood blight. Change of this magnitude—shifting the code enforcement community of practice towards a strategic and systematic model—will demand the development of core principles, a comprehensive curriculum and a variety of capacity building activities.

Unfortunately, within the existing national vacant property network, only a few organizations and code enforcement experts provide direct technical assistance to a limited number of communities on how to improve their code enforcement programs. Since 2014 the Center for Community Progress ("CCP") has administered its Technical Assistance Scholarship Program ("TASP") serving thirteen cities covering a wide range of vacant property policies and programs, some which focus upon code enforcement.[128] CCP also convenes its annual leadership institute where it brings together small teams (around three to six people) from four to six cities for three plus days of intensive instruction, discussion, troubleshooting, and reflection on vacant property challenges and solutions.[129] From time to time discussions about code enforcement issues arise at this annual gathering but much depends on the focus on the participant cities and individuals. CCP also sponsors occasional code enforcement workshops.[130] Outside of CCP, few national organizations engage in code enforcement education or technical assistance.[131] While state and local chapters of code enforcement associations offer inspector education and training, and some states, such as California, have inspector certification processes,[132] our recent research could not find a comprehensive course and curriculum for code enforcement department directors, prosecutors, policymakers, hearing officers and judges on the legal and policy dimensions of a data driven, strategic approach to code enforcement.[133] Moreover, little research exists on how to consistently track, document, and evaluate the outputs and outcome from these new code enforcement interventions.[134]

128. For example, Gary, Indiana, a 2015 TASP recipient, requested code enforcement help. See Tarik Abdelazim, Building a Strategic, Data Drive Code Enforcement Program for Gary, Indiana, CTR. FOR CMTY. PROGRESS (2015), http://www.communityprogress.net/filebin/150928_TASP_Gary_Report__FINAL.pdf.

Now is the time for policymakers and public interest foundations to invest in the capacity of a new cadre of code enforce-129. Community Progress Leadership Institute, CTR. FOR CMTY. PROGRESS, http://www.communityprogress.net/community-progress-leadership-institute-pages-414.php (last visited May 10, 2016).

---

130. See, e.g., Regulation to Revitalization: The Role of Strategic Code Enforcement, CTR. FOR CMTY. PROGRESS, http://www.communityprogress.net/regulation-to-revitalization--the-role-of-strategic-code-enforcement-pages-434.php (last visited May 10, 2016).

131. Note the International Municipal Lawyers Association (IMLA) has a special code enforcement working group and has held one and two-day code enforcement workshops prior to their annual conference. See 2015 Code Enforcement IMLA's 2015 Code Enforcement Program, INT'L MUN. LAWYER'S ASS'N, http://www.imla.org/events/code-enforcement (last visited May 10, 2016).

132. Certification, CAL. ASS'N CODE ENF'T OFFICERS, http://www.caceo.us/?page=66 (last visited May 10, 2016).

133. The authors conducted a simple scan of different organizations that have done or touch upon code enforcement, vacant properties, and blight elimination and could not find a comprehensive course or workshop tailored for code enforcement managers and directors on strategic code enforcement.

134. See Code Enforcement, VACANT PROP. RES. NETWORK, forthcoming summer 2016 VPRN translations and policy brief on code enforcement at http://vacantpropertyresearch.com/translation-briefs/code-enforcement (last visited May 10, 2016).

ment leaders. If these public and philanthropic organizations are serious about changing the substantial role that neighborhood blight plays in income inequality and social injustice, then it becomes critical to support local capacity building and policy interventions that regenerate physical place and people at the same time. A professional management academy for directors, supervisor, municipal lawyers, and judges could in the short term enhance and expand the capacities of individual communities; and it could also lay the foundation for transforming the practice of code enforcement to meet current challenges.

The potential management curriculum would prepare managers and directors for establishing and expanding special investigation processes, developing performance metrics, understanding the legal and policy impacts and tradeoffs for their activities. Core to the strategic model is the tailoring of code enforcement and compliance interventions based on neighborhood assets, real estate markets, property ownership profiles, case type and community needs, capacity and engagement—selecting the right remedy for the right case at the right time. Such a strategic approach is fundamentally different than how most code enforcement managers operate or think. The transformation from reactive to strategic will take time, resources, and significant political will and community support.

Beyond education and training, community code enforcers will need reinforcement to launch and sustain such transformative change. While existing conferences and workshops can help plant the seeds of change by researching and sharing model practices from across cities and code enforcement programs, more intensive follow through can ensure the effective and complete shift towards the operation of strategic code enforcement. Additional hands-on technical assistance would also expedite the policy transfer process and facilitate adaptation of innovative policies and programs to local political, policy, and legal circumstances. Hiring consultants, who often have little direct code enforcement experience or expertise or who pay insufficient attention to their clients' circumstances usually leads to disappointing results. Although they will require additional resources and greater technical expertise, policymakers and foundations should explore, perhaps even pilot, other capacity building interventions, such as placing code enforcement executives in residence, facilitating short-term peer exchanges, and launching a fellowship program that might allow an experienced department director to spend six months to a year assisting in the reorganization of another city's code enforcement department.

Within the domain of legal education, the emergence of the University of Memphis' Neighborhood Preservation Clinic offers a potential model for shaping the next generation of blight litigators and code enforcement directors.[135] Law schools operate clinical practice as a training ground for lawyers while also providing critical public and legal services to individual and organizational clients who do not have access to or sufficient resources to obtain legal services. Co-author Lind directed the Urban Development Law clinic at Cleveland Marshall School of Law at Cleveland State for more than fifteen years. Currently the Memphis Neighborhood Preservation Clinic assists the city of Memphis in the prosecution of code enforcement cases that come before the Shelby County Environmental Court, the Honorable Larry Potter presiding. More than twenty-four students have filed more than one hundred actions in the community's campaign against blighted properties. Beyond learning the nuts and bolts of code enforcement ligation, the students also spend time collaborating with frontline inspectors, law enforcement, community members, and other stakeholders involved with fighting blight. By practicing before a special purpose problem solving court, they gain insights beyond litigation tactics. In reality the clinic lays the foundation for a wide variety of potential careers fighting blight beyond litigation—directing a city housing/community agency, code enforcement unit, or community development corporation, for some examples. In fact, several major cities have attorneys who currently direct code enforcement departments and started their careers as code enforcement litigators.[136]

---

135. See Karen Sloan, Law Students Combat Urban Blight in Memphis, Karen Sloan, NAT'L L. J., (Jan. 21, 2015), http://www.nationallawjournal.com/id=1202715716500/Law-Students-Combat-Urban-Blight-in-Memphis #ixzz448g70L5h; see also Lance Wiedower, Memphis Law Students Help Shape City's Blight Fight (Jan. 14, 2016), http://www.highgroundnews.com/features/blightclinic.aspx.

136. As of 2016 our personal list includes Michael Braverman, Baltimore, Ron O'Leary, Cleveland, and now the new code enforcement for Memphis, Patrick Dandridge.

C. Developing Local Teams or Councils for Supporting Cross Sector Coordination and Collaboration

One reality faced by those threatened by neighborhood blight is that the various agencies and programs needed to be marshaled are often fragmented and disconnected from each other. As a result, sometimes they compete or interfere with each other without intending to do so. Legal and political impediments often prevent the sharing of information or taking collective action, let alone the more permanent merger or reorganization of such agencies. Deeply entrenched interests usually resist institutional change that would cross particular bureaucratic silos. However, those institutional units can be connected and coordinated by the formation of teams or councils composed of senior policy and program leaders in public and public interest agencies who meet regularly to share experiences, problem solve, pool resources and collectively set policy priorities and develop action plans for reform.[137]

Within the vacant property field, a number of cities have government led task forces, often initiated by the mayor or other policymaker and led by a city manager, county executive or department head. Task forces typically focus on inter-department or intra-agency collaboration on particular types of vacant properties or specific neighborhoods.[138] Nothing is wrong with this approach, as they can help break down government silos and foster program and project coordination; but we contend they do not go far enough. We observe that long term, effective initiatives against blight and vacant properties must include strategic partners outside of local government. While local code enforcement programs control many of the policy levers and legal tools, the complexities of fighting neighborhood blight require significant contributions from nonprofit organizations, community based groups, philanthropy

137. See Jessica Bacher & Meg Byerly Williams, A Local Government's Strategic Approach to Distressed Property Remediation, 46 URB. LAW. 877, 879 (2014).

138. Id. Task forces can also include representatives from nonprofit, business, and local institutions as they do for the Distressed Property Task Force in Newburgh, New York. Note, Lind and Schilling performed a special assessment of the vacant property challenges in Newburgh, New York, as consultants to the Pace Land Use Law Center. Id.

and private business interests. Nongovernmental organizations are usually able to act with flexibility and nimbleness in the public interest that is uncharacteristic of government. That is especially true in the acquisition, management, and disposition of real property interests and in organizing complex financial transactions from multiple sources in major projects. Their governing structures can be tailored to provide a high level of accountability to both private and public stakeholders. We find that public-private teamwork is the hallmark of communities that are leading the way in battling blight.

As we have discussed earlier in this Article, a leading example of such cross sector collaboration is Cleveland's Vacant Abandoned Property Action Council ("VAPAC"). In 2005 VAPAC came together with the preliminary goal to oversee implementation of the NVPC's policy and program recommendations set forth in their Cleveland at the Crossroads report. VAPAC includes leaders from local public interest housing and community development organizations, along with key public officials in county, city, and suburban jurisdictions in an informal collaborating group of professionals. This self-initiating group realized that progress in dealing with their vacant abandoned property crisis required them to work together, sharing information, coordinating policies and, in general, cooperating instead of competing. In their nearly eleven-year history there have been major accomplishments, such as scaling NEO CANDO into a robust real property information system, lobbying for the creation of the Cuyahoga County Land Reutilization Corporation, and supporting reforms to municipal code enforcement operations and county tax foreclosure programs.[139] It has commissioned, conducted, or collaborated in studies of local issues that provide information and guidance for policy and program development. VAPAC continues to hold monthly meetings where the members trouble-shoot intricate details of vacant property processes, share information across sectors and agencies, coordinate their actions for maximum effective results, and advocate for changes in state and local policy. Those participating in the monthly meetings regard the gatherings as essential. Variations on this type of coordination and collaboration are emerging in other places around the country. While the concept of a "coalition of the willing" is generally the same from place to place, the details of participation, structure, and mission may vary in accord with local circumstances.[140]

---

139. For more detailed reports and descriptions, see SCHILLING, supra note 68, and Morley, supra note 67. See also Kermit J. Lind, Strategic Code Compliance Enforcement: A Prescription for Resilient Communities, in HOW CITIES WILL SAVE THE WORLD (Ashgate Pub.) (forthcoming).

D. Developing New Collaborative Models—Insights from the Memphis/Shelby County Neighborhood Blight Elimination Charter

Since the summer of 2015, the co-authors have been working with a new Memphis nonprofit, Neighborhood Preservation, Inc. ("NPI"), to develop what could be the nation's first official community-wide charter to fight blight.[141] Throughout this entire strategic planning process, local officials in Memphis and Shelby County, along with civic and public interest community developers, have been adapting lessons from other communities, such as Cleveland and Baltimore, as they tailor policy and program innovations from these and other cities to match local conditions and dynamics. Memphis in many respects is experimenting with a new prototype for cross sector collaboration against blighted properties.[142] Other cities taking similar approaches include Detroit, which adopted a citywide blight strategic plan,[143] and Flint, Michigan, which incorporated a special element on blight remediation into its comprehensive land use plan.[144] Although implementation

---

140. Lind, supra note 139.

141. See generally MEMPHIS BLIGHT ELIMINATION CHARTER, www.memphisfightsblight.com (last visited May 11, 2016) (listing all Charter related activities maintained by NPI).

142. J.B. Wogan, It Takes a Village: The Idea Behind Memphis' Anti-Blight Strategy, GOVERNING MAG. (May 17, 2016), http://www.governing.com/topics/urban/gov-memphis-blight-elimination-charter.html.

143. Cassie Owens, A 341-Page Blight-Fighting Plan Requires a Lot of Teamwork, NEXT CITY (June 15, 2015), https://nextcity.org/daily/entry/detroit-blight-task-force-models-collaboration. The entire plan and task force activities can be found at DETROIT BLIGHT REMOVAL TASK FORCE PLAN (May 17, 2014), http://report.timetoendblight.org.

144. Anna Clark, Flint, Michigan Has an Ambitious New Plan to Fight Blight (Mar. 16, 2015), https://nextcity.org/daily/entry/flint-michigan-blight-plan-cost-metrics. For a review of the complete five-year plan, see NATALIE PRUETT, BEYOND BLIGHT, CITY OF FLINT COMPREHENSIVE BLIGHT of this charter remains a work in progress, we close with a brief review of the Charter's content, and reflect on the successful ingredients of the high level of collaboration and trust that helped create it.

Released at a community summit on March 17, 2016, the Greater Memphis Neighborhood Blight Elimination Charter contains an ambitious vision that all neighborhoods have the right to be free from vacant, abandoned, and blighted properties. Its ten core principles reflect a number of important community values, such as creating a culture of care, engaging local residents, and strategically deploying resources and tools. The principles also acknowledge the multiple dimensions of blight—the social and community impacts beyond the physical appearance and neighborhood deterioration. The Charter's overarching goal is to enable stronger coordination of existing and prospective blighted property programs and policies across all sectors—nonprofit, public, and private. Several of the principles incorporate what are now becoming the well-accepted policy elements—expand information systems, proactive policy interventions and investment, link neighborhood stabilization, revitalization, and reuse activities. The charter even calls for Memphis to link blighted property remediation with the city's land use and community development plans, housing and environmental codes and economic development processes.

Although the Charter is not a legally binding document, it can provide policy and program guidance to help align those agencies and entities that directly deal with blight, their various programs and policies, and the necessary public and philanthropic resources to reclaim and reuse vacant properties. Lind and Schilling served as national experts and facilitators for this process. From their vantage point, the Memphis Charter experience offers several important lessons that other cities should consider for their blight-fighting initiatives:[145]

ELIMINATION FRAMEWORK (Feb. 10, 2015), https://www.cityofflint.com/planning-and-development/blight-elimination-and-neighborhood-stabilization.

145. Co-author Schilling shared several of these insights on the Urban Wire blog at THE URBAN INSTITUTE, http://www.urban.org/urban-wire/lessons-memphiss-collaborative-campaign-against-blight (last visited May 23, 2016).

- Local intermediaries within the vacant property networks play incredibly pivotal roles, often as convener, collaborator, and/or connector. NPI in Memphis illustrates a new intermediary prototype that combines its process roles with significant expertise in blight policy and programs. Core to the success of NPI and other intermediaries is the passion and energy of a catalytic leader. For Memphis, NPI co-founder and blight litigator Steve Barlow drives the blight agenda with high levels of trust and support from public officials, civic organizations, and community leaders.[146]

- Invest sufficient time and resources in the process. The Memphis experience reinforces the importance of meaningful engagement around critical issues, such as the need for better data about the cost and impacts of blight and demystifying agency and nonprofit roles and programs that address blight. The process of creating a charter is often more important than the document as it builds trust and mutual understanding of blight's problems and solutions among the key stakeholders in key positions.

- A blight charter offers communities a flexible format. The principles can reflect core values, local priorities, as well as elevate essential vacant property strategies, such as data driven decision making, strategic code enforcement, land banking, and urban greening. More importantly, a charter can speak to the social impacts of blight, its racial legacy, and the disparate impacts that blight imposes on communities of color.

146. Note that many of these lessons were first established through the NVPC's Cleveland at the Crossroads process and convened by another NPI, but led by another pioneer in this field, Frank Ford now at Thriving Communities Institute.

- Leveraging the charter itself as a way to bring local and national attention to the issue and the plight of disinvested neighborhoods. NPI's communication team's framing and marketing activities around the Memphis Charter and Community Summit helped connect new voices to the blight fight.[147]

- Instituting a blight coordinating council or team. Blight does not happen overnight, as thoroughly discussed throughout this Article. It is produced by processes and changing conditions. It will take the concerted efforts of a coalition of the willing to address the persistent churn of real property abandonment in our cities. Memphis put implementation of a sustained response front and center by writing a separate section in the Charter that calls for two critical goals—formation of a Blight Coordinating Team and development of a Blight Elimination Action Plan. Initial meetings were held at the end of April 2016.

"It's like de ja vu all over again," the phrase often associated with former New York Yankee's catcher, Yogi Berra,[148] somehow seems appropriate here as we reflect on our journey and on the new directions and challenges that lie ahead for distressed communities and the national and local vacant property networks that support them. The frameworks developed first in Cleveland and refined in other cities through the NVPC and CCP are still being revised and recalibrated in cities such as Memphis as people adapt these policies and programs and to different sets of driving forces, local market characteristics, and changes in neighborhood conditions and circumstances. Despite the differences, the same core policies and programs still apply—real property information systems, strategic code enforcement, restoration and preservation of structures, land banking, land reutilization and urban greening—

147. See MEMPHIS BLIGHT ELIMINATION CHARTER, www.memphisfightsblight.com (last visited May 11, 2016).

148. See Yogi Berra, WIKIPEDIA, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Yogi_Berra#.22Yogi-isms.22 (last visited May 11, 2016).

to all cities seeking to revitalize neighborhoods and regenerate. Facilitating the learning across cities and professions, adapting the lessons from one place to another, still remains the hallmark of these functional and effective local and national networks.

As a result of our research across communities and our front line experiences, we know that many factors affect how communities remain resilient when confronting existing, new, and difficult circumstances. Therefore, informed collaboration that encompasses those factors—collaboration among public actors and among stakeholders residing in publicly defined jurisdictions—must reach unprecedented levels moving forward. Unless blight-threatened neighborhoods have the political and community commitment to abate and prevent blight their future remains in peril and will be determined by external market forces that care little for preserving and protecting healthy, resilient neighborhoods.

Regulatory Created Blight in a Legacy City: What is it and What can we do About it?

Including a Historical Review of Planning and Zoning in Memphis

STEVE BARLOW,* TOMMY PACELLO, & JOSH WHITEHEAD

I. INTRODUCTION 859
II. BLIGHT IN MEMPHIS: THE EXTENT OF THE CHALLENGE..........863
III. DIFFERENT TYPES OF BLIGHT 864
A. Non-Regulatory Blight..864
1. Hardship Cases..864
2. Walk-away Cases...865
3. Economic Cases...866
B. Regulatory Created Blight..867
IV. REGULATORY BARRIERS...869

* Steve Barlow has a J.D. and M.A. in Applied Urban Anthropology from the University of Memphis. He is principal in the law firm Brewer & Barlow PLC, and part time attorney for the City of Memphis. He is co-founder of the Neighborhood Preservation Legal Clinic at the University of Memphis. Since 1995, he has been an advocate for progressive and comprehensive solutions to urban decline in Memphis, as a community organizer, nonprofit agency director, and litigator. He has been involved as plaintiff's counsel in over one thousand lawsuits against the owners of vacant and abandoned real estate in Memphis since 2007.

 Tommy Pacello has a J.D. and holds the degree of Master of City and Regional Planning from the University of Memphis. He is the executive director of a community development organization focusing on the redevelopment of the Memphis Medical District. Prior to this work he worked for the Memphis Innovation Delivery Team, a small non-profit focused on applying civic innovation to challenges in legacy cities. Much of this team's work focused on neighborhood revitalization and blight elimination.

 Josh Whitehead has a J.D. from the University of Memphis and holds the degree of Master in Community Planning from the University of Cincinnati. Since 2010, he has served as the Planning Director for Memphis and Shelby County, Tennessee. He is an Adjunct Professor at the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law at the University of Memphis specializing in land use law.

A. Memphis and Shelby County Land Use Codes: A Historical Overview......870
1. History of the Board of Adjustment......874
2. Office of Planning and Development......878
B. The Unified Development Code......880
1. Suburban Sprawl......882
2. Form-Based Code......883
3. Nonconformities......884
4. Vested Rights......888
V. LATEST TRENDS IN LAND-USE REGULATION......889
A. Rehab Codes and Pink Zones......893
B. Making Small Possible......896
V. CONCLUSION......901

Abstract: Memphis, Tennessee, located in Shelby County, has an extensive legacy in land use regulation, having been the first city in Tennessee and one of the first in the South to engage in comprehensive planning and zoning. While arguably progressive at the time adopted, there has been a general failure of the regulations to keep pace with market realities. Today, a series of complex and sometimes contradictory land use regulations, often with a storied history in the Tennessee courts, have the effect of holding back progress in the modern urban built environment. Memphis has gone through no less than four comprehensive zoning ordinances, each with very different regulations guiding growth and development. Layer in decades of changing construction standards and building regulations, mostly written and enforced without regard for practical neighborhood realities, and you begin to understand regulatory created challenges in the current urban context. Older developments and uses built or established under prior regulations are often seen as damaging to changing neighborhoods. Newer land use regulations enacted to address poor site design and inappropriate close proximity between incompatible uses may have the unintended consequence of maintaining the status quo and discouraging redevelopment and reinvestment. Newer building regulations designed with modern perspectives on safety and technology yield large swaths of buildings undevelopable, and when rigidly enforced trap many an older building in the past. Regulations imposed by a city to protect the city may also do a great deal to hold the city back. A careful review of the impact of land use and building regulations reveals that the very tools designed to stimulate growth and positive development often instead create abandonment and decline.

Disclosure

The authors wish to clarify from the beginning that we are not land use, community development, or building code scholars. We all count "lawyer" among our titles, but we find that most of our days as practitioners are filled with urban planning and development, community revitalization, real estate, code enforcement, policy, and other related decisions. As we discussed the drafting of this article, we worked on but failed to settle upon a joke that opens "a planning director, a community developer, and a litigator walked into a bar . . . ." We are serious about the work that we do to bring about the revitalization of declining Memphis neighborhoods, but want the reader to understand that this piece is not a scholarly piece but more like "notes from the field" and a description of the challenges and opportunities that we have observed in our years of observing, and engaging in, efforts to bring about improvement in some of Memphis' most distressed communities.

I. INTRODUCTION

Historically, few cities and their suburbs have placed a high enough priority on planning or growth management, preferring instead, intentionally or not, the proliferation of unplanned new development around the edges. In Memphis, Tennessee, this has certainly been the case for decades. The Memphis story includes decades of infrastructure investments in far outlying areas that were annexed as older neighborhoods received little or no infrastructure maintenance or improvements. Illustrative of this challenge is the fact that between 1970 and 2010 the population of the City of Memphis increased by 4% while the geographic area of the city increased by 55%.

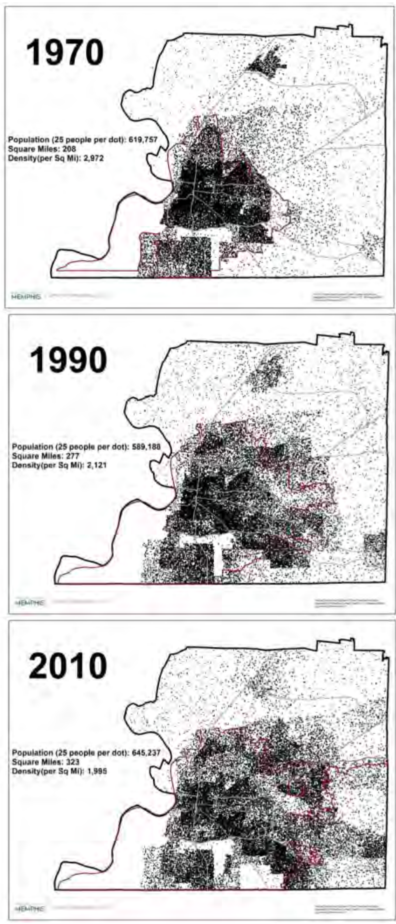

Image 1: Population Distribution*. Population distribution of the residents of Memphis and Shelby County between 1970 and 2010. Each dot represents twenty-five people. The red line represents the geographic boundary of the city of Memphis at each the respective year.*

The decades-long combination of policies encouraging low-cost greenfield development, public investments in new infrastructure at the edge of the city, and an expanding urban level of services provided by county government triggered aggressive annexation by the city. This massive shift in population from the city's historic neighborhoods to the new suburban options masked a shrinking city population helped maintain short-term financial solvency. This trend continued largely unquestioned by policy makers from the 1960's until the great recession of 2008.

Since the recession there has been a renewed interest in strengthening historic neighborhoods and infill development. 2010 marked the first year that the population inside the 1970 city of Memphis boundaries has increased since the 1960s. Today, there are more than $4 billion in development projects inside the 1970 city boundaries. Many of these projects represent large-scale investments targeting urban areas in downtown Memphis and in areas along Memphis' primary commercial corridors, Poplar Avenue and Union Avenue.

Meanwhile, in a time of renewed interest in development and revitalization of the core, many neighborhoods in and near the core—often just blocks away from the referenced corridors—remain literally in shambles. For example, a recent visual survey of a one-thousand parcel neighborhood adjacent to Memphis' thriving medical center reveals that one in three parcels is a vacant and abandoned lot. Owner occupants of a nearby small cluster of historic homes are attempting to hold on, but their home values have declined to such an extent that they are trapped. Investment, even by community minded, socially progressive organizations is stymied. Neighborhood commercial development is non-existent, and the majority of single family and multi-family residential rental properties are in poor condition. What factors influenced the decline of this once thriving neighborhood? And how can the vacancy and abandonment be addressed?

There are no simple answers. Most conversations about the challenge of vacancy, abandonment, and redevelopment of real estate in American cities involve the thorny question of the "root causes" of vacancy and abandonment, or "blight." Blight, as used in this Article, is a term commonly used across the United States to describe real property that is in a state of deterioration beyond what is acceptable to the surrounding community. We are aware of, and sensitive to, the concerns that have been raised about the use of the term historically, but the phrase is used here for lack of a simpler descriptive phrase. Where practical, the phrase "blighted property" is used instead.[1]

---

* Josh Whitehead has a J.D. from the University of Memphis and holds the degree of Master in Community Planning from the University of Cincinnati. Since 2010, he has served as the Planning Director for Memphis and Shel-

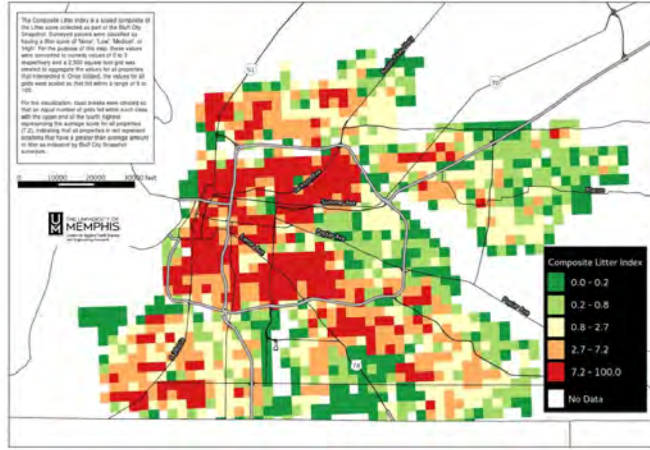

Image 2: Composite Litter Index*. This map highlights the presence of litter throughout the City of Memphis and provides an example of how the city is using data to measure the impacts of several different types of blight.*

---

by County, Tennessee. He is an Adjunct Professor at the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law at the University of Memphis specializing in land use law.

 Tommy Pacello has a J.D. and holds the degree of Master of City and Regional Planning from the University of Memphis. He is the executive director of a community development organization focusing on the redevelopment of the Memphis Medical District. Prior to this work he worked for the Memphis Innovation Delivery Team, a small non-profit focused on applying civic innovation to challenges in legacy cities. Much of this team's work focused on neighborhood revitalization and blight elimination.

Steve Barlow has a J.D. and M.A. in Applied Urban Anthropology from the University of Memphis. He is principal in the law firm Brewer & Barlow PLC, and part time attorney for the City of Memphis. He is co-founder of the Neighborhood Preservation Legal Clinic at the University of Memphis. Since 1995, he has been an advocate for progressive and comprehensive solutions to urban decline in Memphis, as a community organizer, nonprofit agency director, and litigator. He has been involved as plaintiff's counsel in over one thousand lawsuits against the owners of vacant and abandoned real estate in Memphis since 2007.

1. For a full charting of the history of the term "blight" and an in depth classification of the many meanings of "blight," see LEE HAUNG ET AL., CHARTING THE MULTIPLE MEANINGS OF BLIGHT (May 2015), https://www.kab.org/sites/default/files/News%26Info_Research_Charting_the_Multiple_Meanings_of_Blight_Executive_Summary.pdf.

Image 3: This 10 to 12 unit "shoebox" apartment building, typical of many found throughout Memphis, often on formerly single family lots, has been abandoned because there is no current market for it in its neighborhood.*

II. BLIGHT IN MEMPHIS: THE EXTENT OF THE CHALLENGE

While there are many positive things happening in Memphis, it is important to understand the nature and extent of the vacancy and abandonment Memphis is experiencing. Memphis is by far the largest city in Shelby County, Tennessee, comprising more than 70% of the tax parcels and 41% of the land area, or 315 square miles. In Shelby County there are 351,000 parcels of land. The two best indicators of the presence and scale of blight in Memphis are parcels that are delinquent on property tax payment and numbers of structures with no utility connections for an extended period of time.

In Memphis, at least 34,000 parcels are delinquent on the payment of real estate taxes, a commonly used indicator of abandonment, and 53,000 parcels are vacant lots. As of 2010, more than 10,000 single family homes and more than 3,000 units of multifamily housing in Memphis had been without utilities for more than a year. In three of the seven City of Memphis Council Districts (Districts 4, 6, and 7), the percent of residential properties without utility services as of 2013 (including single-family and multifamily units) exceeded 10% (approximately 12,000 units).[2] A report based upon a survey of all residential parcels in Memphis completed in 2010 found that Memphis "blight rate" was 22%.[3]

A comprehensive parcel survey of Memphis is currently nearing completion,[4] and Memphis leaders are nearing a complete "blight data" warehouse, which will be called the Memphis Property Hub. This snapshot of the extent of blight in Memphis should make it clear that the challenge is daunting and that urgent responses are required.

III. DIFFERENT TYPES OF BLIGHT

Regulatory Created Blight (or "Regulatory Blight") has different causes than non-regulatory blight and calls for a different range of responses than other types of blighted properties. Regulatory blight occurs in three major instances: hardship, walk-away, and economic. Each of these is prevalent in Memphis and is described below.

A. Non-Regulatory Blight

1. Hardship Cases

Sometimes genuine economic hardship is the only reason for the physical deterioration and lack of maintenance of a property. Owners in these cases have not abandoned their real estate—they simply do not have the means to maintain it. These owners may reside in a deteriorating house that they cannot afford to repair, or they may own a dilapidated residential rental property or storefront that was, or was planned to be, a source of additional income before some hardship made it impossible for them to make repairs necessary to keep the property in acceptable condition. For example, an 85-year-old owner of a single-family home in a well-

---

2. This was calculated using the City of Memphis Neighborhood Blight Abatement Strategy (a PowerPoint document). The source of the data was Memphis Light Water and Gas spreadsheets, which we evaluated by district.

3. See TK BUCHANAN ET AL., NEIGHBORHOOD-BY-NEIGHBOR: A CITYWIDE PROBLEM PROPERTY AUDIT (Apr. 2010), https://web.archive.org/web/20121202112712/http://cbana.memphis.edu/GenResearch/NxN_SUMMARY_FINAL_REVISION_8_30_2010.pdf.

4. The "Bluff City Snapshot" is expected to be complete by mid-2016.

preserved neighborhood experienced a house fire several years ago in which he lost everything. The house became uninhabitable, but he did not have insurance. He maintains the rose beds and visits the front porch on a regular basis, but has no way to complete repairs and move back in.[5] These are perhaps the most sympathetic cases.

2. Walk-away Cases

Other owners of blighted property have the means to maintain their real estate but have abandoned it because they have determined that any further investment in maintaining or improving it will not provide any return. These owners have usually stopped paying property taxes and mortgages, and are either attempting to "walk away" from the property or are speculating that someday there will be a demand for the real estate sufficient to cover years of deferred maintenance and other expenses and provide the owners with a return on their investment. One example of an owner of this type of blighted property is the investor who buys total loss burned out houses for cash at an extreme discount, and takes no action to maintain them but holds out hope that he will find other investors who will join in his ill-fated venture to repair and sell the houses at a profit.

5. City of Memphis v. LT Boyce, Shelby County Environmental Court, Case No. 12637035.

Image 4*: This vacant, bank-owned house drew the ire and activism of neighbors.*

Sometimes these owners acquired the blighted property as a part of a bulk acquisition, knowing that a certain percentage of the properties would have no value; other times these owners made money in the past from their real estate but due to market changes, neighborhood changes and/or lack of adequate maintenance and upkeep, profitability is no longer feasible under their business model. Another category of such owners are the well-documented foreclosing lenders who have taken back real property through the foreclosure process only to find, once the title is in the name of the lender, that there is no market for the property.[6]

Resolution to this type of case is often made more complex by the imposition of tax penalties, administrative fees, penalties, and the like that become attached to the real property and further hinder its disposition or redevelopment. In this way, these cases move into the regulatory blight category, as discussed below.

3. Economic Cases

Still other owners of blighted property, particularly in thriving or upward trending communities, have the means to maintain their real estate and know that their real estate has market value and demand, but for reasons, either rational or irrational, have determined to neither improve nor sell their real estate. In some of these cases, an owner is holding out for a higher sale or rental price or a better or longer-term tenant. In other cases, no logical reason can be ascertained as to why an owner will not sell or lease a marketable property in a high demand area.

Sometimes owners have formed an irrational emotional attachment to a property and believe against all reason that they will someday develop the property themselves or sell for an outrageous profit. One example of an owner of this type of blighted property is the dreamer who acquired a vacant mid-rise commercial building with an attractive historical façade on the edge of a thriving commercial district. For twenty-five years he planned to develop it himself, and therefore turned down countless reasonable offers based on appraised value. Meanwhile, he invested only the bare minimum that was required by enforcement agencies, and the large vacant structure loomed over a would-be thriving block, attracting crime and promoting decay for blocks.

---

6. For an insightful analysis of many components of this type of blight, see Kermit J. Lind, Collateral Matters: Housing Code Compliance in the Mortgage Crisis, 32 N. ILL. U. L. REV. 445 (2012).

B. Regulatory Created Blight

Distinguishable from hardship, walk-away, and economic cases are situations where the primary driver of blight is regulatory in nature. We are unaware of an extensive scholarly analysis of this less understood cause of blighted property, which we refer to as "regulatory blight."[7]

Image 5*: This large vacant downtown midrise is surrounded by development, but the owner's expectations of financial return and lack of experience in development of this nature has resulted in at least fifteen years of complete inactivity.*

The owners or prospective purchasers of these blighted properties have the means to maintain, repair, or develop their real estate, and it would be marketable if they did so. The logjam for these properties, and the reason they remain blighted, is the applicable local regulations and/or the local approach to the enforcement of those regulations.

7. The three authors of this Article are practitioners in planning (Whitehead), community revitalization (Pacello), and anti-blight litigation (Barlow). We readily acknowledge our "non-scholar" status, and are hopeful that this effort to compile our practitioner perspectives may stimulate more discussion of this crucial issue at the scholarly and practitioner level.

Image 6: This superfund site has been cleaned at various levels over decades since a cooperage business went out of business at the downtown Memphis site. Taxes owed and the fear of future environmental threats have prevented any development of the site, despite a resurgence of development around the perimeter.*

The economic costs to the would-be developer of bringing these blighted properties back in conformance with zoning and subdivision regulations, building codes, fire codes, property maintenance codes, and/or other locally enforced, usually locally enacted, regulations is, or is perceived to be, greater than the economic benefits to the developer. In other words, owners or potential purchasers are priced out of redeveloping the blighted property due to the presence of regulatory restrictions so costly to follow that the project has no economic feasibility.

One example of regulatory blight can be observed in the form of longtime vacant upstairs flats over commercial space in a resurgent downtown district with high residential rental demand, where the cost and complexity of complying with regulations for occupancy of such second story flats makes doing so practically impossible.

In an environment where local government is the first defense against the damage done by blighted properties, this is a type of blighted property which local government is perhaps in the best position to address by improving the regulatory environment through amending local ordinances and regulations and making improvements to regulatory enforcement mechanisms.

It is our belief that the lack of contextually applicable local regulations and/or their enforcement without regard to the real estate realities at the neighborhood level has the direct result of creating and maintaining blight in urban areas where development is most needed. Ironically, this is particularly the case in older neighborhoods where local government is striving to revitalize the very neighborhoods that its own regulations are holding back.

IV. REGULATORY BARRIERS

The two areas of regulation that most directly limit, and often prevent revitalization of core city neighborhoods, particularly when it comes to small-scale development, are the zoning and subdivision regulations and the building codes.[8] The zoning and subdivision regulations control what any owner or user is permitted to do on their property, including how big the building(s) may be, how much land must be associated with the building type, what improvements are required, and other operational controls on the land. The building codes, on the other hand, have more to do with minimum construction standards, materials, safety concerns as well as fire and health restrictions.

The chart below outlines the regulatory categories through examples of what is regulated by each code section. Together these codes create a complex array of regulations thousands of pages long that constantly evolve. The complexity inherently favors larger projects by experienced developers who know how to navigate the system or are able to hire experts to do it for them.

---

8. An important difference between the zoning and subdivision regulations and the building codes is that the states grant local governments the authority to adopt zoning and subdivision regulations as they see fit but mandate local government to adopt certain model building codes with very limited flexibility. Therefore, while there is broad local control in the enforcement of building codes, local government must work with state government where those building codes imposed do not meet the local government needs.

	Common Regulations Found in Zoning, Subdivision and Building Codes
Zoning Codes	Allowed use of property	Height of building	Setback from lot lines	Required parking and location	Lighting and land-scaping standards
Subdi-vision Codes	Size of lot	Size of blocks	Access and connectivity	Utility con-nections
Build-ing Codes	Building material require-ments	Building access and ADA compliance	Fire Prevention requirements	Energy efficiency requirements	Heating, Cooling, and Plumbing standards

A. Memphis and Shelby County Land Use Codes: A Historical Overview

Zoning and subdivision regulations, together referred to as "land use controls," as applied and enforced, directly impact the feasibility of revitalization of blighted properties and abandoned neighborhoods. A full review of the history of land use controls in Memphis provides invaluable context for any conversation about how to streamline regulations to promote positive growth and lends an important perspective to any urban revitalization thinking and planning. This lengthy historical overview is intended to set the context and provide a common starting point for discussion about how these and other regulations may be improved to facilitate the removal of unnecessary regulatory barriers to otherwise desirable blight elimination efforts.

As noted above, Memphis was the first city in the State of Tennessee to engage in planning and zoning. On March 30, 1920, the City Commission, precursor to today's City Council, passed an ordinance creating a citizen City Planning Commission. A year later, on February 3, 1921, the Tennessee General Assembly passed legislation specifically for Memphis (through what is known as a "private act"), granting the Planning Commission formal powers such as the authority to recommend adoption of a zoning code and to hear appeals and variance requests from the administration of the code.[9] Tennessee's first zoning ordinance, including its first zoning map, was adopted by the City Commission on November 17, 1922.

While Memphis' 1921 private act authorizing the creation of the Memphis Planning Commission was silent on a general plan, the general acts that affect all other cities in the state are not.[10] With that said, Tennessee is generally considered to be a state that takes a unitary approach to planning as it relates to zoning, meaning that the zoning map may act as the general plan in the absence of such a plan.[11] Despite the absence of any public acts recommending or mandating the adoption of a comprehensive plan, or the fact that the private act for Memphis was silent on the issue, the City Planning Commission entered into a contract with Harland Bartholomew of St. Louis for the purpose of preparing a long range city plan for the growth and development of the city. This plan, entitled "A Comprehensive City Plan," was presented to the Planning Commission for their approval in 1924.

In an effort to separate the long range planning and zoning activities from individual hearings of variances and appeals, the General Assembly passed a private act for Memphis on April 3, 1925, to create the Memphis Board of Adjustment ("The Board").[12] The Board was created as a zoning board that would act independently of the Planning Commission, and to some degree, the Comprehensive City Plan that it had promulgated a year before. The Board met for the first time on July 16, 1925. One unique aspect with the Board's enabling legislation was that the General Assembly included the term "use of land" on the list of zoning regulations that Board could waive. This has enabled Memphis' zoning board to approve use variances, which distinguishes it from the general act that enables all cities throughout the state to create zoning boards.[13]

---

9. 1921 Tenn. Priv. Acts, ch. 165, 450–55; Memorandum from Josh Whitehead, Sec'y, on History of Board of Adjustment to Bd. of Adjustment 3 (Dec. 17, 2014), http://www.shelbycountytn.gov/DocumentCenter/View/19403.

10. See TENN. CODE ANN. §13-4-201 (2011).

11. Edward J. Sullivan & Matthew J. Michel, Ramapo Plus Thirty: The Changing Role of the Plan in Land Use Regulation, 35 URB. LAW 75, 98 (2003).

12. 1925 Tenn. Priv. Acts, ch. 428, Sec. 1, 1622.

13. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-7-207(3) (2011).

Due to the rapid growth of the City of Memphis in the 1920s, the City petitioned the State to pass enabling legislation granting it some level of land use authority over properties just outside of its borders. This culminated with the passage of a private act by the General Assembly on June 25, 1931, which not only granted the City Board of Commissioners zoning authority over zoning decisions in the five-mile area outside of the corporate limits of the City of Memphis, but it also created a Shelby County Planning Commission and Board of Adjustment to review and amend a zoning code and hear variance requests, respectively.[14] Like the earlier private act, this legislation was silent on long range planning and granted the Board of Adjustment use variance powers.

As development was also occurring in the area more than five miles away from the city limits, Shelby County petitioned the State for the ability to plan and zone for these unincorporated areas. The State obliged with the passage of two pieces of legislation. The first was passed by the General Assembly on April 18, 1935, that authorized the County Planning Commission to review and approve a zoning code and amendments thereto in the area outside of the five-mile zone. This private act also created a County Board of Adjustment that was supposed to be separate and apart from the file-mile Board to hear variances.[15] Like the two enabling acts creating the City and County Boards of Adjustment, this new Board was authorized the power to grant use variances. The second piece of legislation was approved by the General Assembly on April 20, 1935. It represented a first in Memphis and Shelby County: it authorized the Shelby County Planning Commission to adopt a general plan for the development of the area under its purview.[16]

---

14. 1931 Tenn. Priv. Acts, ch. 613, 1649, 1649–66; Memorandum from Josh Whitehead, Sec'y, on History of Board of Adjustment to Bd. of Adjustment 4 (Dec. 17, 2014), http://www.shelbycountytn.gov/DocumentCenter/View/19403.

15. 1935 Tenn. Priv. Acts, ch. 625, 1650, 1650–62; Memorandum from Josh Whitehead, Sec'y, on History of Board of Adjustment to Bd. of Adjustment 4 (Dec. 17, 2014), http://www.shelbycountytn.gov/DocumentCenter/View/19403.

16. 1935 Tenn. Priv. Acts, ch. 706, 1869, 1869–79; Memorandum from Josh Whitehead, Sec'y, on History of Board of Adjustment to Bd. of Adjustment

For the next twenty years, a small planning staff supported the City and County Planning Commissions and the City and County Boards of Adjustment (a third Board of Adjustment was never created, despite the explicit instructions by the General Assembly to do so, which would become problematic in the future). In December of 1955, the final draft of a comprehensive plan was submitted to the Board of Commissioners of the City of Memphis and the City Planning Commission. Entitled The Comprehensive Plan, it outlined growth and development of the city for the next twenty-five years. Like the 1924 long-range plan, it was authored by Harland Bartholomew and Associates of St. Louis. By the 1950s, there was a growing concern that the somewhat archaic and cumbersome arrangement of having two planning boards and two zoning boards was not conducive to the post-war boom that Memphis and Shelby County were experiencing.[17] The Comprehensive Plan called for the merger of the City and County Planning Commissions and Boards of Adjustment. This prompted the General Assembly to pass enabling legislation to the same effect on March 17, 1955.[18]

On May 31, 1955, the Board of Commissioners of the City of Memphis passed a new zoning code. This marked the first major revision to the City's zoning ordinance since it was adopted in 1922. In early 1956, in response to The Comprehensive Plan and General Assembly action of the previous year, the City and County approved an ordinance merging the Planning Commissions and creating a more formal and professional Planning Commission staff to administer the new zoning code. The Boards of Adjustment were not merged at the time, but the Planning Commission staff continued to serve these two zoning boards.

---

4 (Dec. 17, 2014), http://www.shelbycountytn.gov/DocumentCenter/View/19403.

17. HARLAND BARTHOLOMEW ET AL., THE COMPREHENSIVE PLAN 104–05 (1955).

18. 1955 Tenn. Priv. Acts, ch. 353, 1180, 1180–85; Memorandum from Josh Whitehead, Sec'y, on History of Board of Adjustment to Bd. of Adjustment 4 (Dec. 17, 2014), http://www.shelbycountytn.gov/DocumentCenter/View/19403.

1. History of the Board of Adjustment

One final significant zoning event occurred in 1955: the amendment of the Memphis Board of Adjustment's enabling legislation. On February 28, 1955, the General Assembly added language that required the Board make certain findings as to the exceptional nature of a piece or property as a predicate to it approving a variance on that property.[19]

In 1962, plans for a Texaco station at the corner of Poplar venue and June Road in East Memphis were filed with the Board of Adjustment.[20] As the property was zoned residential, the request represented a use variance. The Planning Commission was adamantly opposed to this request; its staff drafted a policy statement urging that the entire 17-mile stretch of Poplar from Highland to Collierville remain exclusively residential. In addition, a neighboring property owner, James N. Reddoch, urged that the Board reject the case. The Board held the case in abeyance for seven months as it considered the request. Finally, on April 11, 1963, the Board heard the request. Despite opposition from neighboring property owners and a recommendation of rejection from its staff, the Board approved the service station on the basis that a hardship did in fact exist as the owner had attempted to sell it for many years as a residential property but to no avail. Mr. Reddoch appealed. This appeal eventually found its way to the Tennessee Supreme Court, which found in favor of the Board of Adjustment. In Reddoch v Smith,[21] the Court reviewed the private acts governing the Board and agreed it had the authority to approve use variances and that no peculiar feature of the property was necessary as a predicate of its findings. However, it also included analysis of the trial judge on the case, Shelby County Circuit Court Judge Edward Quick, who found that there should have been three Boards of Adjustment in Memphis and Shelby County (not two), but that the Shelby County Board had been acting as the de facto board for both the five-mile zone and the outside-five-mile zone.

---

19. 1955 Tenn. Priv. Acts, ch. 142, 418, 418–20.

20. Memphis and Shelby County Board of Adjustment Archives, Case No. BOA 62-35 (County).

21. 214 Tenn. 213 (Tenn. 1964).

Image 7: Gasoline station at Poplar and June that was the subject of the* Reddoch case. Memorial Park Cemetery and Memphis Hilton are seen in the background.

Eight years later in 1969, an application was submitted to the Board of Adjustment to allow 165 apartment units on Helene, north of I-240 and south of Quince, in a single-family zoning district. The Board approved this use variance request. The neighbors appealed and the case made its way up to the Tennessee Supreme Court. In Glankler v. City of Memphis,[22] the Court agreed with the Board that the cost of removing the property out of the 100-year floodplain represented a hardship that warranted the request. It also cited its Reddoch case from eight years prior as precedence on the ability of the Board to grant use variances, even though the board in the Reddoch case was the County Board and the board in the instant case was the City Board, which had its enabling legislation amended by the General Assembly in 1955.

22. 481 S.W.2d 376 (Tenn. 1972).

Image 8: Apartments proposed on Helene that were the subject of the* Glankler case.

In early 1969, the Memphis City Council and Shelby County Quarterly Court (precursor to today's Shelby County Board of Commissioners) approved a joint ordinance/resolution that split the staffing duties of the Boards of Adjustment away from the Planning Commission, possibly the result of the growing rift that had developed between the Board of Adjustment and Planning Commission over the former's use variance authority. Despite the City Council and Quarterly Court's frequent disagreement over the Board's use variances on particular properties, this joint ordinance/resolution reflects some measure of approval of the zoning "relief valve" that the use variance process embodied.

The newly independent Boards of Adjustment soon found themselves in controversy. Later in 1969, plans were submitted to the County Board for a mobile home park at the southwest corner of Shelby Drive and Crumpler. The County Board approved the request over the objections of neighboring property owners, who subsequently sued the Board in Shelby County Circuit Court. In his order overturning the Board, Judge Greenfield Polk cited the "renowned" Reddoch v. Smith decision, particularly the section of the case where the Supreme Court recites verbatim Judge Quick's analysis of the private acts that govern zoning in Memphis and Shelby County.[23] Judge Polk found that the Shelby County Board of Adjustment's authority in the five-mile zone effectively ended on May 8, 1964, the date the Tennessee Supreme Court decided 23. Bell v. Shelby Cty. Bd. of Adjustment, No. 20071RD (Cir. Ct. Shelby Cty., Div. 5 Apr. 29, 1970); Memorandum from Josh Whitehead, Sec'y, on History of Board of Adjustment to Bd. of Adjustment 4 (Dec. 17, 2014), http://www.shelbycountytn.gov/DocumentCenter/View/19403.

Reddoch and put the Board on notice it was not properly empaneled under the "de facto doctrine." Judge Polk's order was handed down on April 29, 1970, which set off a series of events that eventually resulted in the merger of the Memphis and Shelby County Boards of Adjustment.

After the Boards of Adjustment merged into one, plans were submitted by Shell Oil to build a service station at the northeast corner of Summer and Graham.[24] The Board approved the request for a commercial use in a multi-family zoning district.[25] The Court of Appeals affirmed the ability of the joint Board to grant use variances in Houston v. Board of Adjustment, even though the court found that no hardship in this case existed and overturned the Board's approval of the service station.[26] The court was persuaded by evidence presented to the Board that the existing apartments had enjoyed a high rate of occupancy.[27]

Image 9: Extant apartment building at the corner of Summer and Graham, site of* Houston case.

24. Houston v. Bd. of Adjustment, 488 S.W.2d 387, 387–88 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1972).

25. Id. at 389.

26. Id.

27. Id.

2. Office of Planning and Development

By the early 1970s, nearly the entire staff of the Planning and Development Office was devoted to subdivision and zoning cases. This led to criticism by some members of the community that the City and County were not engaging in long-range planning to the degree of many of its peer cities. This culminated in a report published in May of 1975 by the American Society of Planning Officials (the "ASPO," one of the predecessors of today's American Planning Association). In their report, the ASPO bristled at the state of planning affairs in Memphis and Shelby County. They recommended a complete overhaul of the organization that would require, by ordinance, that it engage in long-range planning efforts. The ASPO report also recommended that many zoning decisions be made at the Planning Commission level with only appeals heard by the legislative bodies. This, they found, would make zoning less political. Finally, the ASPO recommended that the General Assembly amend the private acts affecting the Board of Adjustment so it would no longer be able to approve use variances after a zoning case had failed before the City Council or Quarterly Court.[28]

The ASPO report sent shockwaves through 125 and 160 North Main Street (the City Hall and County Administration Buildings, respectively). For the past few years, the Planning Commission had difficulty hiring a Planning Director as there were questions over the ethics and educational background by the Memphis City Council and Shelby County Quarterly Court of its choice. Under the 1955 ordinance, the Planning Director first had to be chosen by the Planning Commission, then their choice had to be approved first by the Mayor of Memphis, the Chairman of the Shelby County Commission and then the respective legislative bodies of the City and County.

In 1976, the City and County took the advice of the ASPO and overhauled the Planning Commission organization with the adoption of Joint Ordinance/Resolution 2524. First, Ordinance/Resolution 2542 renamed the citizen body from the Planning

---

28. AM. SOC'Y OF PLANNING OFFICIALS, MAKING JOINT PLANNING WORK: AN ADMINISTRATIVE STUDY OF THE MEMPHIS AND SHELBY COUNTY PLANNING COMMISSION ch. 1 (1975).

Commission to the Land Use Control Board. Second, it reorganized the Planning Commission staff as the Office of Planning and Development ("OPD"), which was to contain two separate sections: (1) Land Use Controls, which would staff the Land Use Control Board and (2) Comprehensive Planning, which would create a citywide and/or countywide plan and various neighborhood plans. The former would be funded largely through application fees to the Land Use Control Board; the latter would be funded largely by the Community Development Block Grant ("CDGB") program of the federal government. No action was taken on the Board of Adjustment or its still-autonomous staff, which indicates that the City and County still appreciated, to some degree, the relief valve provided by that quasi-judicial body.

About a year later, in 1978, the City of Memphis created the Division of Housing and Community Development ("HCD") to perform certain long-range planning functions. This new branch of government would eventually receive directly all federal CDBG funds, leaving none for OPD and its planning efforts, therefore greatly impacting OPD's ability to draft long-range plans and to meet the comprehensive planning requirement of Ordinance/Resolution 2524. Nevertheless, OPD completed a new comprehensive, citywide and countywide plan, titled "Memphis 2000" in 1981. As was customary with previous comprehensive plans, Memphis 2000 was accompanied by a new zoning ordinance, the third since the original zoning ordinance in 1922.

In addition to the elimination of access to federal funds for comprehensive planning efforts that came with the creation of HCD, two Court of Appeals decisions in the early 1980s greatly impacted long-range planning in Memphis and Shelby County. The first, Barret v. Shelby County, involved a rezoning on Austin Peay Highway near the Tipton County line.[29] OPD recommended against the rezoning based on a comprehensive plan that allegedly covered the area in question and a general policy on rezoning that had been the past practice of the Shelby County Quarterly Court. In the Barret decision, the Court of Appeals states they are "unmoved" by terms such as "spot zoning" and "approved comprehensive plan"[30] and further stated that a local legislative body "is not bound by any comprehensive plan. If it were, there would be no need for rezonings."[31]

29. Barret v. Shelby Cty., 619 S.W. 2d 390, 391–92 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1981).

A few years following the Barret case, the Court of Appeals took a different look at comprehensive planning when it held that an apartment building on the north side of Park Avenue east of Estate Drive was arbitrary and capricious because it was out of line with the approved neighborhood plan.[32] The Barret and Ray cases may be differentiated by the fact that the Barret case involved a rezoning and a very loose comprehensive plan and the Ray case involved a planned development and a very specific comprehensive plan. Nevertheless, the two cases resulted in a general reluctance for either the City or County to spend time or resources on comprehensive plans.

Image 10: Apartment building that was the subject of the* Ray case.

B. The Unified Development Code

By the dawn of the twenty-first century, there was a general feeling from a variety of fronts that the 1981 zoning ordinance no longer met the needs of the community. Developers found it cumbersome to such a degree that almost all projects were processed as planned developments, which had the ability to waive any regulation found in the zoning ordinance. Many community groups felt that it promoted automobile-oriented development at the expense of inner-city neighborhoods. So, beginning in 2003, work began for the creation of a revised zoning ordinance, which was in keeping with the long history of creating a zoning code about once every thirty years (1922, 1955, and 1981). Dubbed the Unified Development Code, or ("UDC") or ("Code"), for unifying the zoning ordinance with the subdivision regulations, the Code took several years to complete. During that time, there was an intense conversation over the level of aggressiveness that should be embraced by the new set of regulations. For some, the UDC represented an opportunity to end the practice of planned developments and variances and to generally raise the bar for new development by adopting a form-based code. For others, this approach seemed radical and politically impracticable.

30. Id. at 392.
31. Id. at 394 (emphasis added).
32. Ray v. Dattel, 1985 WL 1126692, at *11 (Tenn. Ct. App. Aug. 2, 1985).

An outside consulting firm was hired to assist with the creation of the UDC. Its work was augmented by a separate initiative by OPD, Sustainable Shelby. The first several drafts of the UDC reflected the aggressive approach to planning and zoning pursued by many design professionals. In time, the contract with the outside consulting firm expired and in-house discussions began, many of which with practitioners who had worked with the 1981 and even the 1955 zoning codes. There were personnel changes both within and outside of the OPD that eventually helped craft a Code that was ready for approval in 2010. One of the authors of this Article, Josh Whitehead, ushered the new Code through its approval by the Memphis City Council and Shelby County Board of Commissioners in the summer of 2010. By that fall, he was appointed Planning Director of the City and County and administrator of the Code.

The UDC became effective on January 1, 2011. Shortly after adoption, the staff at OPD noticed that many routine zoning requests required action by the Memphis City Council, contrary to the premise made during the adoption of the UDC that the Code would streamline and provide efficiencies in the zoning entitlement process. Indeed, it had become apparent to OPD and an increasing number of elected officials that the team tasked with writing the UDC had inadvertently, or perhaps deliberately, altered the use chart in such a way that thousands, if not tens of thousands, of properties had converted from legal, "by right" uses to nonconforming uses with the adoption of the Code. And unlike down-zonings, this was done without individualized notice.[33]

Many property and business owners found that the uses on their properties and inside their buildings had been made nonconforming by the adoption of the UDC. This left them captive to various zoning entitlement processes that they were not subject to before the UDC was adopted. But in addition to these individuals, there were also thousands upon thousands of additional owners of nonconforming sites. The UDC had created a regime where almost every property required zoning fixes from the regulations dealing with items such as maximum building setbacks, parking lot islands, landscaping buffers, location of sidewalks, etc. This not only strayed from the objective of the UDC to promote development, but was also a departure from a long standing zoning tradition in Memphis and Shelby County whereby "by right" uses are incentivized by allowing administrative site plan review.

Although the UDC has been amended several times since its initial manifestation to reduce the situations cited above, the exercise of amending the Code does highlight the unfortunate reality of regulatory blight. Even in its present form, the UDC and its associated entitlement processes may be too onerous for many properties in neighborhoods with few economic opportunities and with low land valuation.

1. Suburban Sprawl

One of the primary goals of the UDC was to curtail, at least to whatever degree practicable, suburban sprawl. Metropolitan Memphis is one of the most sprawling cities in America, as measured by job creation in relation to the urban core.[34] Unfortunately, the City of Memphis never used its extraterritorial jurisdiction to 33. A down-zoning is a government-initiated rezoning of one or more privately held parcels from a zoning district that permits more intensive uses to a zoning district that permits less intensive uses. Since there is a finite geography affected, notice for down-zonings involves a mailed notice to all owners of properties that are subject to the rezoning.

---

34. See ELIZABETH KNEEBONE, METRO, POLICY PROGRAM, JOB SPRAWL STALLS: THE GREAT RECESSION AND METROPOLITAN EMPLOYMENT LOCATION 7 (2013), http://www.brookings.edu/~/media/research/files/reports/2013/04/18-job-sprawl-kneebone/srvy_jobsprawl.pdf.

limit sprawl in the 5-mile zone outside of the city limits. Instead, it pursued an aggressive annexation policy whereby it would extend its sanitary sewers into the 5-mile area, approve zoning and subdivision requests in the area and then annex the area when it achieved a certain level of population attainment.

While no zoning code has the real or apparent authority to turn back the clock on decades of an annexation system that promoted sprawl, the UDC did attempt to combat sprawl in ways the 1981 Zoning Code did not. For instance, the 1981 Code contained strict Euclidian zoning districts that neither promoted nor allowed mixing uses with one another. Front yard setbacks were excessive; floor area ratio was common with office buildings and maximum dwellings per acre dominated the multi-family section. The UDC turns all of these regulations on their head, by either eliminating the requirements altogether or stipulating the polar opposite. For instance, mixed use buildings with ground floor retail on the bottom floor and apartments above are incentivized by being permitted "by right" in commercial zoning districts while conventional apartments require action by the governing body. As for annexation, in 2014, the General Assembly changed the state's annexation laws by requiring the approval of a majority of the property owners affected by the annexation. This will likely end the long-standing sewer extension policies of the City.

2. Form-Based Code

In addition to attempting to discourage sprawl, the UDC also moved into a regulatory system in which many design issues were given greater emphasis. This would ideally foster vibrant urban spaces that could better compete with their suburban counterparts. Chief among the new design-related regulations is the requirement, along certain roads throughout the city, to build new buildings in close proximity to their adjacent sidewalks in order to create a more pedestrian-friendly and urban streetscape. In this respect, the UDC has elements of a form-based code. The existing regulation was problematic in that it did not include provisions for existing buildings. In fact, many of the streets designated by the UDC and its overlay districts had been developed as suburban corridors in the first few decades after World War II. Buildings along these streets were mostly located behind wide swaths of parking lots and green spaces, and they all immediately became nonconforming structures with the adoption of the UDC and its overlay districts. Prohibiting any expansion to existing buildings that did not involve the construction of a sidewalk-backed storefront created a measure of turmoil in the local development sector. Many business owners decided not to improve their properties, or worse, to vacate them and relocate to other sections of the metro area rather than file for variances with the Board of Adjustment. The few property and business owners that decided to submit variance applications faced an uphill battle as many UDC stakeholders took the opportunity to attack the applicants for their unwillingness to adhere to the UDC. The Office of Planning and Development staff, due to their recommendations made on these cases, also suffered some degree of political pressure from those who assisted in the drafting of the UDC and its overlay districts. Further discussion on form-based codes may be found in Part V below.

Image 11: Example of the form-based nature of the Unified Development Code is demonstrated with this new Subway restaurant at Madison and Manassas.

3. Nonconformities

In a perfect world, a community could adopt or amend its general plan and zoning ordinance and enjoy the results of its regulatory regime instantly as would be the case with a game of

"SimCity." However, most states either prohibit or largely restrict a municipality's ability to retroactively zone properties. This leaves the built environment in a sort of hodgepodge where older developments built under relatively loose zoning regulations stand side-by-side to newer developments built under stricter zoning regulations. "Grandfathered" sites and uses are protected from adhering to the provisions of a new or revised zoning ordinance and are therefore known as "nonconformities." Whether nonconformities contribute to blight or help create an interesting and vibrant neighborhood is a matter of debate.

Nonconformities differ greatly from state to state and municipality to municipality. In Tennessee, the 1935 public act enabling municipalities to engage in zoning has been periodically amended by the General Assembly to expand the rights of nonconformities. For instance, under Tennessee Code Annotated section 13-7-208, nonconforming uses may be discontinued for a period of 30 months without losing their grandfathered status.[35] Each year, the General Assembly considers bills that would greatly expand this permissible cessation period, with the most excessive being 20 years.[36] In addition, the public acts permit nonconformities to not only expand and build additional facilities,[37] but also to be torn down completely and rebuilt if there's a demonstrable "business necessity."[38] The Court of Appeals of Tennessee has found that the latter enabled nonconforming billboards of various sizes in Johnson City to be enlarged to the now standard size of 672 square feet because such an upgrade was found to be a "business necessity."[39]

Despite the generous provisions of the Tennessee public acts that address nonconformities, one of its provisions, Tennessee Code Annotated section 13-7-208(j) limits some of its applicability. For instance, the 30-month cessation rule does not apply to home-rule cities, of which there are thirteen in Tennessee. The zoning ordinances in these communities rule the length of discon-

35. See TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-7-208(g) (2011 & Supp. 2015).

36. See S.B. 1467, 106th Gen. Assemb., (Tenn. 2009).

37. See § 13-7-208(c).

38. See § 13-7-208(d)(1).

39. Outdoor W. of Tenn. v. Johnson City, 39 S.W.3d 131, 137–38 (Tenn. Ct. App. 2000).

tinuance. Some home rule cities limit their cessation period to six months; Memphis, which is also a home rule city, limits its period to one year. In addition to the provisions of Tennessee Code Annotated section 13-7-208(j), section 13-7-210 allows cities with zoning ordinances promulgated by private acts to be exempt from many provisions of the zoning public acts, including those involving nonconformities. For instance, when a very similar case had been filed against the City of Memphis and Shelby County that had been filed against Johnson City to allow many "junior billboards" to be upsized, the court found for the City and County based on Tennessee Code Annotated section 13-7-210.[40]

On one hand, the ability of a community to address blight through its zoning code is severely limited by its ordinances and enabling laws that govern nonconformities. For if a city cannot adequately address noxious nonconforming uses, it may find it difficult to attract investment in the area around that nonconforming use. On the other hand, blight often is not exhibited in the form of nonconforming uses and businesses but rather the absence of uses and businesses. By aggressively targeting nonconformities, a city could dampen reinvestment into a particular section of town where the only viable reinvestment that might occur, at least for a foreseeable period, comes from these very nonconforming businesses. While the community may have down-zoned the nonconformities in an effort to eradicate them, it may later find that its zoning ordinance was too idealistic and should be implemented on a more gradual, piecemeal approach. There are others that claim that a resurgent community built around nonconformities is what differentiates an older urban neighborhood from its banal counterparts in the suburbs. In Memphis, such examples are the Sugar Services facility at G.E. Patterson and Tennessee and the Turner Dairy on Madison in Overton Square.

40. Prime Locations, Inc. v. Shelby Cty., No. CT-006449-04, 2010 WL 8705666 (Tenn. Cir. Ct. May 26, 2010).

Image 12*: Aerial photograph of Sugar Services at GE Patterson and Tennessee in downtown Memphis (center right) in the midst of residential development.*

Image 13*: Aerial photograph of Tuner Dairy in Midtown Memphis in the midst of commercial redevelopment of Overton Square.*

As outlined above, with the UDC's adoption, thousands, if not tens of thousands, of nonconforming uses were created at midnight on December 31, 2010, the date the UDC took effect. Uses that were once permitted in their zoning district were no longer permitted. Undefined uses were now defined and explicitly prohibited. While this would not have presented a large problem in most of Tennessee's cities where nonconformities are permitted some degree of expansion, discontinuance and continued existence, the same was not true in Memphis and Shelby County, which operate under the more restrictive private acts. Ironically, the first few drafts of the UDC attempted to omit the planned development tool, despite the fact that the voters had placed the tool in the Charter of the City of Memphis many decades before on August 1, 1974.

Again, many longstanding businesses decided not to expand, some decided to move but others forged ahead with zoning applications to OPD to expand in contradiction of the UDC. However, the UDC attempted to rid the community of the use variance authority granted to the Board of Adjustment by enabling legislation and blessed by the Tennessee Supreme Court, so the only option for expansion was the filing of a planned development.[41]

4. Vested Rights

Another legal principle that affects a city's ability to address blight through zoning is the law of vested rights. In zoning terms, a right is vested if a building is constructed or a use is established prior to new zoning regulations that would prohibit such construction or use. Nonconformities are created when an existing business, often a business that has operated for decades in a given location, is down-zoned by a community's new zoning regulations. A business claiming vested rights is on the other end of the spectrum: it is a new business, one that has perhaps spurred a change to the community's zoning regulations, that wishes to be a nonconformity. After all, existing as a nonconformity beats the alternative: not existing at all.

For many years, the law governing vested rights in the zoning arena was static, based on a 1939 Tennessee Supreme Court opinion. In that case, the court aligned with many other states in finding that a business could not claim a vested right unless it had (1) a building permit, (2) performed substantial construction and (3) good faith, or no knowledge that the city may try to change its zoning laws to address it.[42] For obvious reasons, the "substantial construction" aspect of this three-prong test was heavily litigated in the ensuing decades. This all changed in 2014 when the General Assembly revised Tennessee Code Annotated section 13-4-310. This new vesting statute, which took effect on January 1, 2015, removes the substantial construction requirement for a business to claim a vested right in an older set of zoning regulations.[43] Instead, he or she need only show that a building permit was obtained. For land use entitlements that do not require building permits, such as subdivision plats and planned developments plans, the preliminary approval of those plats and plans creates a vested right. It is clearly the legislative intent of the State of Tennessee to limit the ability of cities to use their zoning code to address pending businesses, many of which had been historically selected because of the real or perceived blighting effects of that type of business. So, while one source of blight may come in the form of overly strict local zoning regulations that punish longstanding nonconforming businesses, another may come in the form of state action allowing a local government from preventing these nonconformities opening in the first place.

41. See MEMPHIS TENN., CHARTER & RELATED LAWS art. 21, § 157 (2012), https://www.municode.com/library/tn/memphis/codes/charter?nodeId=PTICHRELA_ART21GEZORE_S157PLUNDE.

42. Howe Realty Co. v. Nashville, 141 S.W.2d 904 (Tenn. 1940).

V. LATEST TRENDS IN LAND-USE REGULATION

Today, planners and attorneys across the country are using the zoning and subdivision enabling legislation to craft a new type of codes that more precisely communicate the rules to the end user. This new approach to zoning and subdivision is based on the understanding that the rules that govern downtown or older neighborhoods should be different than those that govern new suburban development. This more modern approach to development codes is called form-based codes. Rather than the use of a property being the primary organizing mechanism for controlling land, as is typically the case under Euclidian zoning, form-based codes place a greater emphasis on the form of the building and create codes that better implement the vision of the community and are easier to navigate.

43. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-4-310(k)(2) (Supp. 2015).

Form-based codes are also contextually based,[44] meaning that the right rules are in the right places—urban rules for urban places, suburban rules for suburban places, rural rules for rural places, and natural areas treated as natural areas. Well-crafted form-based codes organize these rules by context or transect at the site, block and neighborhood scale and encourage the appropriate mixing while simplifying the ability to navigate and understand what is expected of the developer.

While land use regulations have been in place for more than ninety years in Memphis and Shelby County, the community has embraced building and other technical codes for a much longer period of time.[45] In fact, the first building code was adopted by the City of Memphis in 1860.[46] This early code was updated eleven times before finally being codified into the General Ordinances of the City of Memphis in 1931 as the "Memphis Digest 1931."[47] This Code was largely peculiar to Memphis; the city did not embrace a uniform building code until 1967 with the adoption of the Basic Building Code, 1965 Edition, written by the Building Official and Code Administrator International, Inc., or "BOCA."[48] The city migrated to the Southern Building Code in 1979 to better align with Shelby County, which had been using the Southern Building Code since 1959.[49] In early 1984, the Memphis and Shelby County Building Departments merged to create the Office of Construction Code Enforcement.[50] With this merger came a new uniform building code, the Standard Building Code, 1982 Edition.[51] Since

---

44. Many codes use the urban to natural transect or T-zones to organize various rules across the complexity of a neighborhood or city. An example of these types of codes is the SmartCodes. See, e.g., CENTER FOR APPLIED TRANSECT STUDIES, http://transect.org/codes.html (last visited May 15, 2016). For additional information on the history of zoning and subdivision codes, see THE CODES PROJECT, http://codesproject.asu.edu (last visited May 16, 2016). The website, managed by Arizona State University professor Emily Talen, is an anthology of rules and regulations that seeks to create a specific urban form. Id.

45. See TERRY HUGHES, THE HISTORY OF MEMPHIS AND SHELBY COUNTY TECHNICAL CODES.

46. Id. at 1.

47. Id.

48. Id.

49. Id.

50. See id. at 2.

51. See id.

2005, the community has been utilizing the International Building Code, published by the International Code Council, the "ICC."[52]

While many refer to all technical codes as the "building code," they are in actuality separate codes with separate appellate bodies and required separate adoptions by both the city and county. These include the fuel gas code, the mechanical code, the electrical code, the plumbing code, and perhaps most importantly in relation to regulatory blight, the existing building code.[53] The "existing building code" is a term that refers to the building code that is applied to the rehabilitation of existing buildings; therefore, it is also known as the "rehab code."[54] Memphis and Shelby County originally adopted a rehab code in 2006 with its adoption of the ICC Existing Building Code, 2003 Edition.

> In late 2012, the Memphis City Council and Shelby County Board of Commissioners adopted the 2012 Edition of the ICC Existing Building Code with local amendments recommended by the Memphis and Shelby County Building Code Advisory Board.
>
> Today, there are three key sections of the technical codes that act as "rehab codes" in Memphis and Shelby County: 1) Chapter 34 of the ICC International Building Code, 2) the ICC Existing Building Code, and 3) Appendix C of the ICC Existing Building Code. The table below explains the situations in which each may best be applied[.]
>
> All three sections of the technical codes cited . . . give the Building Official the authority to accept compliance alternatives if he or she finds that strict compliance with each code section in question is impractical; that the alternative conforms with the intent and purpose of the Code and that the pro-

---

52. Id.

53. See generally id.

54. For a practical and detailed explanation of the Rehab Codes, see PHILIP MATTERA, GOOD JOBS FIRST, BREAKING THE CODES: HOW STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS ARE REFORMING BUILDING CODES TO ENCOURAGE REHABILITATION OF EXISTING STRUCTURES 4 (2006).

posed alternative does not lessen any health, life safety, fire safety or structural integrity element required.[55]

	Chapter 34	Existing Building Code	Appendix C
Scope	This section establishes requirements to be met when an existing building is being altered, repaired, added to or undergoing a change in occupancy.	Same as Chapter 34, except there are three methods of obtaining compliance: the prescriptive and work area methods where each element of construction meets a set standard and the performance method where the owner demonstrates on a case-by-case basis that the work is in compliance with all Code requirements.	This section may only be utilized if an existing structure is being converted into apartments.
Seismic Require quire-ments	Use current seismic standards unless the owner demonstrates the existing design loads will provide equivalent performance to that of any system that could be installed in the building.	There are two methods of obtaining compliance: meet the prescribed force level values established in the Building Code or follow the requirements of Standard Reference Methods ASCE 41, using BSE-1 and 2 and the table found in Section 301.1.1.4.1. When using the latter, the structure shall provide at least 75% of the proscribed force level values from the Building Code or comply with Appendix A of the Existing Building Code.	The design loads that were applicable when the building was originally constructed, if any, provided no dangerous condition is created.

55. MEMPHIS & SHELBY CTY. OFFICE OF CONSTR. CODE ENF'T, MEMPHIS AND SHELBY COUNTY REHABILITATION CODE, https://shelbycountytn.gov/DocumentCenter/View/23044.

Alterations	Alterations shall comply with new code requirements and be installed so that the building is no less compliant with the code than it is currently.	Sets three levels of [alterations], based on size and scope. Level 1 alterations, the smallest, must comply with Chapter 7 of the Existing Building Code; Level 2 with Chapters 7 and 8 and Level 3 with Chapters 7 through 9. Regardless of which level the alternations fall under, the resulting structure shall be no less conforming with the code than it was prior to the alteration.	Similar to the Existing Building Code; there are three levels of alterations articulated with progressive requirements for compliance.[56]

A. Rehab Codes and Pink Zones

Many cities have adopted what is called a "Rehab Code," but it is fairly clear that the full potential of these codes has not been realized. Eric Bethany, an urban architect at Kronberg Wall in Atlanta, recently commented on the firm's blog that his firm "constantly find[s] that local government officials are completely unaware of the importance of the existing building code as a critical tool for redevelopment and reuse of portions of their town, often the cherished buildings along Main Street."[57]

Early adopters of a Rehab Code included the states of New Jersey, Maryland, Minnesota, and Rhode Island and the cities of Wilmington, Delaware and Wichita, Kansas.[58] According to the Guide, Rehab Codes are "building and construction codes that encourage the alteration and reuse of existing buildings . . . . developed because the building regulatory system in the U.S., including building codes, is a significant impediment to investments in the alteration and reuse of existing buildings. This has led to a complete re-thinking of how existing buildings should be regulated."[59]

56. MEMPHIS & SHELBY CTY. OFFICE OF CONSTR. CODE ENF'T, MEMPHIS AND SHELBY COUNTY REHABILITATION CODE, https://shelbycountytn.gov/DocumentCenter/View/23044.

57. Eric Bethany, In Praise of the Existing Building Code, KRONBERG WALL (Sept. 24, 2015), http://kronbergwall.com/in-praise-of-the-existing-building-code/.

58. BUILDING TECH., INC., SMART CODES IN YOUR COMMUNITY: A GUIDE TO BUILDING REHABILITATION CODES 3, 12 (2001), https://www.huduser.gov/Publications/pdf/smartcodes.pdf.

Building Codes are often cited by developers and builders as a barrier to revitalization of existing buildings. However, where Rehab Codes have been adopted, giving broader discretion to the local Building Official, the barrier is more likely in the enforcement than in the language of the applicable ordinances, although the two cannot be readily separated.

> The burden of building regulation on this country's housing builders and developers seems to come less from the actual restrictions of the codes than in their administration. Problems still arise in code creation (codes continue to be far from performance-based) and adoption (most jurisdictions continue to make amendments based on local political conditions rather than on climatic, geological, or material realities). . . . Code enforcement, however, seems to be the most significant barrier to development. . . . Extreme variations in plan reviews and inspections still exist not just between jurisdictions but also increasingly within jurisdictions.[60]

There is very little empirical research establishing that Rehab Codes, if enforced as intended, yield the desired result of decreased costs for redevelopment while not compromising life safety concerns. Perhaps one reason for the dearth of research on this topic is the lack of publicly available data that would be necessary to conduct such research. The result is that anecdotal information is relied upon in the crafting of rehab codes, the enforcement of rehab codes, and the efforts of developers and builders to comply with rehab codes. Carlos Martin calls for the development of a methodological approach to measuring and gathering data on how

---

59. Id.

60. Carlos Martin, Response to "Building Codes and Housing" by David Listokin and David B. Hattis, 8 CITYSCAPE, no. 1, 2005, app. at 253, 255, https://www.huduser.gov/periodicals/cityscpe/vol8num1/res1.pdf.

cities enforce codes as a "first order of business" to address the dearth of research in the field.[61]

In an article printed in the same HUD journal focused on regulatory barriers to affordable housing, Peter May detailed the components of regulatory barriers in any development.[62] May discusses research across the United States that identifies and charts building codes pertaining to affordable housing development on a spectrum from "business friendly" to "by-the-book."[63] He goes on to describe how around the turn of the century efforts at regulatory reform began to "shift in perspective from considering ways to strengthen enforcement to addressing ways to improve compliance[,]" and he uses the research and writing about Rehab Codes as evidence of the success of this approach.[64]

A study of New Jersey's experience with Rehab Codes found that so called "facilitative enforcement" of Rehab Codes can stimulate residential investment in central city neighborhoods.[65] While not the only answer, Rehab Codes properly enforced show promise as a local response to Regulatory Blight. As further explained below, more fine-grained approaches are required to turn around specific targeted revitalization clusters, but even there, the power of the Building Official to interpret the "intent" of the building codes may be key.

Regardless of the language of the codes or their enforcement, as noted above, the small size of a very desirable community revitalization project may actually make it impossible as a practical matter. Therefore, cities that hope to spur reinvestment in largely

61. Id. at 257.

62. Peter J. May, Regulatory Implementation: Examining Barriers from Regulatory Processes, 8 CITYSCAPE, no. 1, 2005, at 209, https://www.huduser.gov/periodicals/cityscpe/vol8num1/ch6.pdf.

63. Id. at 213.

64. Id. at 217, 218 (citing Raymond J. Burby et al., Building Code Enforcement Burdens and Central City Decline, 66 J. AM. PLAN. ASS'N 143, 154–155 ("Adopting business-friendly approaches will not reverse the movement of industrial, office, and retail businesses from central cities to the suburbs. But these approaches can help cities attract more single-family detached housing (and the population that comes with it) and spur more commercial rehabilitation projects.").

65. Raymond J. Burby et al., Encouraging Residential Rehabilitation with Building Codes: New Jersey's Experience, 72 J. AM. PLAN. ASS'N, 183, 191–92 (2006).

blighted areas have the challenge of establishing a mechanism to make small development possible. This approach has been experimented with, and has yielded promising results in many communities. The focused attention, concentration of enforcement and other resources, and regulatory flexibility can make all the difference and can stimulate multiple small projects, whose whole is greater than the sum of its parts.

B. Making Small Possible

While large investments are needed and welcome there remain many neighborhoods in Memphis where it is difficult to develop. Older, distressed, and transitional neighborhoods often do not have the ability to generate rent sufficient to finance the costs of renovation or new construction without subsidies. In these neighborhoods, small commercial buildings (less than 10,000 square feet), small apartment buildings, and vacant single-family homes continue to deteriorate into blighted conditions and reduce surrounding property values while adding cost to city budgets due to maintenance and increases in crime. This is a desperate cycle for neighborhoods and slow-growth cities such as Memphis. So how can this cycle be interrupted?

One approach is to encourage more small, independent developers by reducing the difficulty, costs and time required for small-scale infill development. There is a correlation between the increasing regulations, cost, and time required to complete infill projects and the typical size of the projects. Larger projects are able to absorb the cost associated with the consultant team needed to navigate the system. This requires a degree of experience and sophistication that only a few local developers in Memphis possess. In a relatively slow-growth, weak market city such as Memphis this can leave many small projects and potential "end-user developers" out of the picture. How can policy makers encourage small-scale development in neighborhoods?

The economics of real-estate development are basic. For a project to be viable, the owner must be able to build a building that will cost less to build and operate than the owner receives in rent [X (rents) - Y (cost to build and operate) = Z (profit or loss)]. The two variables are the rent generated and the cost to build and operate the building. If the equation is negative then the development loses money and will not likely occur. If it is positive then the project is at least viable. So, in theory, to make this equation positive one would want to increase rents or decrease costs (or some combination of both).

Rent represents the rental rate or sale price of the property. If rents increase above a certain amount too quickly then issues of displacement and gentrification can emerge. The costs include all hard and soft costs associated with development—planning and entitlements, construction materials and labor, marketing, insurance, taxes, etc. For policy makers interested in promoting small-scale affordable development as a tool to combat blighted neighborhoods, the focus becomes identifying and reducing the regulatory burden and time that can inflate the cost of building rehab and operations.

This leaves cities that want to streamline and remove regulatory barriers to redeveloping blighted properties with a couple of options. Cities may choose to conduct a total reform of regulations including a complete rewrite of the zoning, subdivision, and building regulations. In theory this approach may seem the cleanest, however, this work is complex, expensive, and time consuming. Further, we have not proven to be very good at anticipating necessary reforms on a wholesale basis. Additionally, local politics and a resistance to change may impede total reform of zoning and subdivision codes. Further, state politics and issues of insurability may hinder comprehensive reform of statewide building codes.

Alternatively, cities may choose to work within the current system to improve opportunities for small infill and rehab projects. Cities might implement "Pink Zones"[66] or overlay zones that create exceptions in zoning and building codes that allow for easier redevelopment of buildings. Additionally cities may look to streamline the approval process to: make it easier for small projects to get a permit, train planners and code inspectors to be more supportive, and help applicants to find equivalent alternatives that can satisfy the black letter of the law. Further, cities can work with applicants and community members to explain how they are supportive of small redevelopment projects. This type of approach enables innovation and experimentation to occur because small projects represent lower risk projects due their size and scale.

66. Pink Zones are designated areas of a city where community members believe a less rigid enforcement of zoning and/or building regulations will yield a more desirable community. See Keith Boyfield & Daniel Greenberg, Pink Planning, CENTRE FOR POLICY STUDIES 1 (2014), http://www.cps.org.uk/files/reports/original/141105085708-PinkPlanning.pdf. In essence Pink Zones are overlay districts where the regulatory "red tape" is lightened to promote easier and more cost effective infill and redevelopment. Id. These are discussed in more detail below in the context of Phoenix, Arizona. Additional information on Pink Codes and other approaches to making small development easier can be found through The Project for Lean Urbanism. Ctr. For Applied Transect Studies, LEAN URBANISM, http://leanurbanism.org (last visited May 16, 2016).

This is the approach taken by the city of Phoenix, Arizona. In addition to rethinking their regulatory paradigm they are also supporting stakeholders in other ways. What follows is a quick overview of some of the steps the city of Phoenix has taken to implement a "Lean Government" approach to build stronger communities, infill and redevelopment of vacant buildings, and test ideas before investing in them. This summary is based on interviews with municipal officials in Phoenix and a well-written white paper on the topic entitled Lessons from PHX–Embracing Lean Urbanism by Lysistrata Hall and Braden Kay.[67]

Phoenix, Arizona, is similar to Memphis in that it has more land than it needs. Phoenix is approximately 518 square miles and home to 1.5 million people (about 2,967 people per square mile).[68] Memphis is about 324 square miles and home to 660,000 people (2,000 people per square mile). Both cities have also been subject to misguided urban renewal policies leaving large swaths of vacant land (40–45% of Phoenix is vacant land). As a result of the failed urban renewal policies of the 70's–90's and an increasing regulatory regime,[69] developers in Phoenix were finding it more cost effective to tear down buildings and build new construction at the edge of the city rather than to rehab existing buildings or infill in historic neighborhoods.

---

67. Lysistrata Hall & Braden Kay, Lessons from PHX—Embracing Lean Urbanism, THE PROJECT FOR LEAN URBANISM (Aug. 18, 2015), http://leanurbanism.org/publications/lessons-from-phx/.

68. See Quickfacts, Phoeniz City, Arizona, U.S. CENSUS BUREAU, http://www.census.gov/quickfacts/table/PST045215/0455000,04 (last visited May 16, 2016).

69. The entitlement and permitting processes in Phoenix may take upwards of eighteen months for completion, for projects that align with city policy. Interview by Tommy Pacello with Lysistrata Hall, Neighborhood Specialist, The City of Phoenix Neighborhood Servs. Dep't (Nov. 17, 2015).

When the 2008 recession stalled suburban greenfield development, city officials recognized that one of the few bright spots in the economy was redevelopment of Phoenix's historic core by local residents and stakeholders through small-incremental infill projects. They began to recognize that existing processes and regulations were preventing residents from participating, let alone contributing, to the revitalization of their neighborhood. Establishing strong working relationships with an organization (thanks to a network of stakeholders), city officials realized the disconnect between their desire to encourage infill and redevelopment and the city's policies that promoted suburban sprawl and demolition of existing buildings. Officials wanted to see areas of the city revitalize and maintain their existing building stock but the city's codes and ordinances were oriented to promote new development over redevelopment and infill. To address this, city officials began to think differently about conventional policies and applied a comprehensive approach to neighborhood revitalization. They began to:

> (1) Build relationships between city staff and residents, businesses, nonprofit and community development groups to create a network of assets to address the challenge.
>
> (2) Nurture relationships and abilities of stakeholders by co-creating a shared vision between city staff, residents, business groups, and developers.
>
> (3) Reduce red tape by creating "Pink Zones" or areas of the city with lighter regulations and more place-based standards in an effort to preserve existing buildings and promote redevelopment.
>
> (4) Fill in the gaps between the existing buildings by adjusting regulations to allow temporary and semi-permanent buildings and uses to activate the area.
>
> (5) Establish walkable streets using low-cost iterative solutions that demonstrate what is possible for the street.

In Phoenix, government officials identified a challenge, reached out to communities, prototyped regulatory approaches and infrastructure ideas, and implemented the concepts that worked. The work was supported by the administration and had the effect of removing several of the regulatory barriers neighborhood stakeholders were facing in small-scale infill and redevelopment of blighted neighborhoods.[70]

Specifically related to the regulatory approach, the city created "Pink Zones" or areas to promote adaptive reuse. Officials initially identified small pilot areas where buildings of less than 5,000 square feet were subject to lower restrictions related to the zoning, building and technical codes. The program has since expanded citywide and applies to buildings built prior to 2000 that are up to 100,000 square feet. The program includes streamlined process, technical assistance, and cost savings to applicants. Additionally, the city developed a series of overlay zoning districts that further encourages small-scale redevelopment. Further, city departments such as the fire department, solid waste, public works, and environmental compliance (storm water) began to work together to reduce the burdens on infill projects. Finally, the city removed the requirement to bring existing parking lots, sidewalks, and driveways up to the current city code. Comprehensively these regulatory changes combined with the other efforts from the city have made it easier for small-scale adaptive reuse and infill development to take place. At the heart of these reforms is the understanding of the value that residents can deliver to their neighborhood when barriers that prevent from them contributing are reduced. These reforms look to restart historic cycles of revitalization and reduce the need for government agencies to underwrite redevelopment with subsidies that have questionable returns.

70. The City of Phoenix Adaptive Reuse Program outlines many of the exceptions that are available to applicants including issues of storm water retention, toilet fixtures and restrooms, life safety issues, and landscaping standards. See Adaptive Reuse Policies, CITY OF PHOENIX, https://www.phoenix.gov/pdd/services/permitservices/arp/adaptive-reuse-policies (last visited May 15, 2016).

V. CONCLUSION

We have attempted to shed some light, from the practitioner's perspective, on the barriers to eliminating blight that local land use and building code regulations erect and reinforce, even while local government strives and spends in an effort to eliminate vacancy and abandonment. In some cases, the regulations themselves should be changed to make revitalization possible; in other cases, the answer lies in more creative or facilitative enforcement. We recommend that cities like Memphis, that are serious about neighborhood and community revitalization, identify and focus on small neighborhood target areas and work to find ways to remove regulatory barriers at that level in order to stimulate small redevelopment projects that were previously impossible in that location. Based upon lessons learned in such neighborhood target projects, the broader regulatory structure may be addressed.

Expert knowledge of the regulations themselves—their history in the community, and the mechanisms of enforcement—will be essential to policy makers seeking to remove these barriers.

We believe that contextually applicable local regulations and their enforcement with neighborhood level real estate realities in mind will result in the elimination of blighted properties by market forces in urban areas where development is most needed. It is time for local government operators everywhere to recognize that their own rules are killing any hope of redevelopment of the very neighborhoods they are responsible for nurturing back to economic prosperity.

Community Control Supervision of Building Code Offenders in Cleveland's Housing Court: Making the Most of Ohio's Direct Sentencing for Misdemeanors

JUDGE RAYMOND L. PIANKA*

I. INTRODUCTION 904
II. DEVELOPMENT OF CLEVELAND'S HOUSING COURT 906
III. COMMUNITY CONTROL SENTENCING 909
  A. The Scope of Community Control Sanctions in Ohio 909
  B. The Intent of Community Control: "Direct Sentencing Method" 911
IV. DEVELOPMENT OF COMMUNITY CONTROL SENTENCING IN HOUSING COURT 913
  A. General Obligations of Community Control for Building Code Offenders...913
  B. The Role of Housing Specialists 913
V. COMMUNITY CONTROL IN PRACTICE 916
  A. Creative Sentencing: Tailoring Community Control Obligations to Specific Circumstances 917
  B. When Punishment is Needed 920
  C. When Punishment Fails: Defiant Offenders.....................921
  D. Transferring Property Without Making Repairs.............922
  E. Direct Sentencing Turns into a Drain of Court Resources 923
  F. Connecting the Dots Between Civil and Criminal Cases 924
  G. Highs and Lows: Community Control's Effective and Ineffective Cases 924
VI. CONCLUSION..926

I. INTRODUCTION

An owner of twenty rental properties in Cleveland appears before the Cleveland Housing Court (the "Housing Court") to be sentenced for failing to repair a collapsing porch and to repaint the exterior of a rental property in Cleveland. After being charged, the owner made the needed repairs and now asks for a lenient sentence, given his eventual compliance. What the owner does not tell the Housing Court is that the City of Cleveland (the "City") has condemned one of his other properties—a vacant house vandalized by thieves who tore out the copper pipe. That property currently poses a threat to the community, as it is open to entry because the owner has done nothing to address the problem.

Fortunately, the condemned house will not escape the Housing Court's attention for long because the Housing Court sentences the owner to a term of community control supervision. Instead of choosing to mistrust and punish, or to trust and forgive, the Housing Court directly sentences him to meet community control requirements designed to ensure that he will responsibly maintain all of his properties, including the condemned house he failed to bring to the Housing Court's attention. Under community control requirements, the Housing Court will assign one of its ten Housing Specialists to monitor the owner's compliance with building codes at all of his rental properties. He will have the duty to provide a list of all the properties he owns, to visit each of them regularly, and to provide the Specialist with photographs of each property. The owner, now an "offender," will be proving his own failure to obey the law if the photographs show peeling paint or rotted wood at any of the properties that the City inspector had not previously visited. The pressure on him to comply with code requirements at all of his properties will not fade.[1]

* Cleveland Municipal Court, Housing Division.

1. The examples used in this article are based on fact patterns and legal issues in cases that came before the Housing Court. Because the court's obligation is not to comment publicly on pending or impending cases, and all cases with an unexpired term of community control are potentially impending cases, the examples are amalgamations of different cases or have details altered.

The Housing Court has developed its community control program[2] as an alternative to the traditional punishments of fines or jail time, which, though intended as a deterrent, may not persuade a neglectful owner to change his conduct or repair the properties which threaten Cleveland neighborhoods. The community control program, by requiring continued supervision of the repair process, thus makes the most of the "direct sentencing method" recommended by the Ohio Criminal Sentencing Commission when it recommended changes to Ohio's misdemeanor sentencing law in 1998.[3]

Implementing the program has required the Housing Court to consider several policy considerations. To what extent is a sanction reasonably related to the overriding purpose of the sentence? While the Housing Court has the ability to monitor an offender's behavior and actions, how far should the Housing Court's supervision extend? Should the Housing Court limit its use of community control when monitoring an offender becomes a drain on staff resources? And to what extent should the court base its decisions on its knowledge of limits in the City's code enforcement efforts?

---

2. Dictionary of Legal Terms: Community Control Sanctions, OHIO LEGAL SERVS., http://www.ohiolegalservices.org/public/legal_terms_dictionary/community-control-sanctions (last visited Mar. 31, 2016) ("While often called 'probation,' community control sanctions cover a wide variety of residential, non-residential, and financial options that judges use in criminal sentencing, including traditional probation supervision and numerous other restrictions administered by the local court. Community control is used for felons when a prison term is not imposed. It is imposed on misdemeanants when a jail term is not warranted. Residential community control sanctions include community-based correctional facilities, halfway houses, and others. Non-residential options include community supervision, drug and alcohol treatment, house arrest, electronic monitoring, community service, and the like. Financial sanctions include fines, restitution, and various reimbursements. Persons facing mandatory prison terms (e.g., for murder, high level sex and drug offenses, felonies committed with firearms, certain repeat offenders, etc.) or mandatory jail terms (e.g., for driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs) are not eligible for community control, other than financial sanctions.").

3. OHIO CRIMINAL SENTENCING COMM'N, A PLAN FOR MISDEMEANOR SENTENCING IN OHIO 19–21 (1998), http://www.supremecourt.ohio.gov/Boards/Sentencing/resources/publications/misdemeanor_vol1.pdf [hereinafter COMMISSION REPORT]. The General Sentencing Proposal was adopted and is now a part of the Ohio Revised Code, Chapter 2929.

This Article will describe how the Housing Court has answered these questions so that it can best use community control sanctions to stop neglectful property owners from re-offending by failing to maintain and repair Cleveland's trouble housing stock.[4] The Article will discuss the history of the Housing Court, the availability of community control as a sentencing option for misdemeanants in Ohio, and the inception of the Housing Court's unique community control supervision program, highlighting how the Housing Court has adapted the traditional community control model to meet the unique challenges of defendants convicted of a housing, building or health code violation. It will also focus on the policy implications that the Housing Court has faced and continues to face as it develops its program of community control supervision.

II. DEVELOPMENT OF CLEVELAND'S HOUSING COURT

> [The Cleveland] Housing Court is part courtroom, part emergency room that performs legal triage on a mix of criminal and civil cases for people who fall behind on their rent and mortgage payments—financial problems that lead to other charges, such as housing, zoning and fire code violations.[5]

The Housing Court was created in 1980 in response to deteriorating conditions in Cleveland's neighborhoods and other concerns that would be better addressed by a specialty court with a single judge.[6] The legislation that created the Housing Court gave

4. See Michelle Jarboe, Vacant Houses, Blighted Buildings Still Plague Cleveland, But Problem is Shrinking: Taking Stock, CLEVELAND.COM (Nov. 21, 2015, 7:00 AM), http://www.cleveland.com/business/index.ssf/2015/11/vacant_houses_blighted_buildin.html (explaining that although 6,000 structures still need demolition in Cleveland, this number is down from 7,700 in 2013).

5. Chief Justice Thomas J. Moyer, Annual State of the Judiciary Address on Sept. 14, 2006, SUP. CT. OHIO & OHIO JUD. SYS., http://www.supremecourt.ohio.gov/PIO/Speeches/2006/SOJ_091406.asp.

6. See Hon. Raymond L. Pianka, Cleveland Housing Court—A Problem-Solving Court Adapts to New Challenges, in FUTURE TRENDS IN STATE COURTS 44 (2012), http://www.ncdsv.org/images/NCSC_FutureTrendsInStateCourts_2012.pdf; see also OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 1901.051(A) (LexisNexis 2010) (specifying that the Cleveland Housing Court have only one judge).

it extensive jurisdiction over housing issues and authorized it to make use of a staff of Housing Specialists to help the Housing Court in its mission.[7]

The Housing Court has exclusive jurisdiction over all criminal cases brought to enforce the City's Housing, Building, Fire Prevention, Zoning, and Agriculture and Air Pollution Codes.[8] The Housing Court's jurisdiction over civil cases includes evictions, rent deposits, restraining orders, landlord/tenant disputes, actions to abate nuisances, and some foreclosures. If an issue impacts real property in the City, the Housing Court likely has the authority to hear the case.

> [T]he division has exclusive jurisdiction within the territory of the court in any civil action to enforce any local building, housing, air pollution, sanitation, health, fire, zoning, or safety code, ordinance, or regulation applicable to premises used or intended for use as a place of human habitation, buildings, structures, or any other real property subject to any such code, ordinance, or regulate . . . in any civil action commenced pursuant to Chapter 1923. or 5321. or sections 5303.03 to 5303.07 of the Revised Code . . . [and] in any criminal action for a violation of any local building, housing, air pollution, sanitation, health, fire, zoning, or safety code, ordinance, or regulation applicable to premises used or intended for use as a place of human habitation, buildings, structures, or any other real property subject to any such code, ordinance, or regulation . . . [and] in any civil action as described in division (B)(1) of section 3767.41 of the Revised Code that relates to a public nuisance.[9]

In addition, unlike most municipal courts, the Housing Court has unlimited monetary jurisdiction.[10] This extra power prevents land-

---

7. OHIO REV. CODE ANN. §§ 1901.011, .02(B), .025, .031, .331(A)(1) (LexisNexis 2010).

8. Id. § 1901.181(A)(1).

9. Id.

10. Id. § 1901.131.

lords or tenants from forum shopping by bringing a claim in excess of the municipal court's jurisdiction; housing cases stay in Housing Court. With this streamlined approach, the Housing Court is the first to know and recognize repeat offenders.

The Housing Court has evolved into a problem-solving court.[11] The statutes establishing the Housing Court authorized that court to hire Housing Specialists to enable it to address concerns outside the courtroom.[12] The Housing Court has a complement of ten Specialists who have backgrounds in probation, landlord/tenant law, building and housing code enforcement, banking, social work, and community organizing. The Specialists serve as community control probation officers, operating the Housing Court's walk-in landlord/tenant clinic, and mediating disputes between parties. They serve as the eyes and ears of the Housing Court in Cleveland's neighborhoods.

The Housing Court emphasizes compliance with code requirements as the primary goal of criminal prosecution. The public good is best served when properties are repaired and maintained.[13] While some punishment is warranted even if an owner eventually complies with code requirements, punishment alone will not serve the public if it does not function as a deterrent, the public continuing to suffer from blighted property conditions. The Housing Court's focus is therefore on deterrence and property rehabilitation. The Housing Court designed and implemented its community control program with this end in mind.

Prior to the implementation of the current community control supervision program, the Housing Court's practice was to defer its ultimate decision on execution of sentence so that defendants could argue in mitigation that they had eventually complied with Building Code requirements. This approach burdened the Housing Court's docket because of the need to hold repeated status hearings to determine if an owner has brought his property into compliance. It also focused the Housing Court's, and the offend-

---

11. Pianka, supra note 6, at 44.

12. OHIO REV. CODE ANN. §§ 1901.011, .331.

13. See generally Jarboe, supra note 4 ("[Vacant] buildings taint neighborhoods, hurt home values and entice criminals. Shabby houses stand as testaments to a half-century of population loss capped by a decade-long flood of foreclosures and a brutal housing bust.").

er's, attention only on the property that was the subject of the criminal charges; it did not allow the Housing Court to insist that the offender make needed repairs at his other properties. When owners failed to comply, the Housing Court could choose to execute on a fine or jail term but then lost its power to try to compel the owner to comply. Keeping jurisdiction over the question of sentencing allowed the Housing Court to meet its policy goals, but failed to meet the goal of reaching finality in a criminal case. The Housing Court had to be mindful that, as a case progressed, it needed to reach a final sentencing decision. The Housing Court could not retain the ability to modify fines and jail time unless those sanctions were part of a sentence of community control sanctions. Creating a comprehensive program of community control supervision allowed the Housing Court to achieve a dual purpose of maintaining jurisdiction to consider all of an offender's properties and lessening the number of status hearings per case.

III. COMMUNITY CONTROL SENTENCING

A. The Scope of Community Control Sanctions in Ohio

Community Control, often called probation,[14] is defined by Ohio statute as a sanction that is separate and distinct from a prison term.[15] The sanction covers a wide variety of residential, non-residential, and financial options that judges may use in criminal sentencing.[16] Community control is used for felons when a prison term is not imposed and for misdemeanants when a jail term is not warranted.[17] A judge can consider imposing other sanctions—such as electronic monitoring, community service, and residential treatment at a drug and alcohol rehabilitation center[18]—when sentencing a misdemeanant[19] to jail time in order to encourage the

14. OHIO LEGAL SERVS., supra note 2.
15. OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2929.01(E) (LexisNexis 2010).
16. OHIO LEGAL SERVS., supra note 2.
17. Id.; COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 21.
18. OHIO LEGAL SERVS., supra note 2.
19. Violations of the City's housing, building, fire, zoning, agriculture, health, and air pollution codes range from minor misdemeanors to first-degree misdemeanors.

optimum use of taxpayer money.[20] "The longest jail term should be reserved for the worst offenders and offenses."[21]

At the time of sentencing, the Housing Court will directly impose a sentence that consists of one or more community control sanctions.[22] After an offender is sentenced, the Housing Court places the offender under the supervision of the Housing Court or department of probation in the Housing Court's jurisdiction.[23] If the offender violates any condition of community control, the Housing Court has the opportunity to reevaluate and revise the original sentence.[24] The Housing Court hearing the community control violation hearing must provide an offender with six minimum due process rights:

> (1) written notice of the claimed violations; (2) disclosure of the evidence against the offender; (3) an opportunity to be heard in person and to present evidence; (4) the right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses; (5) a neutral and detached magistrate, and (6) written findings of fact stating the evidence relied on and the reasons for the revocation [in the event of revocation of community control].[25]

A community control violation hearing is not a criminal trial and the City need only to present substantial evidence of a violation and not prove a violation beyond a reasonable doubt.[26]

Upon finding that an offender has violated community control sanctions, the Housing Court may extend community control sanctions, impose more restrictive community control sanctions, or cancel community control sanctions and impose a definitive sentence.[27] Community control sanctions may not exceed five years,[28]

---

20. COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 14.
21. Id.
22. OHIO REV. CODE. ANN. § 2929.25(A)(1)(a) (LexisNexis 2010).
23. Id. § 2929.25(C)(1).
24. LEWIS R. KATZ ET AL., BALDWIN'S OHIO PRACTICE CRIMINAL LAW § 119:8 (3d ed. 2014).
25. Id.
26. Id.
27. Id.

and the Housing Court can reward success by shortening the time on community control or lessening the severity of the sanction.[29]

B. The Intent of Community Control: "Direct Sentencing Method"

The Housing Court's community control supervision program makes the most of the "direct sentencing method" recommended by the Ohio Criminal Sentencing Commission ("the Commission") in 1998, and adopted by the legislature.[30] The Commission feared that the existing system of imposing, and then suspending, a sentence failed to make clear the overriding purpose of misdemeanor sentencing: "to protect the public from future crime by the offender and others and to punish the offender."[31] The Commission opined that the suspended sentencing method frustrated this purpose.

Prior to the adoption of the Commission's Proposal, in order to sentence an offender to probation, a court had to first impose a jail term and then suspend it:

> Today, in sentencing an offender to probation, a court must first impose a jail term, then suspend it, then place the offender on "probation" subject to various conditions. A jail term must be imposed even when the court does not intend that the offender be jailed, except as a punishment for violating probation. When offenders succeed on probation, as most do, the jail term is never served. In fact, even when the offender violates probation, the full suspended jail term is seldom ordered.
>
> During its felony deliberations, the Commission concluded—and the General Assembly agreed—that suspended sentences can confuse defendants, victims, and the public. If we were creating a new justice system from scratch, it is unlikely we would start by imposing a jail term that we do not truly intend to have served.

---

28. OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2929.25(A)(2).
29. COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 8.
30. Id. at 19.
31. Id. at 7.

> By sentencing directly, the offender, victim, and public know exactly what is required. The probation department keeps the hammer it needs to make sure the defendant complies. The sentence does not flow from an often fictitious jail term. Honesty is the better policy.[32]

Rather than first impose a jail sentence only to suspend it, the Commission proposed that a judge should be able to sentence directly to probation.[33] At sentencing, the judge could warn offenders that violations of the terms of probation could mean longer terms under the sanction or more restrictive sanctions, including a specified jail term, thus achieving the same result but doing so openly.[34] Direct sentencing notifies the offender, victim, and public of both the requirements of compliance and the consequences should the offender not comply.[35]

While the Commission strongly recommended that judges use directed sentencing, it also recommended that they remain free to use suspended sentencing.[36] The practical effect on the offender is the same, but the way the judge announces the sentence is altered.[37] Adapting the Commission's sentencing example involving a drunk driving case to the housing context, under the suspended sentencing approach, the Housing Court judge would say, "six months in jail, suspended, and one year of probation, during which you must repair the roof, paint the front porch and maintain the property to minimum code." By contrast, the Housing Court judge imposing a direct sentence would announce, "I am imposing one year of community control supervision during which you must repair the roof, paint the front porch and maintain the property to minimum code; if you violate any of these conditions, you face the maximum sentence of six months in jail."

In recommending the direct sentencing method, the Commission envisioned that judges would be creative in their sentencing through, "additional sanctions designed to discourage the of-

---

32. Id. at 19–20.
33. Id. at 8.
34. Id.
35. Id. at 20.
36. Id.
37. Id.

fender and others from committing a similar offense, provided the sanctions are reasonably related to the overriding purposes of sentencing."[38] The Housing Court has embraced this idea and designs its community control sanctions to discourage offenders from re-offending.

IV. DEVELOPMENT OF COMMUNITY CONTROL SENTENCING IN HOUSING COURT

A. General Obligations of Community Control for Building Code Offenders

When the Housing Court began to implement its community control program, its first challenge was to develop general community control supervision requirements. The restrictions typically imposed on offenders—to get treatment for substance abuse, to seek employment, to avoid former associates—are not applicable to the case of a neglectful property owner. The Housing Court instead imposed, by local rule, the obligation to provide a list of all properties the offender owns in Cleveland (or the Village of Bratenahl, Ohio, over which the Housing Court also has jurisdiction), the duty to keep all properties in good repair, and a requirement to regularly visit and inspect each property to ensure that it remains in good repair.[39] Each offender is also required to report to his assigned Housing Court Specialist who may give more specific instructions.[40]

B. The Role of Housing Specialists

The Specialists' role is to enforce the community control obligations imposed on the offender while functioning as community control officers. Though they offer coaching and assistance, they also serve as enforcers, summoning offenders before the Housing Court for community control violation hearings when the offenders do not comply with supervision requirements.

---

38. Id. at 24.

39. CLEVELAND MUN. HOUS. CT. LOCAL R. app. 2.18(3)–(4), (6) (2016), https://www.clevelandmunicipalcourt.org/docs/default-source/default-document-library/2016-cleveland-housing-court-local-rules-as-transmitted-02-01-2016.pdf?sfvrsn=0.

40. Id. at 2.18(2).

The supervision requirements are designed so that the burden of demonstrating compliance is placed on the offender. The offender must prepare a list of properties to submit to the Specialist.[41] The offender must regularly visit his properties.[42] And the offender must make needed repairs, even before the Specialist visits some or all of his properties.[43] The most common statement from offenders found to be in violation of community control requirements is that they made repairs once the Specialist identified for them the defects at their property. The Housing Court responds by informing them that the assigned Specialist is not their employee; offenders are supposed to regularly visit their properties, note any defects, and correct them before the Specialist visits. The Specialist's visits are to check up on the offender, not to guide the offender.

The offender's first burden is to address the conditions that were a part of the City's Notice of Violations of Cleveland's ordinances. In the strictest sense, the offender is already re-offending if the repairs are not completed. But the Specialist will have the discretion to decide on the time for compliance before a summons for violation of community control is issued.

Because the Specialist's goal is to help the offender to not re-offend, the Specialist may identify what repairs are needed and find resources to assist the offender. Sadly, there are not many resources to help homeowners. If the offender lacks sophistication, the Specialist will help educate the offender about minimum safety code requirements. The Specialist may suggest, or require, that the offender take general classes such as the Housing Court's seminar for landlords, "What Every Landlord Should Know," commonly called "Landlord School," or specific training such as training in lead abatement.

Because the offender is under the watchful eye of the Specialist, he or she can be brought back to the Housing Court quickly and called to account for failing to make repairs. This procedure is more expeditious than the City's procedure for inspection, which includes issuance of a notice of violations and subsequent criminal prosecution.[44] The Specialist prepares a written report with photographs indicating the alleged violations of community control requirements. If the judge finds probable cause, the case is set for a community control violation hearing.[45] Community members benefit from the program because they can bring violations to the attention of the Housing Court's Specialists more easily than they could through the complaint process of the City's Department of Building and Housing. Any neighbor who knows about the offender's community control sentence can contact the Housing Specialist. More commonly, local community development corporations who monitor code enforcement become aware of the sentence and, if they send staff to check on the condition of properties in their service area, can have those staff members notify the court's Housing Specialist about any problems at the offender's properties.

41. Id. at 2.18(3).
42. Id. at 2.18(6).
43. Id. at 2.18(4).

The Housing Court conducts its community control violation docket twice per month. In most cases, the offender's hearing is divided into two stages. At the first stage, the judge or magistrate determines whether the offender has violated the requirements of his sentence of community control. Then, if there is a finding of violation, the judge or magistrate decides on the penalty. Before deciding on the penalty, the Housing Court typically continues the case to allow the offender to seek a lesser penalty if he or she addresses the underlying problem.

In keeping with the goal of placing the burden of compliance on the offender, the Housing Court emphasizes the offender's community control obligations and the Housing Court's expectation that the offender meet those obligations prior to any visit from the Specialist.

---

44. Building owners are required to keep properties in good repair and to demolish or repair them when ordered to by the Department of Building and Housing. CLEVELAND, OHIO CODE OF ORDINANCES § 3103.09(e)(1) (2016), http://library.amlegal.com/nxt/gateway.dll/Ohio/cleveland_oh/cityofclevelandohiocodeofordinances?f=templates$fn=default.htm$3.0$vid=amlegal:cleveland_oh. Failure to comply is a first degree misdemeanor. Id. § 3103.99(a).

45. Probable cause here can be supported by evidence that building code defects exist that the offender has not repaired or that the offender has failed to comply with specific terms of community control such as providing reports to the Housing Specialist or making regular visits to the offender's properties.

The Housing Court's ability to modify the terms of community control can be to the benefit of offenders.[46] Offenders who comply with community control requirements can ask the Housing Court to modify the terms of their sentence by reducing fines, lessening community control requirements, or shortening or ending their term of community control.[47]

V. COMMUNITY CONTROL IN PRACTICE

In the years that the Housing Court has implemented community control sanctions, several public policy concerns have shaped the Housing Court's response to unique situations and offenders. The Housing Court's ultimate goal for offenders is full compliance to the City's housing, building, and health codes. Incarceration prevents the offender from bringing the property into full compliance, so how does the Housing Court guarantee that an offender makes the necessary repairs to his property? How does the Housing Court ensure that a property is brought into compliance when the offender is a bank holding the property as a trustee for another beneficiary or when the offending property is sold to escape the jurisdiction of the Housing Court?

The Housing Court's solution to many of these compliance puzzles has been to craft unique and creative sanctions under the direct sentencing method intended to prevent offenders from reoffending. The Housing Court has the power to impose any sanction "that is intended to discourage the offender or other persons from committing a similar offense if the sanction is reasonably related to the overriding purposes and principles of misdemeanor sentencing."[48] The sanction must not, however, "be overly broad so as to unnecessarily impinge upon the probationer's liberty."[49]

Ohio's courts have not considered the scope of community control sanctions imposed for housing or building code violations. The main sanctions that have been subjected to scrutiny are sanctions that involve parental rights. The courts have allowed or dis-

46. COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 20–24.

47. Id.

48. OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2929.27(C) (LexisNexis 2010).

49. State v. Talty, 814 N.E.2d 1201, 1204 (Ohio 2004) (quoting State v. Jones, 550 N.E.2d 469, 470 (Ohio 1990)).

allowed such sanctions based on the circumstances of the offense.[50]

The Housing Court's power to impose sanctions on housing offenders may face similar limits. It could exceed the Housing Court's authority to order as a community control sanction that an offender stop being a landlord altogether since lesser restrictions could serve the goal of preventing the offender from re-offending.[51] The Housing Court has, however, ordered offenders who have failed to make repairs to a large inventory of houses not to buy any more houses and has ordered offenders to demolish condemned houses without first having an opportunity to offer them for sale "as is" when it seems likely that an "as is" sale would not lead to the house being promptly repaired.[52]

Community control supervision has not proven effective for every offender. Stricter punishments, such as imposing large fines or incarceration may be the Housing Court's best tool in these situations. Finally, even where direct sentencing appears to be a good solution, it can prove to be a drain on Housing Court resources for offenders with a large number of properties in disrepair. All of these concerns have created a malleable system, ever adapting to best accomplish the Housing Court's ultimate mission.

A. Creative Sentencing: Tailoring Community Control Obligations to Specific Circumstances

Community control supervision carries with it the duty for the offender not to re-offend.[53] But the goal of sentencing is not

---

50. Compare Talty, 814 N.E.2d at 1204–07 (finding it unconstitutional to order an offender convicted of non-support of his children not to have any more children); State v. Sturgeon, 742 N.E.2d 730, 733 (Ohio Ct. App. 2000) (finding it unconstitutional to order an offender convicted of domestic violence against the mother of his children not to have contact with his children), with State v. Jones, 550 N.E.2d 469, 472 (Ohio 1990) (finding it constitutional to restrict an offender convicted of contributing to the delinquency of children from having contact with children not related to him); State v. McClure, 825 N.E.2d 217, 220 (Ohio Ct. App. 2005) (finding it constitutional to order an offender not to have contact with her children because she had admitted that she tried to kill them).

51. COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3, at 24.

52. Kermit J. Lind, The Perfect Storm: An Eyewitness Report from Ground Zero in Cleveland's Neighborhoods, 17 J. AFFORDABLE HOUSING & COMMUNITY DEV. L. 237, 239–40 n.11 (2008).

53. COMMISSION REPORT, supra note 3 at 24.

merely to put offenders in peril of being punished because that increased scrutiny may, in fact, fail to deter them from re-offending.[54] The Housing Court therefore tailors community control sanctions to best stop each individual offender from re-offending.[55] This is the creative sentencing the legislature envisioned for misdemeanor sentencing.

One example of creative sentencing is how the Housing Court handled one offender who bred a large number of dogs at his residence in violation of City zoning laws, neglecting the dogs in the process. The offender so mistreated the dogs he was breeding that many had to be euthanized. Neighbors complained about the excessive odor coming from his yard as a result of the number of dogs he kept. The offender was convicted and placed on community control so he first had the general obligation not to re-offend. He failed his obligation by continuing to use his home to breed dogs, continuing to keep a large number of dogs there. As a more stringent sanction, the Housing Court ordered that he could not keep more than one dog at his home. When the offender again kept multiple dogs at his house—neglecting one of them so severely that it needed immediate medical attention—the Housing Court forbade him from having any dogs in his home. The Housing Court thus ensured that the offender could not try to hide his dog breeding from scrutiny.

The Housing Court's greatest challenge since the foreclosure crisis has been how to address cases involving properties formerly in foreclosure. Many offenders in Cleveland face the problem of continuing to own homes they thought they had lost through foreclosure.[56] Banks have increasingly decided not to take title to houses in Cleveland if no one offers the minimum bid at a foreclosure sale, since the cost of making necessary repairs may exceed the price the house is likely to command.[57] The banks' decision

---

54. Id.

55. Id.

56. Marissa Weiss, Attack of the Zombie Properties, 47 URB. LAW. 485, 485–86 (2015) (explaining that many homeowners incorrectly believe that the start of the foreclosure process means that the bank is taking responsibility for the property and they must immediately vacate).

57. Lind, supra note 52, at 239–40 (explaining that foreclosure processes can take several years and by the time they are sold the cost of repairs exceed not to take title leaves the original owner with responsibility for repairing or demolishing the house, which has usually been broken into and vandalized, yet unable to sell or give it away because of its "zombie" title.[58] Because Cleveland is served by the Cuyahoga County Land Revitalization Corporation (commonly known as the Cuyahoga County Land Bank), many of these offenders plan to seek release of mortgage liens, and other liens, so they can convey the property to the Land Bank. In these cases, the Housing Court orders offenders to keep the home secure from entry, free of graffiti, with the grass and weeds cut, and no debris in the yard while they seek release of liens.

In cases where owners are not able to obtain release of liens, they often wish to stay in a holding pattern, hoping that a tax foreclosure leads to them losing title or that the City demolishes the house. But Cuyahoga County does not have the staff to bring tax foreclosures on every abandoned house and the City does not have the funds to demolish every condemned house. In these cases, if the offender lacks the money to repair or demolish the house, the threat of punishment will not force the issue. But neither is it just for the offender to walk away from his or her responsibility. In such cases, the Housing Court, after evaluating the offender's income, orders the offender to allocate at least a portion of their income to funding a savings account with the goal of eventually saving enough money to pay for demolition of the house. This tailored remedy forces the offender to keep up the effort not to re-offend rather than punishing the offender with fines that will only make it harder for them to comply.

However, there is a set of offenders who in no way lack funds. Several major national banks have been convicted and sentenced to community control supervision. None of the banks, unfortunately, have kept their properties free of building code defects. After finding the banks to have violated community control, the Housing Court considers what sanctions would prove most effective in preventing the banks from re-offending. Since many of the building code defects result from repeated break-ins, the Housthe value of the house causing many lien holders to simply walk away and abandon the property as "worthless").

---

58. See id. at 240 ("These owners are, however, still owners of record and legally responsible for the condition the property.").

ing Court ordered one bank to install metal security doors at each property where a break-in had occurred. When this measure failed to prevent the bank from re-offending, the Housing Court imposed the requirement that the bank install wireless security alarms in each of its vacant properties. The bank objected that this sanction was not reasonably related to the goal of stopping the bank from re-offending, arguing that it was third parties, not the bank, who caused the re-offense against the law. The Housing Court overruled the objections because the record established that, even if the break-ins were outside the bank's control, the bank's failure to promptly secure and repair the properties was caused by its failure to regularly inspect its vacant houses. When the Housing Court's Housing Specialist drove by a small sample of the bank's properties, he discovered several break-ins that the bank did not yet know about. The sanction of installing wireless home security systems was therefore reasonably related to the goal of stopping the bank from re-offending.

The Housing Court also imposes a sanction on neglectful landlords that was once innovative but has become tried and true: residential confinement to property owned and neglected, by the landlord. Such confinement serves two functions: it punishes the offender by making him or her the party who suffers from any failure to make repairs, and it motivates the offender to make the needed repairs. The hope is also that the sanction sensitizes the landlord to the effects on others of his or her neglect of property.

The Housing Court retains jurisdiction over cases where it has imposed community control sanctions, allowing it to reward offenders who comply. Offenders can request that the court terminate their term of community control or modify financial sanctions imposed on them.

B. When Punishment is Needed

When offenders subject to community control sanctions fail to comply with the requirement not to re-offend, despite the fact that there are no obstacles preventing them from taking steps not to re-offend, the Housing Court no longer has the freedom to tailor the sanction. The Housing Court can only deter such offenders through traditional punishment.

One such offender was a for-profit business that, despite having had its eyes wide open when it became owner of vacant houses in Cleveland, nevertheless asked the Housing Court to be lenient with it. The business requested that the Housing Court expect no more of it than the Housing Court would of former homeowners struggling with zombie titles. The business became owner of vacant houses in Cleveland because it chose to purchase tax certificates from the Cuyahoga County and to foreclose on homeowners who did not pay the offender on demand. Yet the owner failed to show the Housing Court that it was making any effort to make needed repairs or promptly demolish condemned houses. It would take action only when the Housing Court's Housing Specialist identified specific defects at particular houses. The Housing Court announced to this offender that the Housing Court's community control officer was not its employee, checking its housing stock as a service to the offender; the Specialist was checking to see if the offender had met its obligation to regularly inspect and repair. Though the offender did not wish to spend money on repairs, preferring to sell the vacant houses in their "as is" condition, the Housing Court explained that compliance with the community control requirement to keep property in good repair was not optional. The Housing Court fined the offender $20,000 and extended its term of community control supervision.

C. When Punishment Fails: Defiant Offenders

The Housing Court's decision to punish offenders who violate the terms of community control can fail to bring about the desired result of changing the offender's behavior. In the case of an individual, the threat of incarceration or incarceration may fail to coerce the offender to comply with community control requirements. In the case of offenders who are shielded business entities—corporations or limited liability companies—the threat of fines may have no effect on the offender if the investor/owners of the offender entity conclude that raising the capital needed to comply with community control requirements would lead to a greater loss for them than the imposition of fines, even when those fines are substantial.[59] The Court has, in the past year, been confronted with three offenders who have not hidden the fact that they violat-

59. Business entities are subject to fines up to $5,000 for each day during which they fail to comply with an order from the city's building department. CLEVELAND, OHIO CODE OF ORDINANCES § 3103.99(c) (2016) (citing OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2929.31(8) (LexisNexis 2010)).

ed community control requirements because the owners of the company, the sole asset of which was the derelict property, had not, and would not, raise the capital needed for the offender to comply with the law. They chose instead to leave the company unable to comply with the law and therefore subject to the maximum punishment the Housing Court could impose. Since it is the offender itself, as distinct from its owners, and has the obligation to comply with community control requirements, the owners can choose to let the company fail so that they face no additional financial liability. The offenders argued that the fact that making the needed repairs would likely cause it a business loss should excuse them from complying or that the Housing Court should hold them blameless. The fact that complying with the law will cause a company, or a person, to lose money is no justification for failing to comply and does not render the offender blameless. The Housing Court therefore punishes these offenders with fines, fully aware that the shield of liability provided by corporate law will likely defeat the public's interest in code enforcement in cases where a company's owners hold to the view that the company's value is less than the cost of funding the company so that it can comply with the law. The fines ordered by the Court can be converted to civil judgment but may go uncollected or be collected without causing the offender to make any effort to comply with community control requirements.

D. Transferring Property Without Making Repairs

When an offender transfers a property without making needed repairs, the failure to make repairs during the time of ownership is a violation of community control requirements. But in these cases the Housing Court cannot design a sentence intended to cause the offender to repair the property. The Housing Court can only decide what punishment is appropriate given the offender's violation. The Housing Court may consider the sale a mitigating factor in determining punishment to the extent to which the sale was to a responsible buyer such as an established company with a record of renovating properties or an individual who plans to live in the house and has sufficient income to repair and maintain the property. The Housing Court will not find the sale to be a mitigating factor if it was a quick sale to an out of state speculator who will likely neglect the property while trying to sell, or "flip" it, for a quick profit.

E. Direct Sentencing Turns into a Drain of Court Resources

The Housing Court must consider, when imposing creative community control sanctions, the burden on its staff of Housing Specialists that the sanctions create. It is the Housing Specialists that must monitor the offender's compliance with increasingly specific requirements.

Some offenders, after having been found to have violated community control requirements, appear to the Housing Court to be in good faith when they pledge to meet their obligations. When called to account for their subsequent failures to make repairs at particular properties, they often justify those failures based on their efforts to address problems at other properties. If the Housing Court faults the offender for his or her priorities, it can order the offender to change those priorities, to make certain repairs before others. This approach, however, burdens the assigned Housing Specialist who may be asked to decide on the right priorities and will be asked to inspect and confirm that particular repairs were made.

One offender purchased over twenty vacant homes in Cleveland using money from an investor but without obtaining funds needed for repairs. In addition, some of the homes were condemned and needed to be demolished. The offender allegedly also lacked the money to pay for demolitions. The Housing Court began to consider sanctions more and more narrowly tailored to the task of getting the offender to make the most needed repairs first. But doing so threatened to make the Housing Specialist into the offender's property manager, so, instead of asking the Housing Specialist to prioritize how the offender should spend the funds he did have through lists of repairs at particular houses, the Housing Court made the sanctions more general, ordering the demolition of certain condemned houses by certain dates and for other houses, ordering that all repairs needed for those houses be accomplished by set deadlines.

The Housing Court's willingness to burden its staff with detailed supervision of offenders depends, in part, on the extent to which the City is enforcing its codes through its inspectors. If the City sends its inspectors, issues notices of violation, and brings new criminal cases against offenders sentenced to community control, the Housing Court does not need to duplicate those efforts by using its own staff to visit those same properties. The City brings both minor misdemeanor charges and first-degree misdemeanor charges before the Housing Court three days a week. The Department of Building and Housing and the City's Law Department decide on the cases to be brought and sometimes make it a priority to inspect and prosecute landlords who own, but neglect, a substantial number of properties. But, when the City's enforcement is haphazard or incomplete, with criminal charges brought only for a particular property, the Housing Court makes it a priority for its staff to consider the condition of all of an offender's properties.

F. Connecting the Dots Between Civil and Criminal Cases

The Housing Court's Housing Specialists also help landlords and tenants in civil cases. A tenant might come to Housing Court to find out what she can do about her water being shut-off. A landlord asks about the process to evict a tenant. When the same Housing Specialists are assigned to monitor offenders' compliance with community control requirements, they have a ready-made opportunity to confirm what offenders are telling them or to find out when offenders are not telling the whole truth.

One offender told the Housing Specialist assigned to his case that he had only purchased houses for extended family members to live in. But the Housing Specialist learned from her work on civil cases that the offender had purchased more properties than he told her about and that he was renting out some of the properties to non-family members. She brought him in for a violation hearing so the Housing Court could force him to provide her with honest information and to make repairs at all the properties he bought.

G. Highs and Lows: Community Control's Effective and Ineffective Cases

Community control sanctions sometimes achieve the Housing Court's goal of ensuring that offenders make repairs to neglected properties in Cleveland. One of the Housing Court's most extensive community control sentences involved a real estate company that purchased vacant homes in bulk from major banks, paying about $500 per house. The company intended to sell the properties to low income families with poor credit using land contracts with almost no down payment required. Houses that did not attract interest would be flipped to other speculators. The Housing Court ordered that the homes be repaired prior to being sold by land contract, that condemned houses be demolished, and that houses not be flipped to other speculators. Completely rehabbing the homes would have made them too expensive for most Cleveland families, but allowing them to be sold "as is" would leave eager homebuyers without hot water tanks or furnaces, with leaky roofs and collapsing foundations, with lead paint and electrical hazards. In a word—uninhabitable.

In this case, the Housing Court chose to devote the time of the Housing Specialist assigned to the task of determining what repairs would justify modifying the company's $500,000 in fines. She visited every home sold to an owner occupant to interview the buyers and determine what condition the house was in and what the buyers had already paid to repair or replace. The Housing Court heard her specific recommendations and ordered the company to make repairs and to credit buyers for repairs the company should have made. At regular status hearings, the Housing Court heard the results of her inspection of vacant condemned houses and set deadlines for those houses to be demolished.

The judge and magistrates of the Housing Court rarely see the offenders who comply with the requirements of community control since they are not summoned to Housing Court for violation hearings. Offenders who are successfully complying may file written motions asking for the modification of community control based on their success; the modification can include the reduction of fines, the lessening of community control requirements, or the early termination of community control.

It should be noted that community control sanctions can sometimes fail to achieve their purpose. An owner of nine rental properties on Cleveland's west side claimed to lack the money needed to make repairs. After hearing from a homeowner who had lived for years directly beside one of the offender's worst properties, the Housing Court sentenced the offender to home confinement at that property. The offender defied the Housing Court by failing to terminate the tenancy of the month-to-month tenant who occupied that property so that he could begin serving his sentence. The offender also failed to cut the grass and weeds at the property; he did not install a simple pipe to drain the kitchen sink, which his tenant could not use except by putting a bucket under the sink to catch the wastewater. Given his defiance, the Housing Court ordered this offender to serve ninety days incarceration, that sentence to be modified as soon as he had arranged to serve the previously ordered home confinement. After being released from incarceration due to failing health, the offender sold the property where he was to serve his sentence, defeating once again the Housing Court's intent to force him to make needed repairs. The Housing Court must now consider the appropriate punishment given the offender's inability to make repairs.

VI. CONCLUSION

The traditional view of criminal sentencing is that punishing an offender deters that offender and others from violating the law again. This traditional model, however, lacks the flexibility needed by a court specializing in housing issues. Ohio's community control sentencing alternative provides a much more flexible approach. A court can directly sentence owners to take actions that will prevent them from re-offending. The offenders avoid greater punishment at the cost of taking on the burden of having the court monitor all the properties they own.

Cleveland's Housing Court is using just such an approach in sentencing, an approach made possible by the Housing Court's expertise in housing issues, its experienced staff, and its ongoing evaluation of the success of its community control requirements.

Saving Our Cities: Land Banking in Tennessee

SOHIL SHAH*

I. INTRODUCTION 928
II. WHAT IS LAND BANKING?..928
III. EVOLUTION OF TENNESSEE LOCAL LAND BANK ACT 931
A. Brief History Behind Tennessee Land Banking 931
B. Passage of the Tennessee Local Land Bank Pilot Program 933
C. Amending Land Banking Legislation in Tennessee 934
D. Foreclosure and Delinquency in Tennessee.....................937
IV. COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF TENNESSEE LOCAL LAND BANKING ACT 939
A. Legislative Findings...940
B. Definitions...940
C. Creation 942
D. Board of Directors...944
1. Different Provisions 944
2. Identical Provisions...947
E. Applicability of State Law and Conflicts 949
F. Staffing 950
G. Powers 950
1. Identical Provisions...951
2. Different Provisions 952
3. Exclusive Provisions..955
H. Acquisition of Property 956
I. Disposition of Property..958
J. Open Meetings and Records...960
K. Dissolution...961
L. Conflicts of Interest..961
M. Construction of Legislation...962
N. Property Taxes...962
O. Action to Quiet Title 963
P. Appeals..964
Q. Comptroller Authority 965
R. Other Sections..965

V. EXISTING LAND BANKS IN TENNESSEE....................................966
A. Oak Ridge 966
B. Chattanooga...968
C. Memphis and Shelby County 969
VI. CONCLUSION..971

I. INTRODUCTION

Vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties present one of the greatest impediments to growth and security for our cities and communities. Properties with any of these characteristics not only create a cycle of land waste and poverty but also contribute to declining investment and interest in the areas in which they are located. Governments all over the country, from the federal government, state governments, and local governments, have tried repeatedly to devise solutions to solve the problems posed by vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties, but for the most part the strategies they have used have been limited or temporary in their success. Land banks present a novel and assertive approach to solving this problem by efficiently changing the legal status of these properties and converting them into productive and attractive pieces of land. In this article, I explain land banking, break down the land bank statutory scheme in Tennessee, and explore how Tennessee can use land banking to solve the problems of vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties.

Part I discusses the history and structure of land banks. Part II explores the evolution of land banking in Tennessee and its eventual adoption by certain cities within the state. Part III compares Tennessee's land banking legislation with the template upon which it is based and with land banking legislation in other states. Part IV provides an analysis on the current status of land banking in Tennessee. Tennessee is new to the national land banking movement and a better understanding within the state of this mechanism will aid in a more emphatic embrace of land banking as a tool that will help save our cities.

II. WHAT IS LAND BANKING?

A land bank is many things, but, first and foremost, it is a practical solution to a problem that touches almost every aspect of local government. The United States Department of Housing and Urban Development defines a land bank as "a governmental or nongovernmental nonprofit entity established, at least in part, to assemble, temporarily manage, and dispose of vacant land for the purpose of stabilizing neighborhoods and encouraging re-use or redevelopment of urban property."[1] A land bank, at its essence, converts "vacant, abandoned, [tax-delinquent,] and foreclosed properties into productive use."[2]

What does it mean to label a property vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed? First, a vacant property is one that is unoccupied.[3] Second, an abandoned property means that the owner has stopped investing any resources into the property, including ceasing routine maintenance and payments on related financial obligations.[4] Abandonment presents a stronger sense of neglect to the property than mere vacancy.[5] Third, a tax-delinquent property is one for which the owner has failed to pay the appropriate amount of property tax.[6] Often, but not always, vacant and abandoned properties are tax-delinquent as well.[7] Fourth, a foreclosed property means that the mortgagor has forfeited the property due to non-payment of the money due on the mortgage.[8]

---

* Sohil Shah, J.D., Emory University School of Law; B.A., Northwestern University. I thank Professor Frank S. Alexander for teaching me the importance of land use and how it impacts our everyday lives. His knowledge, mentoring, and continued support throughout this process have been invaluable. I also thank the Executive Board and staff of the University of Memphis Law Review, especially Kelly Peevyhouse and Greg Wagner, for their dedication, hard work, and time with editing this piece. Finally, I thank my parents for all their encouragement and support. Contact: sohil.m.shah@gmail.com.

1. U.S. DEP'T OF HOUS. & URBAN DEV., NEIGHBORHOOD STABILIZATION PROGRAM LAND BANK FACT SHEET 1, http://www.hud.gov/offices/cpd/about/conplan/foreclosure/doc/landbanksfactsheet.doc.
2. FRANK S. ALEXANDER, LAND BANKS AND LAND BANKING 10 (2d ed. 2015).
3. Id. at 14.
4. Id.
5. Id.
6. See id.
7. Id.
8. See Foreclosure, BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY (10th ed. 2014).

Properties possessing any, some, or all of these four characteristics present a large range of issues for the communities in which they are located. Vacant properties can fall into disrepair and become neglected.[9] Abandoned properties attract vandalism and criminal activity and pose fire and safety hazards.[10] Tax-delinquent properties burden local governments with an increase in service and maintenance costs as well as a result of lower tax revenues for governments.[11] The Great Recession, with its housing and economic crises, has led to record numbers of foreclosed properties.[12] The two crises have also led to population and job loss that have resulted in vast surpluses of vacant and abandoned properties not only in cities but also in surrounding suburbs.[13]

These types of properties have a wide range of effects on adjacent neighborhoods including a decrease in (1) "property values of [nearby] properties," (2) "property tax revenues from nonpayment of taxes," and (3) "property tax revenues from declining property values of [nearby] properties."[14] They also lead to an increase in (1) costs of police and public safety, (2) incidences of arson resulting in higher fire prevention costs, (3) costs of local governments to enforce codes, and (4) costs of judicial actions.[15]

While local governments have a myriad of options to address these issues, land banking presents the most effective and comprehensive tool for local governments to address vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties. A land bank with wide discretionary power can convert these properties into productive real estate through three primary attributes.[16] First, it has the ability to acquire title to vacant, abandoned, and foreclosed proper-

---

9. OFFICE OF POLICY DEV. AND RESEARCH, U.S. DEP'T OF HOUS. & URBAN DEV., REVITALIZING FORECLOSED PROPERTIES WITH LAND BANKS 1 (2009), http://www.huduser.gov/portal/publications/landbanks.pdf.

10. Id.

11. Id.

12. See Alan MALLACH & JENNIFER S. VEY, BROOKINGS-ROCKEFELLER, PROJECT ON STATE AND METRO. INNOVATION, RECAPTURING LAND FOR ECONOMIC AND FISCAL GROWTH 1 (2011), http://www.brookings.edu/~/media/research/files/papers/2011/5/03-land-value-mallach-vey/0503_land_value_mallach_vey.pdf.

13. Id.

14. ALEXANDER, supra note 2, at 15.

15. Id.

16. See id. at 10.

ties.[17] Second, it has the power to eliminate financial liabilities.[18] Third, it can transfer properties to new owners so that the properties can add value to the local community through productive use.[19] Examples of productive use include downtown redevelopment, housing new businesses, mixed-use development, "building housing to meet new demands for urban living," and improving "quality of life through [new] parks, waterfronts, and other green spaces."[20] I explain the specific powers a land bank can possess to achieve these goals in Part III below.

III. EVOLUTION OF TENNESSEE LOCAL LAND BANK ACT

In this part, I describe the history of the Tennessee Local Land Bank Act, discussing its history and its initial passage, which allowed only one city, Oak Ridge, to establish a land banking entity. I then look at the April 2014 amendment that expanded its applicability to certain other local governments in the state. I conclude the section by highlighting the foreclosure crisis across the state.

A. Brief History Behind Tennessee Land Banking

The impetus for introducing land banking in Tennessee derived from the large amount of vacant and abandoned property that existed in the City of Oak Ridge, located in the eastern part of the state near Knoxville.[21] Oak Ridge was founded as a location to house a uranium enrichment facility and other scientific facilities as a part of the World War II Manhattan Project.[22] In 1942, the United States Army Corps of Engineers bought approximately 60,000 acres of rural farm land to build a city and wartime facili-

---

17. Id.

18. Id.

19. Id.

20. MALLACH & VEY, supra note 12, at 2.

21. TENN. ADVISORY COMM'N ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS, COMBATING BLIGHT IN TENNESSEE COMMUNITIES PRELIMINARY REPORT 1 (2011), https://tn.gov/assets/entities/tacir/attachments/Combating_Blight_in_Tennessee_Communities_-_Preliminary_Report_.pdf [hereinafter TENN. ADVISORY COMM'N].

22. See Residents: About Oak Ridge, CITY OF OAK RIDGE TENN., http://www.oakridgetn.gov/content/RESIDENTS/About-Oak-Ridge (last visited May. 16, 2016).

ties.[23] Between 1942 and 1945, the federal government brought in tens of thousands of workers to staff the new facilities in Oak Ridge.[24] Due to an expectation that the city would only be used during the war, the government brought in or built a large number of temporary houses, intending to move them out when the war ended.[25]

After the war, Oak Ridge became an independent city, and, in 1959, its residents voted to incorporate the city.[26] Following a referendum held on November 7, 1962, the City of Oak Ridge adopted home rule.[27] The houses were never moved—some remain occupied but others are vacant and abandoned.[28] A large number are in disrepair of various degrees, with absentee landlords owning many of them without performing proper maintenance.[29]

To respond to this problem, State Senator Randy McNally, who represents Oak Ridge, introduced a resolution in the spring of 2011 to study blight in the state.[30] The Tennessee Senate adopted the resolution in May 2011, directing the Tennessee Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations to perform the following functions: (1) to study the effects on local governments when owners abandon their blighted properties; (2) to recommend solutions for local governments to return these properties to some sort of positive use; and (3) to report its findings to the Chairmen of the Finance, Ways, and Means Committees of the Tennessee Senate and House of Representatives.[31]

In its preliminary report, released in 2011, the Commission summarily declared that blight was a widespread problem in the state and highlighted problems that local governments in the state

---

23. Id.
24. TENN. ADVISORY COMM'N, supra note 21, at 1.
25. Id.
26. CITY OF OAK RIDGE TENN., supra note 22.
27. OAK RIDGE CHARTER COMM'N, CHARTER OF THE CITY OF OAK RIDGE, TENNESSEE C-1 (2010), http://www.mtas.tennessee.edu/public/CHARTERS.nsf/0/CD346A3BE98CF44185256E2F0058159B/$File/Oak%20Ridge.cht.pdf?OpenElement.
28. TENN. ADVISORY COMM'N, supra note 21, at 1.
29. Id.
30. Bill History: SJR0103, TENN. GEN. ASSEMBLY, http://wapp.capitol.tn.gov/apps/BillInfo/Default.aspx?BillNumber=SJR0103&ga=107 (last visited Oct. 25, 2014).
31. S.J. Res. 0103, 107th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2011).

faced when attempting to address blight.[32] These problems included the difficulty in attempting to enforce basic property standards without the authority to do so and the loss of interest of potential developers in certain properties due to the length of time it took to complete tax foreclosure sales.[33] The report proposed various remedies for addressing blight, specifically concluding that Tennessee did not widely use or understand land banking, and highlighting the success of land banking in other states.[34]

B. Passage of the Tennessee Local Land Bank Pilot Program

After the Commission's preliminary report was released, the Tennessee Local Land Bank Pilot Program Legislation ("Pilot Legislation") was introduced in both the Tennessee House of Representatives and the Tennessee Senate on January 30, 2012.[35] After various amendments and committee procedures, the House of Representatives and the Senate approved the bill in April of 2012 and the Governor signed the bill in May of 2012.[36] The bill went into effect on July 1, 2012.[37] The Pilot Legislation introduced a sweeping land banking program to the state, authorizing local governments to establish a land bank entity with a large number of powers, which is discussed in detail in Part III. Generally, the Pilot Legislation allowed a local government to create a corporation that is authorized to operate land bank within the jurisdictional boundaries of that government. One section of the law, though, limited its applicability to only one local government. The Pilot Legislation allowed for any municipality, county, or municipality county combination incorporated or existing under state law to establish a local land bank pilot program only if it satisfied the following three conditions:

> (1) The local government was chosen as a site for a nuclear research facility for the 32. TENN. ADVISORY COMM'N, supra note 21, at 1–3.

33. Id. at 2–3.

34. Id. at 3–5.

35. H.R. 3400, 107th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2012); S. 3223, 107th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2012).

36. Bill History: SB 3223 (HB 3400), TENN. GEN. ASSEMBLY, http://wapp.capitol.tn.gov/apps/BillInfo/Default.aspx?BillNumber=%20SB3223&GA=107 (last visited May 15, 2016).

37. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-101 to -119 (West 2012) (amended 2014).

United States government during the World War II era;

(2) Prefabricated modular homes, apartments and dormitories, many made from cemesto panels, were quickly erected for those employed at the nuclear research facility; and

(3) Many units of such housing, while intended to be only temporary structures, are in extremely deteriorated conditions and still serve as residential homes for municipal residents seventy (70) years after originally constructed.[38]

As stated above, Oak Ridge was the only Tennessee site for nuclear research during World War II as a part of the Manhattan Project—no other site in the state meets these criteria. The language in the Pilot Legislation effectively limited the legislation's applicability to Oak Ridge. As a result of this legislation, Oak Ridge created a local land bank pilot program. I provide a summary of Oak Ridge's land banking entity in Part IV below.

C. Amending Land Banking Legislation in Tennessee

The Tennessee General Assembly amended the Pilot Legislation in 2014 to allow other local governments around the state to adopt land banking. In January 2014, a bill was introduced in both the Tennessee House of Representatives and the Tennessee Senate to amend the Pilot Legislation.[39] Representative Gerald McCormick of Chattanooga stated that the impetus for the change came from the request of Chattanooga and Knoxville to have the ability to create land banking entities in their cities.[40] In the spring of 38. TENN. CODE ANN. §§ 13-30-104(a)(1), -103(4) (West 2012) (amended 2014).

---

39. H.R. 2142, 108th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2014); S. 2315, 108th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2014).

40. Hearing Before the H. Subcomm. on Local Gov't, 2014 Leg., 108th Sess. (Tenn. 2014) (statement of Rep. Gerald McCormick), http://tnga.granicus.com/MediaPlayer.php?view_id=226&clip_id=8690 (statement beginning around the 13 min, 8 second mark).

2014 both chambers approved the bill, the Governor signed it, and it went into effect.[41]

The bill amended the Pilot Legislation by removing the previous limitation that allowed only Oak Ridge to create a land bank. Specifically it eliminated the previous definition of "local government" and replaced it with the following:

> [A]ny home rule municipality; any county having a population of not less than one hundred twenty-three thousand one (123,001) nor more than one hundred twenty-three thousand one hundred (123,100), according to the 2010 federal census or any subsequent federal census; any county having a population of not less than eighty-nine thousand eight hundred (89,800) nor more than eighty-nine thousand nine hundred (89,900), according to the 2010 federal census or any subsequent federal census; or any county having a metropolitan form of government.[42]

The General Assembly expanded the definition further in 2015 by adding the following designation: "Any municipality having a population of not less than forty-eight thousand two hundred (48,200) nor more than forty-eight thousand two hundred nine (48,209), according to the 2010 federal census or any subsequent federal census."[43]

The following table translates these legislative designations to the actual local governments that now have the authority to develop land banks:

Legislative Designation	Geographic Equivalent
Any home rule municipality;	Chattanooga, Clinton, East Ridge, Etowah, Johnson City, Knoxville, Lenoir City, Memphis, Mt. Juliet, 41. Bill History: HB 2142 (SB 2315), TENN. GEN. ASSEMBLY, http://wapp.capitol.tn.gov/apps/BillInfo/Default.aspx?BillNumber=HB2142&ga=108 (last visited May 15, 2016).

42. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-103(4) (West 2014) (amended 2015).

43. H.R. 454, 109th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2015); S. 1185, 109th Gen. Assemb., Reg. Sess. (Tenn. 2015).

	Oak Ridge, Red Bank, Sevierville, Sweetwater, and Whitwell[44]
Any county having a population of not less than one hundred twenty-three thousand one (123,001) nor more than one hundred twenty-three thousand one hundred (123,100), according to the 2010 federal census or any subsequent federal census;	Blount County[45]
Any county having a population of not less than eighty-nine thousand eight hundred (89,800) nor more than eighty-nine thousand nine hundred (89,900), according to the 2010 federal census or any subsequent federal census;	Sevier County[46]
Any county having a metropolitan form of government;	Hartsville—Trousdale County, Lynchburg—Moore County, and Nashville—Davidson County[47]
Any municipality having a	Kingsport

44. Cities by Charter Form: Home Rule, MUN. TECH. ADVISORY SERV., http://www.mtas.tennessee.edu/web2012.nsf/Web/Charter+Form+Codes?OpenDocument&Start=1&Count=1000&Expand=4 (last visited May 15, 2016).

45. Community Facts, U.S. CENSUS BUREAU (Mar. 2014), http://factfinder.census.gov/faces/tableservices/jsf/pages/productview.xhtml?src=CF (type "Blount County, Tennessee" into State, County, City, Town or Zip Code form).

46. Id. (type "Sevier County, Tennessee" into State, County, City, Town or Zip Code form).

47. Cities by Charter Form: Metropolitan Government, MUN. TECH. ADVISORY SERV., http://www.mtas.tennessee.edu/web2012.nsf/Web/Charter+Form+Codes?OpenDocument&Start=1&Count=1000&Expand=5 (last visited May 15, 2016).

population of not less than forty-eight thousand two hundred (48,200) nor more than forty-eight thousand two hundred nine (48,209), according to the 2010 federal census or any subsequent federal census

Currently, only Oak Ridge has an active land bank with properties under its control.[48] Other local governments such as Chattanooga and Memphis have taken the beginning steps by passing local resolutions for the creation of land banking authorities but these have yet to become operational. Local governments in the state should create land banks to deal with widespread vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties.

D. Foreclosure and Delinquency in Tennessee

Blight or masses of vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed property exist not only in Oak Ridge but also across the entirety of the state, and local governments that have the authorization to create land banking entities should take advantage of this power and move forward. No statewide database exists which measures numerically the number of vacant and abandoned properties, but some reports do give us a picture of foreclosures and delinquencies across the state. The percent of mortgages past due at the end of the second quarter of 2014 was 7.7%, compared to the national average of 6% for the same quarter.[49] While this figure is lower than the peak 10.8% that Tennessee saw in 2010 during the Great Recession, it still remains high compared to rates before the Great Recession.[50]

Another study also looks at the combined foreclosure and delinquency rate, which it calculates as the percentage of loans that have been delinquent for 90 days or more.[51] For the second quarter 2014, Tennessee's combined rate was 4.12%, only slightly better than the national rate of 4.8%.[52] While Tennessee's rate for the second quarter of 2014 declined approximately .7% from the second quarter of 2013,[53] there is still cause for concern. The total number of properties with new foreclosure filings was 2,134 in the second quarter of 2014.[54] Shelby County had the highest number of properties with new foreclosure filings, with 531, and Davidson County came in second with 195 properties.[55] It should be noted that until around 2011, Shelby County had the highest number of foreclosure filings by far—today its numbers are more in line with the overall state.[56]

48. See Oak Ridge, Tenn., Ordinance 08-2013 (Sept. 19, 2013), http://oakridgetn.gov/images/uploads/Documents/Ordinances/2013/8-2013.PDF.

49. DAVID PENN, MIDDLE TENN. STATE UNIV. BUS. & ECON. RESEARCH CTR., TENNESSEE HOUSING MARKET 2ND QUARTER 2014 6 (2014), http://issuu.com/mtsuberc/docs/housingbrief2q14.

50. Id.

Another report highlights the lingering problem of blight in the state as it compares nationally.[57] First, out of metropolitan areas with populations over one million, the Memphis metropolitan area is ninth in the county for percentage of houses with negative equity, with 27% of homes having underwater mortgages and 10% of homes having below peak home prices.[58] Second, when evaluating cities themselves (not the outer metropolitan area and also disregarding population) nationally, Memphis ranks 36th on the list of cities with the highest incidences of negative equity—33% of homes have underwater mortgages and 25% are below peak home prices.[59] For the calendar year 2013, Memphis had 3,242 homes in default or foreclosure.[60] Clarksville, the fifth-largest city in the state, ranks 85th on the list—25% of homes have underwater

---

51. HULYA ARIK, TENN. HOUS. DEV. AGENCY, TENNESSEE HOUSING MARKET AT A GLANCE 2014 14 (2014), http://www.tnmha.org/TMHA2/html.pages/Documents/TN%20Housing%20Market%20at%20a%20Glance_2014.pdf.
52. Id.
53. Id. at 15.
54. Id. at 17.
55. Id.
56. Id. at 19.
57. PETER DREIER ET AL., HAAS INST. FOR A FAIR & INCLUSIVE SOC'Y, UNDERWATER AMERICA (2014), http://diversity.berkeley.edu/sites/default/files/HaasInsitute_UnderwaterAmerica_PUBLISH_0.pdf.
58. Id. at 22.
59. Id. at 24.
60. Id.

mortgages while only 3% are below peak home prices.[61] Third, moving to just zip codes with the highest incidence of negative equity, the 38115 zip code, which sits in the middle of Memphis, ranks 286 out of approximately 22,000 total zip codes for the United States.[62] Forty-five percent of the homes in the zip code have underwater mortgages and 30% are below peak home prices.[63] The statistics can be endless, but the story is the same—Tennessee faces major hurdles in combatting its foreclosed and delinquent properties, and nowhere is that more evident than in Memphis.

IV. COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF TENNESSEE LOCAL LAND BANKING ACT

In this Part, I present an overview of the components of the Tennessee Legislation. Much of the current land banking legislation in the United States was enacted to solve the problem of the vast amounts of vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties left after the Great Recession, and derives from template legislation created by Professor Frank Alexander from Emory University School of Law, as a part of his work for the Center for Community Progress (the "Template Legislation").[64] This Template Legislation creates a comprehensive legislative mechanism for setting up land banking in any state.[65] Rather than states enacting piece-meal legislation that addresses various issues such as reformation of tax foreclosure laws or authority to take possession of properties, states have used a single piece of legislation, often modeled after the Template Legislation, to authorize the creation of land banking authorities. This single piece of legislation allows legislators and local governments an easy way to understand the numerous powers being granted to local land banking authorities.[66]

Numerous states, including, but not limited to New York, Georgia, Pennsylvania, and Missouri have used the Template Leg-

61. Id. at 25.

62. There are approximately 30,000 zip codes in the United States but data is only available for 22,000 of these zip codes. Id. at 37.

63. Id. at 33.

64. ALEXANDER, supra note 2, app. D, at 142 [hereinafter TEMPLATE].

65. Id.

66. ALEXANDER, supra note 2, ch. 2, at 21–22.

islation in its entirety or have used it as a basic framework.[67] I will explore the Tennessee Legislation, by comparing it to the Template Legislation, from which it has also derived, and point out major differences between it and legislation these other states have enacted.[68]

A. Legislative Findings

The Tennessee Legislation begins with a section on legislative findings, explaining the reasoning behind the need for land banking and its purpose, something shared by states around the country. The Tennessee Legislation includes every legislative finding clause from the Template Legislation: (1) importance of social and economic vitality, (2) recognition of the vacant and abandoned property crisis, (3) need to strengthen and revitalize economy by solving the vacant and abandoned property problem, (4) need to create new tools to turn vacant spaces into vibrant places, and (5) identification of land banks as a tool of converting vacant, abandoned, and tax-delinquent properties to productive use.[69] The Tennessee Legislation contains an additional clause which states: "In the interest of self-governance on the part of Tennessee's cities, this pilot program will be used in specific areas as a testing model of a self-governing, self-sustaining land bank that can revitalize Tennessee cities and counties."[70]

B. Definitions

As with its respective counterpart in any piece of legislation, the definitions section lays out basic terms and their meanings. Here, the definitions section of the Tennessee Legislation differs from the Template Legislation mainly in how the Tennessee Legislation organizes the land bank. As the sections below indi-

---

67. See GA. CODE ANN. §§ 48-4-100 to -112 (West, Westlaw through 2015 Legis. Sess.); MO. ANN. STAT. §§ 141.980–.1015 (West Supp. 2014); N.Y. NOT-FOR-PROFIT CORP. LAW §§ 1600–1617 (McKinney Supp. 2014); 68 PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. §§ 2101–2120 (West Supp. 2013).

68. My aim is not to cover every difference among the New York, Georgia, Pennsylvania, and Missouri statutes but only major differences affecting policy, function, and mechanisms.

69. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-102 (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 2, at 143.

70. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-102(6) (Supp. 2015).

cate, the Tennessee Legislation authorizes the creation of a corporation to create a land bank, which is a collection of real property, while the Template Legislation authorizes the creation of a land bank, which is the governing entity itself, not real property.[71]

First, the Tennessee Legislation defines "corporation" as a corporate entity created to operate a land bank[72] and "board of directors" or "board" as "the board of directors or other similar governing body of the corporation."[73] It then defines "land bank" as:

> [R]eal property, however obtained or acquired and held by a corporation . . . with the intent of acquiring and holding onto the real property so acquired until such a time as the corporation is able to find a willing and able buyer to acquire the real property from the corporation.[74]

This differs from the Template Legislation, which defines "land bank" as the legal organizing entity itself.[75]

Second, the Tennessee Legislation defines "real estate" as "an identified parcel or tract of land, including improvements,"[76] and "real property" as "one (1) or more defined parcels or tracts of land or interests, benefits, and rights inherent in the ownership of real estate."[77] This definition of "real property" differs from the Template Legislation definition in specificity but appears to encompass the land and everything attached to it, similar to the breadth proposed in the Template Legislation.[78] There does not appear to be significant reason for these deviations, other than a preference by Tennessee state legislators for this formation procedure.

---

71. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-103(3) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 3(c), at 143.

72. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-103(2) (Supp. 2015).

73. Id. § 13-30-103(1).

74. Id. § 13-30-103(3).

75. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 3(c), at 143.

76. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-103(5) (Supp. 2015).

77. Id. § 13-30-103(6).

78. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 3(g), at 144 ("'Real Property' shall mean lands . . . and every estate and right therein . . . and any and all fixtures and improvements located thereon.").

Third, the Tennessee Legislation and the Template Legislation differ in their definitions of which local governments can create land banking entities: the Template Legislation grants almost any local government the power to set up a land bank, while also acknowledging that states may need to limit the power to certain local governments only, and the Tennessee Legislation acknowledges such a limitation by maintaining applicability of the legislative authority to the local governments described above in Part II.[79] It is likely that Tennessee's limitation to home rule municipalities and the five additional counties reflects the concentration of population centers in the state such as Memphis and Nashville and a recognition of areas with measurable amounts of abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties. Other states, similar to Tennessee, have limited the power to certain local governments—Missouri's legislation states that only a municipality located "wholly or partially within a county in which a land trust created under"[80] another certain statutory section may establish a land bank agency (effectively Kansas City), and Pennsylvania's legislation defines a "land bank jurisdiction" as either:

> (1) a county, a city, a borough, a township, and an incorporated town with a population greater than 10,000; or
>
> (2) two or more municipalities with populations less than 10,000 that enter into an intergovernmental cooperation agreement to establish or maintain a land bank.[81]

C. Creation

The Tennessee Legislation pulls selectively from the Template Legislation for this section. Essentially, the Tennessee Legislation allows for any local government that is authorized to create a

---

79. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-103(4) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 3(e), at 144.

80. MO. ANN. STAT. § 141.980.1 (West Supp. 2014).

81. 68 PA. STAT AND CONS. STAT. ANN. § 2103 (West Supp. 2013).

corporation to operate land banks within that local government's jurisdictional boundaries.[82]

The creation section then states that the corporation is performing a public function, is a public instrumentality of the creating local government, and, as a result, it and all properties held in the name of the corporation as well as the income and revenues received from the properties shall be tax-exempt.[83] It also states that a corporation shall come into existence when a qualified local government applies on its own behalf or in conjunction with another qualified local government to establish the corporation by majority vote of its legislative body.[84] The creating government's or governments' governing bodies, as a part of the authorization process, must indicate their willingness to appropriate funds to provide for the corporation's initial administration and can provide such funding or grants and appropriate money to the corporation.[85] This element ensures that any such corporation will have enough funds to operate and acquire, manage, and dispose of property.

The Template Legislation, on the other hand, offers more avenues for creation of the land banking entity itself, allowing for the variety of partnerships that may want to create a land bank. It allows a local government to create a land bank entity where an ordinance, rule, or resolution, as appropriate, is adopted by that respective local government, two or more local governments that have entered into an intergovernmental cooperation agreement, any local government and municipality that have entered into an intergovernmental cooperation agreement, or a school district and any local government that have entered into an intergovernmental cooperation agreement.[86] It also indicates that each land bank created pursuant to the act shall have permanent and perpetual duration until terminated and dissolved under a later section of the act.[87] Other states mainly mimic the Template Legislation, containing minor differences related to which local governments have the power to create land banks, as indicated above. Pennsylvania's

82. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-104(a)(1) (Supp. 2015).
83. Id. § 13-30-104(a)(2).
84. Id. § 13-30-104(b)(1).
85. Id. § 13-30-104(b)(2).
86. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 4, at 144.
87. Id. § 4(f), at 144.

statute shows additional deference to residents by indicating that any ordinance creating a land bank must contain (1) how residents will have an opportunity to provide "input into the land bank decision-making process,"[88] and (2) "[p]olicies regarding former owner-occupants who are occupying homes acquired by the land bank" that show a preference for keeping them in their homes, when possible.[89] Missouri limits the land bank agency to sell at most five contiguous parcels of land to the same entity in one year.[90]

D. Board of Directors

Some of the Tennessee Legislation's sections relating to the Board differ from relevant provisions in the Template Legislation but others are identical. I first outline the differences and then look at the similarities. I also note the major differences that other states have enacted.[91]

1. Different Provisions

The Tennessee Legislation differs from the Template Legislation as follows:

(1) Number of Directors

a. The Template Legislation allows the local government to set the number of directors but the number must be odd and between five and eleven members.[92]

b. The Tennessee Legislation allows the corporation to have a board of directors that can consist of any number of directors, no fewer than five.[93]

---

88. 68 PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. § 2104(a)(5) (West Supp. 2013).
89. Id. § 2104(a)(6).
90. MO. ANN. STAT. § 141.980.1 (West Supp. 2014).
91. For the purposes of this part, the words director and member are used interchangeably.
92. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 4(a)(2), at 144.
93. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-105(a) (Supp. 2015).

(2) Directors' Requirements

a. The Template Legislation allows the local government to determine the qualifications, manner of selection or appointment, and terms of members.[94] It states, though, that vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.[95]

b. The Tennessee Legislation states that all directors must be qualified electors of and taxpayers in the creating local government or governments,[96] but that the creating local government determines the qualifications, manner of selection or appointment, terms of office, the manner of filling vacancies, and whether and to what extent local legislators shall be appointed or elected to serve on the board.[97] Specifically, the Tennessee Legislation states that the creating local government, at the first organizational meeting of the corporation, shall establish the terms of the initial directors so that they serve staggered terms and an approximately equal number of directors have terms that expire in each year.[98]

c. Remembering that the Missouri legislature effectively limited Kansas City as the only local government to establish a land banking entity, the legislation allows for only five directors—one appointed by Jackson County, one by the Kansas City Missouri School District, and three by the mayor of Kansas City.[99] This is the only state out of the states analyzed for this piece that

---

94. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 4(a)(4), at 144.
95. Id. § 6(f), at 145.
96. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-105(a) (Supp. 2015).
97. Id. § 13-30-105(b).
98. Id. § 13-30-105(c).
99. See MO. ANN. STAT. § 141.981.1 (West Supp. 2014).

gives the school district power to appoint a director.

d. Pennsylvania requires at least one member who is a resident of the jurisdiction of the respective land bank, is not a public official or municipal employee, and is a continuing member of a recognized civic organization within the land bank's jurisdiction.[100]

(3) Director Voting

a. The Tennessee Legislation mainly mimics the Template Legislation regarding voting procedures but provides for the following, which are not present in the Template Legislation: a "quorum" means a majority of the board present at a meeting, and a simple majority vote of the directors present at any meeting at which a quorum is present constitutes action.[101] Additionally, a director may participate in meetings through any means of communication allowing for all directors who are participating to simultaneously hear each other during the meeting.[102]

b. Additional provisions relating to voting are the same in both pieces of legislation and are listed in the Identical Provisions section that follows below.

(4) Director Removal

a. The Tennessee Legislation allows for a citizen petition having a clearly worded purpose and consisting of at least twenty signatures of qualified registered voters to seek the removal of any board member.[103] The creating local government then can consider the petition and a response from the board before deciding whether to remove or retain the director by simple majority vote.[104] It also states the removal of a director shall not "impair the public official or municipal or county employee in that person's other duties."[105]

100. 68 PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. § 2105(b)(3) (West Supp. 2013).

101. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(a) (Supp. 2015).

102. Id.

b. This citizen removal procedure does not appear in the Template Legislation.

(5) Other Provisions

a. The Template Legislation contains provisions mandating the following that do not appear in the Tennessee Legislation: board members are not personally liable for bonds and other obligations of the land bank and rights of creditors are solely against the land bank;[106] and any public officer or municipal employee shall be eligible to serve as a board member and acceptance of the appointment does not terminate or impair that public officer's position within the local government.[107]

2. Identical Provisions

The Tennessee Legislation's provisions relating to the following are identical to the same provisions in the Template Legislation:

103. Id. § 13-30-106(d).
104. Id.
105. Id.
106. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(j), at 145.
107. Id. § 6(c), at 145.

> (1) The directors shall select officers from themselves and establish duties as may be regulated by rules adopted by the board.[108]
>
> (2) The board has discretion in establishing participation and attendance rules and requirements.[109]
>
> (3) If any director fails to comply with such rules and regulations, a minimum majority vote of the remaining members of the board is required to disqualify and remove that director from the board.[110]
>
> (4) Directors shall serve without compensation.[111]
>
> (5) Directors have the power to organize executive, administrative, clerical, and other departments of the land bank or corporation and determine the duties, powers, and compensation of all the employees, agents, and consultants of the land bank or corporations.[112]
>
> (6) The board can reimburse members for any land bank-related expenses they incur.[113]
>
> (7) The board shall establish a schedule for meetings and meet in regular session, per that schedule, and, upon the chairman's request or a written notice

---

108. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(b) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(d), at 145.
109. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(c) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(e), at 145.
110. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(c) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 60, § 6(e), at 145.
111. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(e) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(g), at 145.
112. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(e) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(g), at 145.
113. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(e) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(g), at 145.

> signed by a majority, the board shall meet in special session.[114]
>
> (8) An affirmative vote by a majority vote of the members present and voting shall approve the board's actions unless the matter concerns one of the following categories, which requires a majority of the total board membership: bylaws and other rules and regulations, hiring and firing of employees or contractors, incurring of debt, adoption or amendment of the annual budget, or transactions dealing with property with a value of more than $50,000.[115]
>
> (9) Members cannot vote by proxy.[116]
>
> (10) Members may request a recorded vote on any of the land bank or corporation's resolutions or actions.[117]

E. Applicability of State Law and Conflicts

The Tennessee Legislation states that none of the corporation's rules or bylaws may contravene state law, giving deference to pre-existing and future state laws.[118] The Template Legislation,

---

114. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(f) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(h), at 145.

115. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(g) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(i), at 145. New York requires a majority vote of the total board membership to sell, lease, encumber, or alienate any real property, improvements, or personal property. N.Y. NOT-FOR-PROFIT CORP. LAW § 1605(i)(5) (McKinney Supp. 2014). Missouri requires a majority vote of the total board membership to sell real property for a selling price that represents "a consideration less than two-thirds of the appraised value of such property," and to lease, encumber, or alienate "real property, improvements, or personal property" valued more than $50,000. MO. ANN. STAT. § 141.981.6(5) and (6) (West Supp. 2014).

116. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(h) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(k), at 145.

117. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-106(h) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 6(k), at 145.

118. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-107(b) (Supp. 2015).

on the other hand, states that if any provisions of the act conflict with other state law, this act shall prevail, deferring instead to the land bank authority.[119]

The Tennessee Legislation also states that the board and directors are not exempt from the following state laws: ethical obligations for officials and employees, public meetings information, and public records access—these requirements allow for continuing transparency in land banking authorities.[120] These provisions do not appear in the Template Legislation.

The Template Legislation also states that the Act only applies to land banks created pursuant to the Act while the Tennessee Legislation does not contain a related provision, but this distinction has no bearing on Tennessee as its home rule municipalities derive their authority to create land banking statutes only from the Tennessee Legislation.[121]

F. Staffing

The Tennessee Legislation contains a clause allowing the corporation to enter into a contract with the creating local government for the corporation's staffing services.[122] The Template Legislation contains the same clause, but goes further, allowing for a land bank to employ a wide array of staff and for the land bank to enter into a contract to provide staffing to a local government.[123]

G. Powers

Both pieces of legislation contain many of the same powers but also differ regarding certain others. I have placed the powers into three categories: those that are the same in both pieces of legislation; those that exist in both pieces of legislation but contain differences; and those that are exclusive to each piece of legislation.

---

119. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 5, at 144.
120. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-107(c)–(e) (Supp. 2015).
121. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 5, at 144.
122. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-108 (Supp. 2015).
123. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 7, at 146.

1. Identical Provisions

The Tennessee Legislation and the Template Legislation both contain provisions giving the corporation or land bank the power to:

> (1) Adopt, amend, and repeal bylaws;[124]
>
> (2) Sue and be sued in its own name in all civil actions including those related to clearing title;[125]
>
> (3) Adopt and alter a seal;[126]
>
> (4) Enter into contracts and other instruments incidental or convenient to performance of duties and exercise of powers;[127]
>
> (5) Design, develop, or improve real property or interests in its real property;[128]
>
> (6) Fix and collect rents for use of its real property and services provided;[129]
>
> (7) Grant or acquire a license, easement, or lease with respect to its real property;[130]
>
> (8) Enter into limited collaborative relationships with local governments and other entities for the

---

124. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(1) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(a), at 146.

125. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(2) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(b), at 146.

126. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(3) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(c), at 146.

127. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(5) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(g), at 146.

128. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(11)(A) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(m), at 146.

129. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(11)(B) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(n), at 146.

130. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(11)(C) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(o), at 146.

> ownership, management, development, and disposition of its real property;[131] and
>
> (9) Do all other things necessary or convenient to achieve its objections and purposes related to its real property.[132]

Both documents also charge that the land bank or corporation shall not "own, hold, maintain, or manage any real property acquired through eminent domain."[133] These provisions allow for a broad range of powers for the local land banking authority to ensure that it is not limited in its ability to manage properties it has in its possession and ultimately help transform vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties into productive pieces of land. It is also important to note that the lack of eminent domain power reflects the fact that this power rests with other local government bodies and giving this power to the land banking authority could create conflict with these bodies.

2. Different Provisions

The pieces of legislation differ in the following respects:

(1) Borrowing

> a. The Template Legislation allows the land bank to borrow on its own from private lenders, municipalities, the state, or federal government funds.[134]
>
> b. The Tennessee Legislation allows the corporation to borrow funds as may be necessary only with the creating local government's con-

131. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(11)(D) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(p), at 146.

132. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(12) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(q), at 146.

133. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-120 (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(r), at 146.

134. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(d), at 146.

currence.[135] It is likely that this provision was qualified to allow for additional local government oversight for the corporation.

(2) Contracts

a. Both pieces of legislation allow for the corporation or land bank to enter into contracts incidental or convenient to performance of its duties and exercise of its powers but differ in their general contract clauses.

b. The Template Legislation gives the land bank the power to make and execute contracts and other instruments necessary or convenient for it to exercise its powers.[136]

c. The Tennessee Legislation gives the corporation the same power, but limits it to those necessary or convenient to the exercise of powers to acquire, hold, and dispose of its real property.[137]

(3) Insurance and Liabilities

a. The Template Legislation grants the land bank the power to procure insurance against losses in connection with the land bank's real property, assets, or activities.[138]

b. The Tennessee Legislation grants the corporation the power to procure insurance and enter into contracts for indemnity, including but not limited to the following: loss of use and occupancy, death or injury of any person, employer's liability, any act of any member, officer, or

135. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(4) (Supp. 2015).
136. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(i), at 146.
137. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(6) (Supp. 2015).
138. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(j), at 146.

employee in the performance of his or her duties, or any other insurance risk as the board of directors may deem necessary.[139]

(4) Investments

a. The Template Legislation allows for the land bank to invest its money in instruments, obligations, securities, or property with the approval of the Board of Directors, and name and use depositories for its money.[140]

b. The Tennessee Legislation gives the corporation the same power, but limits the investing of money only to investments that are eligible for a municipality or county in the state and limits depositories to a bank or trust company that is a member of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.[141]

(5) Management and Sale of Real Property

a. The Template Legislation grants the land bank the power to enter into contracts for the management of, collection of rent from, or sale of its real property.[142]

b. The Tennessee Legislation allows the corporation to enter into contracts for the management of or sale of its real property as long as they do not violate the definitions clause of the state eminent domain statute.[143]

---

139. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(7) (Supp. 2015).
140. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(k), at 146.
141. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(9) (Supp. 2015).
142. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(l), at 146.
143. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(11) (Supp. 2015).

3. Exclusive Provisions

The Template Legislation contains provisions granting power to the land bank for the following: to issue negotiable revenue bonds and notes,[144] to procure insurance or guarantees from the state or federal government for debt or premium payments,[145] and to enter into contracts and other instruments necessary, incidental, or convenient to the performance of functions by the land bank on behalf of municipalities and their respective agencies or departments and vice versa.[146] The Tennessee Legislation omits these provisions, which allow for the authority to raise money and create a stream of revenue, however, supplants them with a blanket provision. The clause gives the corporation the power to accept donations, contributions, revenues, and capital grants or gifts from an almost unlimited list of entities to carry out its powers and to enter into agreements in connection with the donations, contributions, revenues, and capital grants or gifts.[147] This provision can allow the corporation to accept funding from non-profits or similar entities to ensure its continuing financing and operation.

New York gives the land bank the following additional powers: to inventory vacant, abandoned, and tax foreclosed properties;[148] to subject itself to municipal building codes and zoning laws;[149] and, if acquiring property from a foreclosing governmental unit, to create a redevelopment plan with the approval of that unit[150] and to enter into an agreement with that unit to determine revenue distribution to that unit.[151]

Georgia also gives the land bank additional powers, including the ability: "to acquire, accept, or retain equitable interests, security interest, and other interests in real property, personal property, or fixtures" by financial instruments to secure credit;[152]

---

144. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 8(e), at 146.
145. Id. § 8(f), at 146.
146. Id. § 8(h), at 146.
147. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-109(8) (Supp. 2015).
148. N.Y. NOT-FOR-PROFIT CORP. LAW § 1607(a)(17) (West Supp. 2014).
149. Id. § 1607(a)(19).
150. Id. § 1607(a)(18).
151. Id. § 1607(a)(20).
152. GA. CODE ANN. § 48-4-106(a)(5) (West, Westlaw through 2015 Legis. Sess.).

and "to hold title to real property for purposes of establishing contracts with nonprofit community land trusts, including, but not limited to long-term lease contracts."[153] The Georgia legislation also adds much more detail to the financial powers of the land bank, giving the land bank more robust power in these areas.

H. Acquisition of Property

The acquisition of property is the single greatest power a land banking authority can possess, and in order to be effective, it needs the ability to acquire property from a wide variety of sources, including private landowners and other governmental entities.

The Tennessee Legislation contains most of the related clauses from the Template Legislation, including the authorization to "acquire real property or interests in real property for the land bank by gift, devise, transfer, exchange, foreclosure, purchase" or other appropriate terms;[154] and to acquire real property by contracts and agreements and accept transfers from municipalities in mutually agreed upon terms.[155] Both pieces of legislation require the corporation or land bank to maintain its property according to the laws of the jurisdiction in which the real property is located,[156] and mandate that the corporation or land bank not own or hold real property outside the jurisdictional boundaries of the local government(s) that created it unless under an intergovernmental agreement.[157] Additionally, both allow a transferring municipality to convey to the corporation or land bank real property and interests in real property according to its own terms, conditions, and procedures.[158] The Tennessee Legislation omits the following clause provided in the Template Legislation: "The real property of a

---

153. Id. at (a)(23).

154. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-110(a) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 9(b), at 147.

155. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-110(b) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 9(c), at 147.

156. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-110(c) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 9(d), at 147.

157. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-110(d) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 9(e), at 147.

158. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-110(b)–(c) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 9(c), (f), at 147.

Land Bank and its income and operations are exempt from all taxation by the State and by any of its political subdivisions."[159] Regardless, the broad grant of power to a corporation to acquire and accept property ensures that a corporation can effectively take possession of vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties in almost any manner.

The New York legislation allows the land bank to enter into agreements to purchase real property that is not vacant, abandoned, and tax-delinquent, as long as it is consistent with an approved redevelopment plan.[160] It also requires the land bank to maintain a complete inventory of all property the land bank receives and make that inventory available for public review.[161] If it does not comply with the detailed requirements, that property acquisition becomes null and void.[162]

Pennsylvania also imposes additional requirements and options. First, if the land bank leases real property to a private third party, the property becomes subject to state and local taxes after five years.[163] Additionally, if the land bank leases real property to a nonprofit or governmental agency at less than fair market value, then the property remains exempt from state and local taxes.[164] Second, the legislation allows a tax claims bureau under the states Real Estate Tax Sale Law to transfer real property to the land bank.[165] Third, it gives the land bank the ability, if authorized by the local government that created the land bank, to accept donations of real property and extinguish delinquent taxes for that property under the states Municipal Claim and Tax Lien Law and Real Estate Tax Sale Law.[166]

Missouri adds certain provisions allowing the land bank power at a foreclosure sale. In combination with a different provision of state law, if no bid equal to the total amount of all tax bills, interest, penalties, and attorneys' fees and costs is received after a

159. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 9(a), at 147.
160. N.Y. NOT-FOR-PROFIT CORP. LAW § 1608(g) (West Supp. 2014).
161. Id. § 1608(h).
162. Id. § 1608(h)–(j).
163. 68 PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. § 2109(b)(2) (West Supp. 2013).
164. Id.
165. Id. § 2109 (g).
166. Id. § 2109 (h).

property has been offered for sale at a sheriff's foreclosure sale on three different days, a land bank shall have been deemed to have bid that full amount, and its bid accepted.[167] The legislation also explicitly gives a land bank the power to bid on real estate at a sheriff's foreclosure sale notwithstanding the preceding provision if the real property is located in a low- to- moderate-income area that the land bank has targeted for redevelopment.[168] If a land bank wins the bid at the sale, it only has to pay the amount that its bid exceeds the total amount of all tax bills, principal amount, interest, penalties, and attorneys' fees and costs of the piece of property—the tax collector takes a credit for the remaining amount.[169]

I. Disposition of Property

Related to the acquisition of property, a land banking authority also needs a wide swath of power to dispose of property, including making it available on the open market or converting it to public use by transferring it to a local government. The Tennessee Legislation includes all the disposition provisions from the Template Legislation but makes changes for some of them.

The clauses relating to the following powers of the corporation or land bank are identical in both pieces of legislation: (1) the land bank holds real property in its own name,[170] (2) the land bank "shall determine and set forth in policies and procedures of the board of directors, the general terms and conditions for consideration to be received for transfer of real property and interests,"[171] (3) the local ordinance or resolution establishing the land bank can set a hierarchical ranking of real property use priorities,[172] (4) the local government creating the land bank may subject certain forms of

---

167. MO. ANN. STAT. §§ 141.984.4, 141.560.3 (West Supp. 2014).

168. MO. ANN. STAT. § 141.984.4 (West Supp. 2014).

169. Id. § 141.984.6.

170. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-111(a) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 10(a), at 147. Pennsylvania includes this provision in the acquisition section of its legislation. 68 PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. § 2109(a) (West Supp. 2013).

171. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-111(c) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 10(c), at 147.

172. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-111(e) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 10(e), at 147. Missouri also adds hierarchical priorities for application of proceeds from sales or dispositions for certain types of properties. MO. ANN. STAT. § 141.985.8 to .9 (West Supp. 2014).

disposition of real property to particular board voting and approval requirements,[173] and (5) the board may delegate authority to officers and employees to enter into and execute agreements and other documents related to conveyance of real property held by the land bank.[174] Most notable among these powers is the local government's ability to maintain a higher threshold for the disposition of certain properties, such as school buildings or property surrounding areas with robust development.

The Tennessee Legislation includes a clause from the Template Legislation allowing the corporation to maintain and make available for public review and inspection its real property inventory.[175] It expands this authority to allow the corporation to create an independent, publically available, electronic inventory and make sure that information in the inventory is accurate.[176] The Tennessee Legislation also includes the Template Legislation clause allowing the corporation to convey, exchange, sell, transfer, and do other things with its real property,[177] but it limits this power by stating that it must not violate the definitions clause of the state eminent domain statute.[178] Creating an inventory of the properties a land banking authority holds is vital to ensure that the authority properly indexes the various features of the properties including tax liabilities, title, liens, and other liabilities that the authority must address, and allowing public access to it ensures continuing transparency throughout the perpetuity of the authority.

Missouri adds two interesting provisions in an effort to stimulate disposition. First, a land bank must accept a written offer for purchase that is equal to or greater than the fair market value of

---

173. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-111(f) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 10(f), at 147.

174. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-111(f) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 10(f), at 147.

175. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-111(b) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 10(b), at 147. It is important to note that New York breaks this requirement into two separate categories. The first category is for all property the land bank receives. N.Y. NOT-FOR-PROFIT CORP. LAW § 1608(h)–(j) (West Supp. 2014). The second category is for all property of which the land bank disposes. Id. § 1609(b), (g), (h).

176. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-111(b) (Supp. 2015).

177. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-111(d) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 10(d), at 147.

178. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-111(d) (Supp. 2015).

the real property.[179] If it rejects such an offer, or does not respond to it within sixty days, its action or inaction is subject to judicial review unless the reason for its rejection is that it has accepted another offer that is equal to or greater than the property's fair market value.[180] Second, if the land bank owns more than five pieces of real property that are in a single city block and has not received a written purchase offer for any of them within the past twelve months, it must reduce the requested price for them and publicly advertise the new price.[181]

J. Open Meetings and Records

The Tennessee Legislation contains the public records clause from the Template Legislation, that the board shall keep minutes and a record of all of its proceedings.[182] It expands this to allow for timely public inspection of all of the board's minutes and records.[183]

The Tennessee Legislation adds four clauses not found in the Template Legislation relating to its public access to its records. First, the board must publish an annual report of the corporation's activities for the creating local government and make it available to public inspection.[184] Second, the board must have an annual audit of the corporation's books and records performed.[185] The corporation must pay for the audit, and the state comptroller of the treasury must assure audit compliance with its own and other government standards.[186] Third, if the board fails to have an audit prepared, the comptroller can direct that an audit be performed.[187]

---

179. MO. ANN. STAT. § 141.985.7 (West Supp. 2014).

180. Id.

181. Id. § 141.985.10.

182. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-112(a) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 13, at 149. The other states in our survey have similar provisions, and reference public meetings laws in their respective states. See generally GA. CODE ANN. § 48-4-111(a) (West, Westlaw through 2015 Legis. Sess.); MO. ANN. STAT. § 141.997 (West Supp. 2014); N.Y. NOT-FOR-PROFIT CORP. LAW § 1612(a) (McKinney Supp. 2014); 68 PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. § 2113(b) (West Supp. 2013).

183. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-112(a) (Supp. 2015).

184. Id. § 13-30-112(b).

185. Id. § 13-30-112(c).

186. Id.

187. Id. § 13-30-112(d).

Fourth, a copy of the annual audit must be filed with the creating local government.[188]

K. Dissolution

The Tennessee Legislation does not contain the extensive dissolution provision from the Template Legislation.[189] Rather it states that the creating local government can establish the procedure for dissolution, or that the corporation can be dissolved per the general law for public corporation dissolution.[190] The Template Legislation's section states the following: (1) once two-thirds of the board membership approves dissolution, the land bank can be dissolved after sixty days;[191] (2) the land bank must give sixty calendar days advance written notice of consideration of the resolution for dissolution to the local government that created the land bank, publish it in a local newspaper of general circulation, and send it by certified mail to the trustee of any outstanding bonds of the land bank;[192] (3) upon dissolution, all assets will become assets of the local government that created the land bank;[193] (4) if two or more local governments created the land bank, the withdrawal of one does not dissolve the land bank unless the intergovernmental agreement provides for such and no local government wants to continue the land bank's existence.[194] Tennessee's deferential provision here reflects the fact Tennessee and other states have various procedures for dissolving or terminating public corporations and related entities.

L. Conflicts of Interest

The Tennessee Legislation's conflict of interest provision mimics the one from the Template Legislation, prohibiting (1) a board member or employee of the land bank from acquiring any

---

188. Id. § 13-30-112(e).

189. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 14, at 149.

190. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-113 (Supp. 2015).

191. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 14, at 149.

192. Id.

193. Id. In Georgia and Pennsylvania, these assets become the property of the local government unit in which they are located. GA. CODE ANN. § 48-4-111(c)(3) (West, Westlaw through 2015 Legis. Sess.); 68. PA. STAT. AND CONS. STAT. ANN. § 2114(c) (West Supp. 2013).

194. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 14, at 149.

direct or indirect interest in real property acquired or held by the land bank, and (2) a board member or employee of the land bank from having any direct or indirect interest in any contract or proposed contract for services or materials for the land bank.[195] They both also allow the board to adopt additional rules and regulations regarding conflicts of interest and ethics.[196]

M. Construction of Legislation

The construction clause of the Tennessee Legislation is identical to that in the Template Legislation; they both hold that the land banking act shall be construed liberally so as to allow for legislative intent to be broad and so that powers of the land bank shall not be limited.[197] Again, this is important to allow the corporation to utilize effectively its broad range of powers.

N. Property Taxes

The Template Legislation discusses property taxes in two sections. First, a clause under the Financing section states, "[f]ifty percent of the real property taxes collected on real property conveyed by a Land Bank pursuant to the laws of the State shall be remitted to the Land Bank."[198] It goes on to state that this allocation shall commence with the first taxable year after conveyance and continue for five years.[199] The Tennessee Legislation does not contain this clause.

Second, in its Delinquent Property Tax Enforcement Section, the Template Legislation contemplates allowing the land bank to discharge and extinguish delinquent taxes on properties it owns, participate in tax foreclosures and tax lien sales, and allow for bulk tax foreclosures.[200] The Tennessee Legislation does not include

---

195. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-114 (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 15, at 149.

196. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-114 (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 15, at 149.

197. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-115 (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 17, at 150.

198. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 11(c), at 148.

199. Id.

200. Id. § 18, at 150. It is important to note that a review of the other states in our survey has not been included for the property taxes and title sections as the powers vary widely and an analysis of the differences would require any provisions allowing for these powers; instead, it adds other provisions. First, it states that the corporation is exempt from state taxation.[201] Second, it gives the corporation the power to pay unpaid taxes due and owing and make government mandated improvements to the property in exchange for the real property deed.[202] Third, it states that the corporation shall receive all proceeds from the sale of the corporation's real property.[203] Fourth, it mandates that the board should hold all corporate revenue and that proceeds shall go only to helping with the acquisition or resale of real property by the corporation.[204] While the Template Legislation contemplated this power to remedy the tax-delinquency of properties, the Tennessee Legislation presents a different approach to achieving the same goal.

O. Action to Quiet Title

The Tennessee Legislation provisions on actions to quiet title are mostly similar to the ones in the Template Legislation.[205] First, both allow for the land bank to file an action to quiet title for any real property in which the land bank has an interest.[206] Second, both also require that prior to filing such an action, the land bank must examine the title to determine if there are any other entities that have a claim or interest in or to the real property.[207] Third, they outline various methods for service of the complaint to quiet title,[208] with the Tennessee Legislation only adding the following method: electronically published notices with addresses and descriptions on the municipality's website.[209] Fourth, they both re-an entirely separate piece evaluating both the respective land bank statutes and the other states' property taxes and title sections.

---

201. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-116(a) (Supp. 2015).

202. Id. § 13-30-116(b).

203. Id. § 13-30-116(c).

204. Id. § 13-30-116(d).

205. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-117 (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 19, at 150.

206. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-117(a) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 19(a), at 150.

207. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-117(b) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 19(b), at 150.

208. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-117(b)(1)–(6) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 60, § 19(b)(1)–(5), at 150.

209. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-117(b)(5) (Supp. 2015).

quire that the land bank file an affidavit identifying all parties that might have an interest in the real property.[210] Fifth, they state that the court must schedule a hearing within 90 days after the complaint's filing and must issue a judgment within 120 days of the filing.[211] This ability to clear any cloud on the title is essential to making the property an attractive target once placed back onto the open market and ensuring its future vitality.

P. Appeals

The Tennessee Legislation adds a section on appeals that is not present in the Template Legislation. The provisions allow for the following and appear to create a public grievance hearing mechanism:

> (1) The creating local government must establish an appeal procedure for any person who is aggrieved by the corporation's decisions with respect to real property.[212]
>
> (2) The creating local government's legislative body can create an appeals committee.[213]
>
> (3) The aggrieved person can obtain review of an official's decision by submitting a written form to the appeals committee within ten days of the official's decision.[214]
>
> (4) The appeals committee must hear the appeal within thirty days of the written request.[215]
>
> (5) The appeals committee must render a decision on the appeal within thirty days of the hearing, un-

---

210. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-117(c) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 19(c), at 150.

211. Compare TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-117(d) (Supp. 2015), with TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 19(d), at 150.

212. TENN. CODE ANN. § 13-30-118(a) (Supp. 2015).

213. Id. § 13-30-118(b).

214. Id.

215. Id. § 13-30-118(c).

> less the committee, by majority vote, continues the hearing for further information.[216]
>
> (6) The appeals committee must act as a quasi-judicial body and is not bound by the formal rules of evidence.[217]
>
> (7) The appeals committee must follow a detailed trial-like procedure when considering appeals and the committee's decision on the appeal is final.[218]

Q. Comptroller Authority

The Tennessee Legislation contains two additional provisions relating to monitoring of the corporation by the comptroller of the treasury that are not present in the Template Legislation. First, the comptroller must monitor the corporation for three years after its creation.[219] Second, after the three years, the comptroller must file a report with the government and other state officials with recommendations on whether the land bank pilot project should be continued, expanded, discontinued, or whether some related potential legislative actions should be taken.[220] The comptroller's oversight maintains a semblance of state level monitoring of the financial stability of the local corporations that will be created under the legislation.

R. Other Sections

The Tennessee Legislation does not contain the following sections from the Template Legislation: Financing of Land Bank Operations,[221] Borrowing and Issuance of Bonds[222] (likely because under the Tennessee Legislation, the corporation does not have the power to issue bonds), Land Bank Creation in a Natural Disaster,[223] and Effective Date.[224] These are not of serious concern,

---

216. Id. § 13-30-118(d).
217. Id. § 13-30-118(e).
218. Id. § 13-30-118(f).
219. Id. § 13-30-119(a).
220. Id. § 13-30-119(b).
221. TEMPLATE, supra note 64, § 11, at 148.
222. Id. § 12, at 148–49.
223. Id. § 16, at 149.

however, because the Tennessee Legislation addresses financing for the corporation, the most significant of these omissions, in other sections.[225]

V. EXISTING LAND BANKS IN TENNESSEE

What is the current status of land banking in Tennessee? I now discuss various land banking efforts in the state, of which there are only a few. Oak Ridge, the beneficiary of the Pilot Legislation, has one active land bank entity. Chattanooga has set up the framework for a land bank but it is still in its nascent stage, and the Memphis City Council recently passed a resolution for the creation of a land banking authority. No other local governments are using land banking, and, as Part II illustrates above, this is problematic.

A. Oak Ridge

The Oak Ridge City Council passed an ordinance on September 19, 2013 to create the Oak Ridge Land Bank Corporation.[226] Specifically, the ordinance states that the Oak Ridge Land Bank Corporation is created "pursuant to the authority of the Tennessee Local Land Bank Pilot Program set forth in Tennessee Code Annotated § 13-30-101 et seq."[227] The ordinance, for the most part, mimics the Tennessee Legislation—it acknowledges the findings of the Tennessee Legislation as the basis of establishing the Corporation;[228] it gives the Corporation many of the powers allowed for in the Tennessee Legislation including the ability to acquire land, file actions to quiet title, and to dispose of land; it maintains the tax-exempt status of the Corporation and its properties;[229] and it provides an organizational structure including a board of directors, meeting and voting requirements, and annual reporting that are similar to those laid out in the Tennessee Legislation.[230]

---

224. Id. § 20, at 150.
225. See supra text accompanying note 144.
226. Oak Ridge, Tenn., Ordinance 08-2013 (Sept. 19, 2013), http://oakridgetn.gov/images/uploads/Documents/Ordinances/2013/8-2013.PDF.
227. OAK RIDGE, TENN., CODE OF ORDINANCES tit. 13, ch. 6, § 13-603.
228. Id. § 13-602.
229. Id. § 13-606 to -607.
230. Id. § 13-604 to -605.

The ordinance allowed for the automatic transfer of twelve city-owned properties to the Corporation by quitclaim deed without further city council action.[231] The Corporation received $25,000 in funding from the city in 2013, and $20,000 in 2014.[232] It used these funds to start a bank account, create a 501(c)(3) non-profit organizational structure, and pay administrative costs associated with establishing a nonprofit organization.[233] Before the initial transfer of twelve properties from the City to the Corporation in January of 2014, the City demolished the structures on all but one of these pieces of property.[234] Throughout 2014 and 2015, the City continued to demolish structures on additional properties, and then transferred those properties to the Corporation.[235]

The Corporation has used various approaches for these properties. It renovated the structure on one of the properties in partnership with a private contractor, and after placing the property back on the market, sold it within five days.[236] The Corporation also donated two properties to the Aid to Distressed Families of Appalachian Counties organization, a local non-profit that provides assistance to low-income individuals, for it to build moderate to low-income housing.[237] It also sold two properties to a private citizen on the open market for owner-occupied dwelling.[238] As of January 1, 2016, the Corporation holds twenty properties and is partnering with a real estate agent to sell certain properties.[239] It is also looking for a private contractor/investor interested in developing a number of the properties together, including some which are about to be transferred to the Corporation.[240]

Matt Widner, the Oak Ridge Housing Specialist, who also acts as the city government staff liaison to the Land Bank Corpora-

---

231. Oak Ridge, Tenn., Ordinance 08-2013 § 4 (Sept. 19, 2013), http://oakridgetn.gov/images/uploads/Documents/Ordinances/2013/8-2013.PDF.
232. Telephone Interviews with Matt Widner, Oak Ridge Housing Specialist, City of Oak Ridge, Tenn. (Aug. 10, 2015 and Jan. 19, 2016).
233. Id.
234. Id.
235. Id.
236. Id.
237. Id.
238. Id.
239. Id.
240. Id.

tion, has indicated that when the Corporation began its operations, it did not have the money to purchase properties. As the Corporation grows, it will be seeking out new partnerships with local financial institutions for lines of credit and developers for development of the properties it possesses. He has also stated that the Corporation could acquire more properties if the tax foreclosure system were modified to allow the Corporation the first right of refusal for foreclosed properties and other allowances before they are put on the open auction market. This way the Corporation can become more robust and closer to fulfilling its ultimate purpose of ridding the city of vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties.[241]

B. Chattanooga

Chattanooga, a city in the eastern part of the state on the state's southern border, has established the legal authority for a land bank. The Chattanooga City Council adopted a resolution on February 17, 2015 to create the Chattanooga Land Bank Authority.[242] The council created the Land Bank Authority "to provide a tool to support economic revitalization through returning vacant, abandoned and tax-delinquent properties to productive use."[243] The resolution cites to the Tennessee Legislation for the legal authority to establish the Land Bank Authority and then states that "land bank" means the following: "real property, however obtained or acquired and held by the Chattanooga Land Bank Authority, with the intent of acquiring and holding onto the real property so acquired until such time as the Corporation is able to find a willing and able buyer to acquire the real property from the Corporation."[244] It grants the Land Bank Authority to have all the powers stated under the Tennessee Legislation and a proposed Land Bank Authority charter.[245] It also, under the purview of Tennessee Legislation, holds that because the Land Bank Authority is performing

---

241. Id.
242. Chattanooga, Tenn., Res. 28152 (Feb. 17, 2015), http://www.chattanooga.gov/city-council-files/OrdinancesAndResolutions/Resolutions/Resolutions%202015/28152%20Approving%20Land%20Bank%20Authority%20Charter-FINAL.pdf.
243. Id.
244. Id.
245. Id.

a public function for the city, it and all of the properties it owns or holds in its name and the income and revenues from the those properties are tax-exempt.[246]

Development on the land banking authority is continuing. The resolution calls for the authority to apply to the Secretary of State for a certificate of incorporation.[247] The Authority filed for incorporation on March 26, 2015, and was granted a perpetual charter.[248] The Authority though has not yet established a board and has not acquired or received any property. The City appears to be simply taking the steps necessary to establish the land banking authority, but it is too early to tell how the Land Banking Authority will operate—it first needs a leadership structure in place and then properties.

C. Memphis and Shelby County

Shelby County is Tennessee's largest county and encompasses and surrounds Memphis, Tennessee's largest city. Under the Tennessee Legislation, only the City of Memphis has the authority to create a land banking authority, not Shelby County. As the figures above in Part II demonstrated, however, Memphis and its surrounding metropolitan area, which includes all of Shelby County, are in dire need of a land bank.

Shelby County currently has a land bank, but for our purposes it is a local government entity with extremely limited power that the county government has labeled a "land bank"—it does not fit the traditional definition of a land bank and the label is a misnomer.[249] Rather, the Shelby County Land Bank acts simply as a repository for tax-delinquent property by taking possession of it and selling it. It does not remove redemption rights, does not quiet title, and does not take any other action with regards to the property it is selling. The entity really only publishes a monthly list of

---

246. Id.

247. Id.

248. Business Entity Detail: Chattanooga Land Bank Authority, TENN. SEC'Y OF STATE, https://tnbear.tn.gov/ecommerce/FilingDetail.aspx?CN=115127067121067100086060115253158172184169057002 (last visited Aug. 1, 2015).

249. Land Bank, SHELBY CTY, TENN., https://landbank.shelbycountytn.gov/aboutus (last visited May 16, 2016).

available properties and interested buyers can contact it directly to purchase the property at a reasonable purchase price.[250]

Memphis recently took the first steps to establish a corporation of the type contemplated under the Tennessee Legislation. On November 3, 2015, the Memphis City Council approved a resolution to establish the Blight Authority of Memphis, Inc.[251] Similar to the Chattanooga resolution, this resolution derives the authority to create a local corporation from the Tennessee Legislation.[252] It defines "land bank" as "real property, however obtained or acquired and held by the Blight Authority of Memphis, Inc., with the intent of acquiring and holding onto the real property so acquired until such time as the corporation is able to find a willing and able buyer to acquire the real property from the corporation, pursuant to the Tennessee Local Land Bank Program."[253] It also grants the corporation all of the powers provided in the Tennessee Legislation, and makes tax-exempt the corporation and all of its properties as well as any income and revenue from its properties.[254]

The resolution also authorized the corporation to apply for a certificate of incorporation.[255] The corporation applied for such on November 23, 2015, and the state granted it a perpetual charter.[256] This development is a positive step for Memphis, and for the entire state. A land banking entity in the largest city in the state not only has wide and positive implications for the entire area, but also, assuming it continues its progression and is successful, presents an opportunity to illustrate the importance of such a tool for other local governments throughout the state.

---

250. Id.

251. Memphis, Tenn., Resolution Authorizing Establishment of the Blight Authority of Memphis, Inc. ("BAM") (Nov. 3, 2015), http://www.memphistn.gov/Portals/0/pdf_forms/Memphis_City_Council_resolution_102815.pdf.

252. Id.

253. Id.

254. Id.

255. Id.

256. Business Entity Detail: Blight Authority of Memphis, Inc., TENN. SEC'Y OF STATE, https://tnbear.tn.gov/ecommerce/FilingDetail.aspx?CN=043103072235254112086243139185138013047232175054 (last visited May 16, 2016).

VI. CONCLUSION

Land banks present an innovative approach to combatting and solving the problem of vacant, abandoned, tax-delinquent, and foreclosed properties across the state including, but not limited to, smaller cities in the eastern portion of the state and the biggest in the west. Local governments who have the state authority to develop land bank authorities should adopt the necessary measures to create their land banking authorities. They also should devote the appropriate monetary and non-financial resources to make them robust entities with real power to face this problem. Only if local land banking authorities are given the essential powers to affect change in their communities can they "return" these properties to their cities and make them integral parts of their communities once again.

Revitalizing Urban Cities: Linking the Past to the Present

A. MECHELE DICKERSON*

I. INTRODUCTION 973
II. URBAN BLIGHT: DEFINED 975
A. Physical Characterization 975
B. Social Definition 978
III. CREATING AND PERPETUATING BLIGHT: FEDERAL AND STATE LAWS AND POLICIES 979
A. Discriminatory Laws, Practices, and Policies 980
B. Zoning Laws 983
C. Public Housing 984
IV. CREATING AND PERPETUATING BLIGHT: PRIVATE ACTORS 987
A. Urban Landlords 987
B. Suburban White Flight 989
C. Lenders 990
V. TRADITIONAL MUNICIPAL RESPONSE TO URBAN BLIGHT 994
A. Eminent Domain 995
B. Urban Renewal 996
1. Slum or Blight Removal Programs 996
2. Urban Renewal: Economic Development 1000
VI. INNOVATIVE URBAN RENEWAL 1002
A. Preserving Neighborhoods 1002
B. Sharing Revitalization's Benefits 1006
VII. CONCLUSION 1008

I. INTRODUCTION

Many neighborhoods in U.S. cities still have not recovered from the housing crisis that triggered the 2007–2009 recession. Urban neighborhoods throughout the country continue to exhibit characteristics of "blight" and struggle to attract commercial investments. While there is no precise definition of blight, most blighted neighborhoods have dilapidated and vacant residential and commercial properties, have high crime rates, and lack desirable community amenities like high-quality schools or parks.[1] Starting in the 1940s, cities used federal funds provided by urban renewal or slum clearance plans to clear blighted neighborhoods. Though these policies often succeeded in removing blight from the neighborhood, they also destroyed intact communities, forced lower-income (and often black or Latino) residents out of their neighborhoods, and shifted the blight to other neighborhoods. Most urban renewal plans continue to focus on demolishing older, deteriorated property and recent urban revitalization efforts have led to the gentrification of cities and the displacement of lower- and middle-income residents from those cities.

This Article considers the current challenges urban cities are facing with blighted neighborhoods and urges city leaders who are developing remedies for blighted neighborhoods to avoid repeating the mistakes of the past. Part II of the Article discusses "urban blight" and explains how the term can be used to justify the destruction of lower-income, but likely sustainable, communities. Part III then shows how federal, state, and local housing and transportation policies in this country helped create and perpetuate urban ghettoes for black residents.

Part IV explores the role that private actors, including banks and the fabled urban slumlords, play in creating blighted neighborhoods. Specifically, this Article discusses how high-cost and high-risk subprime loans were disproportionately made to borrowers in black and Latino neighborhoods and why these discriminatory lending policies ultimately caused the higher foreclosure rates in these communities. The Article also examines data that reveal that, after the recession, lenders failed to market abandoned homes in black and lower-income neighborhoods as aggressively as they marketed homes in white neighborhoods and that this behavior has continued to contribute to depressed home values in neighborhoods with abandoned properties.

---

* Arthur L. Moller Chair in Bankruptcy Law and Practice, The University of Texas at Austin School of Law. I would like to thank the editors of the University of Memphis Law Review for asking me to participate in the Urban Revitalization: The Legal Implications of Remaking a City Symposium.

1. See ARTHUR D. LITTLE, INC., U.S. DEP'T OF HOUS. & URBAN DEV., H-1299, A STUDY OF PROPERTY TAXES AND URBAN BLIGHT 72–73 (1973).

Part V of the Article presents the methods cities have typically used to respond to blighted neighborhoods. From the end of the 1940s until the 1970s, most cities used federal funds provided for in "slum clearance programs" to condemn, then destroy, decaying, vacant, or abandoned residences and commercial buildings in lower-income neighborhoods. Cities continue to implement urban renewal policies and rely on those policies to destroy deteriorated buildings, especially if the buildings are in neighborhoods that are near the city's central business district.

The Article ends by urging policymakers to remember how blighted neighborhoods are created and maintained and how lower-income residents are often displaced and economically harmed when the policymakers implement policies to remove blighted conditions in their cities. Because lower- and middle-income residents are generally the ones who are harmed the most when cities destroy decaying residences, the Article specifically urges cities to include affordable and innovative housing solutions like land trusts in their renewal plans and to decrease the number of lower-income blacks and Latinos who are displaced during the city's revitalization.

II. URBAN BLIGHT: DEFINED

A. Physical Characterization

Urban blight is not a new phenomenon. There have been blighted neighborhoods (which historically were called slums)[2] in cities for more than a century.[3] Since at least the middle of the twentieth century, a wide range of federal housing policies and programs have attempted to eliminate urban blight. For example, the national housing policy for the United States, as stated in 42 U.S.C. § 1441, notes:

---

2. Anthony Downs, Local Regulations and Housing Affordability, in REGULATING PLACE: STANDARDS AND THE SHAPING OF URBAN AMERICA 109 (Eran Ben-Joseph & Terry S. Szold eds., 2005) ("In reality, America has always depended upon overcrowded and often deteriorated slums to accommodate its poorest urban dwellers, and we still do. But we do not like to admit it, so we pretend the word slums is obsolete.").

3. ALEXANDER VON HOFFMAN, HOUSE BY HOUSE, BLOCK BY BLOCK: THE REBIRTH OF AMERICA'S URBAN NEIGHBORHOODS 8 (2003) (stating that many Americans accepted urban blight as an inevitable part of life).

> The Congress declares that the general welfare and security of the Nation and the health and living standards of its people require housing production and related community development sufficient to remedy the serious housing shortage, the elimination of substandard and other inadequate housing through the clearance of slums and blighted areas, and the realization as soon as feasible of the goal of a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family, thus contributing to the development and redevelopment of communities and to the advancement of the growth, wealth, and security of the Nation.[4]

Although revitalizing blighted areas and clearing slums may be a stated national housing priority, there is no one definition of blight.

Blight has been described as a "vague, amorphous term" and a "rhetorical device" that lets governing bodies deem "certain real estate dangerous to the future of the city."[5] Though blight cannot be precisely defined, laws, renewal programs, and housing policies use similar terms when discussing blight. For example, a 1938 Harvard regional planning department study that examined blighted areas and slums in U.S. cities defined blight communities as those > where, as a result of social, economic, or other conditions, there is a marked discrepancy between the value placed upon the property by the owner and its value for any uses to which it can be put, appropriate to the public welfare, under existing circumstances. This discrepancy prevents or handicaps the improvement of the area. Old buildings are ne-

4. 42 U.S.C. § 1441 (West 2012) (emphasis added).
5. Wendell E. Pritchett, The "Public Menace" of Blight: Urban Renewal and the Private Uses of Eminent Domain, 21 YALE L. & POL'Y REV. 1, 3 (2003).

> glected and new ones are not erected and the whole section becomes stale and unprofitable.[6]

This study contends that a "slum is relatively easy to locate and define" because of the "general agreement that it is an area in which the housing is so unfit as to constitute a menace to the health and morals of the community, and that the slum is essentially of social significance."[7]

The federal government has defined "blighted neighborhoods" as areas with low or sinking property values,[8] and cities and political leaders view blighted areas as dangerous to the "safety, health, morals and comfort" of the people who live in those blighted neighborhoods.[9] Blighted areas are characterized by the presence of physically deteriorated or vacant buildings, and those buildings (both residential and commercial) often have high occupancy turnover or vacancy rates.[10] In addition to the sub-standard dwellings that are typically found in blighted neighborhoods, the public schools and other local amenities (parks, etc.) in those areas also tend to be dilapidated.[11] In addition, blighted areas are often overcrowded and have little open or green space, and blighted

---

6. MABEL L. WALKER, URBAN BLIGHT AND SLUMS: ECONOMIC AND LEGAL FACTORS IN THEIR ORIGIN, RECLAMATION, AND PREVENTION 6 (1938).

7. Id. at 3; see also United States Housing Act of 1937, Pub. L. No. 75-412, 50 Stat. 888 (1937) ("The term 'slum' means any area where dwellings predominate which, by reason of dilapidation, overcrowding, faulty arrangement or design, lack of ventilation, light or sanitation facilities, or any combination of these factors, are detrimental to the safety, health, or morals.").

8. ARTHUR D. LITTLE, INC., supra note 1, at 11.

9. WALKER, supra note 6, at 3.

10. See id. at 15 ("[T]he most valid criteria for determining [blighted areas] location would be . . . falling land values (over a long period); detrimental shifts of business or population . . . failure to make or maintain improvements over extended period; [and] substandard housing.").

11. See 24 C.F.R. § 570.208(b) (2007). Conversely, homes and apartments that are located near highly rated schools are higher quality and charge higher rent. See Marty Toohey, Rents, School Quality Linked, AUSTIN AMERICAN-STATESMAN (Dec. 28, 2015), http://www.pressreader.com/usa/austin-american-statesman/20151228/281487865318383/TextView.

communities also are likely to have known (or suspected) environmental contamination.[12]

B. Social Definition

Though the buildings in blighted neighborhoods often share similar physical characteristics and blighted neighborhoods lack business investments, there is also a social dimension to blight. To some extent, blight is based on perceptions of the value or worth of the people or businesses that are in the neighborhood.[13] For example, poor people live in blighted neighborhoods and this could cause policymakers to conclude that poverty causes blight.[14] In addition to socio-economic status, there is also a racial component to urban blight.[15] That is, while not all residents of blighted neighborhoods are non-white, most neighborhoods that are designated as (or likely will become) blighted consist of black and Latino residents.[16] Because most renewal programs are designed to clear

---

12. See ARTHUR D. LITTLE, INC., supra note 1, at 19. A report prepared on behalf of the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development notes that blighted neighborhoods "are characterized by a large proportion of sub-standard and vacant dwellings; mixed residential, commercial, commercial and/or industrial use; relatively low rent levels; high densities and minority population." Id.

13. See Micheal Carriere, Fighting the War against Blight: Columbia University, Morningside Heights, Inc., and Counterinsurgent Urban Renewal, 10 J. PLAN. HIST. 5, 13 (2011). Carriere noted the contradiction that "common spaces and many individual apartment units within the building (even those marked for eviction) were well maintained," notwithstanding the fact that the building was deemed blighted because Columbia University sought to demolish the building to make space for additional campus buildings. Id.

14. See WALKER, supra note 6, at 23 ("Poverty and blight are not always synonymous. Poverty is, however, a potent factor in translating the blighted area into a slum. To attribute blight solely or essentially to poverty is largely to dodge the issue.").

15. See Carriere, supra note 13, at 11 (describing efforts to remove urban blight near the Columbia University campus and noting that "there was a definite racial component to Columbia's urban renewal strategies in the postwar era, as the battle to contain blight often seemed to become a battle to contain the population of nonwhite community members").

16. Miriam Hortas-Rico, Sprawl, Blight, and the Role of Urban Containment Policies: Evidence from U.S. Cities, 55 J. REGIONAL SCI. 298, 308 (2015) ("The higher the crime rate or the poverty level, and the higher the proportion of black and Hispanic residents, the greater the level of blight.").

blight in low-income, predominately black or Latino areas that are deemed economically underutilized,[17] these programs frequently result in displacing minority residents.[18] Once the area is redeveloped, the new neighbors are almost always richer and whiter than the displaced residents, and the low-income displaced residents typically move to another blighted, and usually segregated, area.[19]

Because blight is so racially coded, what some people might view as a blighted, dangerous, and economically underutilized neighborhood, others may view as a working class but valuable close-knit community that could be rehabilitated for current residents if city leaders were willing to invest adequate resources in the neighborhood. Since municipalities have wide discretion in determining whether an area is blighted, "blight" is often whatever the governing body says it is. In most cases, existing residents generally can do little to prevent their neighborhoods from being "revitalized" even if they are forced out of their revitalized neighborhood.

III. CREATING AND PERPETUATING BLIGHT: FEDERAL AND STATE LAWS AND POLICIES

Urban blight is not inevitable, nor does it develop overnight. Since the 1930s, federal, state, and local housing policies

---

17. For example, the Morningside Heights, Inc. was founded in 1947 "to wage a war on urban blight" in the Harlem/Morningside Heights community in New York City. See Carriere, supra note 13, at 10. The group's charge was to develop a plan that would improve and redevelop Morningside Heights and make that neighborhood "an attractive residential, educational, and cultural area." Id.

18. Pritchett, supra note 5, at 6 ("By selecting racially changing neighborhoods as blighted areas and designating them for redevelopment, the urban renewal program enabled institutional and political elites to relocate minority populations and entrench racial segregation."); see also Alison Gregor, Crown Heights, Brooklyn, Gets Its Turn, N.Y. TIMES (July 4, 2014), http://www.nytimes.com/2014/07/06/realestate/crown-heights-brooklyn-gets-its-turn.html (addressing a housing advocate's concern that private equity firms have bought older rent-regulated buildings in Crown Heights and were in the process of driving out lower-income tenants).

19. Pritchett, supra note 5, at 6; Derek S. Hyra, Conceptualizing the New Urban Renewal: Comparing the Past to the Present, 48 URB. AFF. REV. 498, 512 (2012).

and practices have helped create blight in low-income, particularly ethnic and black, neighborhoods. While not all lower-income neighborhoods are blighted, housing and transportation policies that created neighborhoods with higher concentrations of poverty helped create many of the conditions that lead to urban blight. In addition, federal housing and transportation policies that could have prevented low-income neighborhoods from becoming blighted frequently were not implemented because of political leaders' often biased views concerning changing demographics and economic conditions in lower-income neighborhoods.

A. Discriminatory Laws, Practices, and Policies

Racially discriminatory laws and practices in the last century created many of the racially segregated and blighted neighborhoods in this country. For example, during the "Great Migration" at the end of the 1800s and first few decades of the 1900s, poor rural blacks fled the racially hostile and violent post-Civil War South and moved to northern cities. They were not welcomed in urban neighborhoods when they arrived, and instead, were often confronted by hostile property owners and unsupportive local leaders.[20] For example, political leaders relied on nuisance laws and racially-restrictive public zoning laws to keep blacks (and lower-income residents) in overcrowded urban ghettoes. These race-restrictive zoning laws, which the United States Supreme Court later ruled to be unconstitutional,[21] kept blacks out of white neighborhoods by designating who could live in any given neighborhood.

When city leaders could no longer use race-restrictive zoning laws to keep blacks in lower-income racially segregated neighborhoods, white homeowners, private realtors, and real estate developers, with the implicit support of the federal government, then changed the tactics they used to create and maintain overcrowded, blighted, and racially segregated neighborhoods. Some white residents used violence to scare and keep blacks out of their neighborhoods or convince them to leave if they had moved in the all-white neighborhood.[22] Other white homeowners used racially restrictive covenants in deeds to keep their neighborhoods racially segregated. These covenants[23] provided that owners could not sell or lease their property to blacks and, like race-restrictive zoning laws, ultimately were ruled unconstitutional in the Supreme Court's 1948 holding in Shelley v. Kraemer.[24]

---

20. A. Mechele Dickerson, Sorting the Neighborhood, 93 TEX. L. REV. 179, 181 (2014) (reviewing RICHARD R. W. BROOKS & CAROL M. ROSE, SAVING THE NEIGHBORHOOD: RACIALLY RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS, LAW, AND SOCIAL NORMS (2013)).

21. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60, 82 (1917).

In addition to race-restrictive zoning laws and private covenants, the Federal Housing Administration ("FHA") had policies in the 1930s and 1940s that virtually ensured that blacks could not move into suburban neighborhoods.[25] Specifically, because the FHA refused to insure loans for blacks or for anyone who wanted to purchase homes in racially mixed or homogeneous black neighborhoods,[26] lenders would not approve mortgage loans for

22. Dickerson, supra note 20, at 181.

23. RICHARD R. W. BROOKS & CAROL M. ROSE, SAVING THE NEIGHBORHOOD: RACIALLY RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS, LAW, AND SOCIAL NORMS 80 (2013). Examples of restrictive covenants have been collected by the Seattle Civil Rights and Labor History Project. See Racial Restrictive Covenants, SEATTLE CIVIL RIGHTS & LABOR HISTORY PROJECT, http://depts.washington.edu/civilr/covenants.htm (last visited Apr. 18, 2016). Four neighborhoods shared the following racial-restrictive covenant: "No person of any race other than the white race shall use or occupy any building or any lot, except this covenant shall not prevent occupancy by domestic servants of a different race domiciled with an owner or tenant." Id.

24. 334 U.S. 1, 20–21 (1948).

25. The FHA was authorized by the National Housing Act and was created to insure residential mortgages, supervise mortgage associations, and regulate low-income housing projects. See WALKER, supra note 6, at 323–24 (discussing role of FHA in low-income housing projects).

26. To ensure that no blacks would be allowed to buy any home (whether in a black or white neighborhood) using an FHA-insured loan, the FHA required lenders to provide information about the borrower's characteristics. In addition, to be sure that no buyer would use an FHA-loan to buy a house in a non-white neighborhood, the FHA required lenders to provide corroborating reports about neighborhood characteristics from third-parties (inspectors, examiners, appraisers, etc.) and the FHA refused to accept an appraiser's report unless the report revealed whether the neighborhood was racially mixed or, if the neighborhood currently was all-white, whether the neighborhood was at risk of being "infiltrated" or "invaded" by blacks or immigrants. See A. MECHELE DICKERSON, HOMEOWNERSHIP AND AMERICA'S FINANCIAL UNDERCLASS: FLAWED PREMISES, BROKEN PROMISES, NEW PRESCRIPTIONS 148–49 (2014).

blacks.[27] Because blacks could not be approved for low-cost FHA-insured loans, it was virtually impossible for them to buy homes in suburban white neighborhoods. Likewise, until the 1950s, the FHA underwriting manual encouraged builders to include racially restrictive covenants in the suburban subdivisions they were building, and developers also used subtle racial cues (like advertising that the homes met the FHA standards and could be purchased with a low-cost FHA-insured loan) to signal that the subdivisions were racially-exclusive.[28]

Federal housing laws ultimately banned all of these racially discriminatory lending and real estate practices.[29] Nonetheless, many of the neighborhoods that were "contained and constrained by public and private devices of exclusion and confinement" had been formed.[30] Although federal and state laws and policies can no longer force blacks to live in racially segregated neighborhoods, cities have used other methods, including exclusionary zoning

---

27. Lenders relied on a rating system that was created by the federal Home Owners' Loan Corporation ("HOLC"). This rating system gave suburban neighborhoods that were predominately all-white the highest "A" rating and these neighborhoods were shaded green on lending maps. All-black urban neighborhoods received the lowest ranking of D and were shaded red, which gave rise to the term redlining. Because the federal government and the real estate industry deemed homes in ethnically or racially integrated urban neighborhoods to be unstable and unsafe, redlining made it virtually impossible for blacks to receive low-cost and federally-insured mortgage loans. Id. at 146–49. In a 1962 Executive Order, President John F. Kennedy made redlining illegal. This Order banned federal agencies that insured or guaranteed housing loans from discriminating in the sale or rental of property based on race and also outlawed housing discrimination by lenders who originated mortgage loans insured by the federal government. Exec. Order No. 11,063, 27 Fed. Reg. 11,527 (Nov. 20, 1962).

28. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at 148.

29. The Fair Housing Act makes it illegal to refuse to sell or rent, or otherwise make unavailable or deny housing to any person on the basis of race. 42 U.S.C. § 3604 (2013).

30. LEONARD S. RUBINOWITZ & JAMES E. ROSENBAUM, CROSSING THE CLASS AND COLOR LINES: FROM PUBLIC HOUSING TO WHITE SUBURBIA 18 (2000); see also Tex. Dep't. of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs v. Inclusive Cmtys. Project, Inc., 135 S.Ct. 2507, 2515 (2015) (discussing discriminatory housing and lending policies and noting that "[b]y the 1960's, these policies, practices, and prejudices had created many predominantly black inner cities surrounded by mostly white suburbs").

laws, to keep public housing and other affordable housing in low-income urban areas and out of higher-income neighborhoods.

B. Zoning Laws

Once the United States Supreme Court deemed comprehensive zoning laws to be a constitutionally valid limitation on private property rights in Euclid v. Ambler Realty,[31] cities used zoning laws to keep multi-family housing out of neighborhoods that primarily consist of owner-occupied, single-family homes. In this 1926 ruling, the Court allowed cities to deem apartment buildings to be public nuisances and to exclude multi-family housing from residential districts because these units could monopolize "the rays of the sun which otherwise would fall upon the smaller homes."[32] In addition, the Court referred to apartment houses as "parasites" and concluded that cities could segregate single-family homes from multi-unit housing to ensure that homeowners were not deprived of the "free circulation of air" and that their children could continue to have "quiet and open spaces for play."[33]

While cities no longer characterize apartments or public housing tenants as parasites, facially race-neutral land use laws continue to make it hard for lower-income households to move out of older, decaying urban neighborhoods. For example, local planning commissions have adopted rules and regulations (or wealthy voters have voted in favor of zoning laws) that exclude affordable, multi-family housing (like mobile homes and public housing complexes) from single-family neighborhoods.[34] Likewise, land use laws in subdivisions in suburban neighborhoods require developers to build homes that have a minimum lot size, and zoning laws may also limit the number of people who can live in a home. The stated purpose of these zoning laws is to preserve the character of the neighborhood, but the laws are also designed to exclude lower-

31. 272 U.S. 365, 397 (1926).
32. Id. at 394.
33. Id.
34. Bernard H. Siegan, The Benefits of Non-Zoning, in REGULATING PLACE: STANDARDS AND THE SHAPING OF URBAN AMERICA, supra note 2, at 219–20 (noting that black, Latinos, and low- and moderate-income voters typically vote against zoning laws).

income residents from certain subdivisions and keep them trapped in urban, blighted neighborhoods.[35]

C. Public Housing

Most urban cities started to build large public housing units in the 1930s and 1940s. While federal funds have almost always been used to finance public housing, local housing boards or authorities are responsible for managing public housing and typically have wide discretion to determine the number, type, and location of public housing.[36] Many of these early public housing units were erected as part of the New Deal Public Works Administration's efforts to reinvigorate an economy that was devastated by skyrocketing foreclosure rates and record high unemployment during the Great Depression.[37] These early public housing units were designed to provide shelter for low-income, working-class residents

---

35. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at 185–86; Eran Ben-Joseph, Facing Subdivision Regulations, in REGULATING PLACE: STANDARDS AND THE SHAPING OF URBAN AMERICA, supra note 2, at 175–76; see also Alana Semuels, How to Decimate a City, THE ATLANTIC (Nov. 20, 2015), http://www.theatlantic.com/business/archive/2015/11/syracuse-slums/416892/ (discussing how a two-acre minimum lot size prevents low-income residents in Syracuse from leaving decaying urban neighborhoods and moving to suburban neighborhoods).

36. Lisa Redfield Peattie, Public Housing: Urban Slums Under Public Management, in RACE, CHANGE AND URBAN SOCIETY 301 (Peter Orleans & William Russell Ellis, Jr. eds., 1971). Federal public housing projects had historically been used as tools to modify residents' behavior and improve the "social usefulness" of low-income tenants. Lawrence J. Vale, Standardizing Public Housing, in REGULATING PLACE: STANDARDS AND THE SHAPING OF URBAN AMERICA, supra note 2, at 71. For example, units generally were 2–3 bedrooms in part to discourage "the cultural preferences of immigrant groups" who lived multi-generationally. Id. at 70. Housing staff also refused applications from potential tenants who cohabitated without marriage and for couples who had out-of-wedlock children. Id.

37. See Peattie, supra note 36, at 300–01. A major goal of Public Works Administration projects was to help reduce unemployment and stimulate economic activity during the Depression. See WALKER, supra note 6, at 347 (discussing urban planning policies in the 1930s and noting that "[f]ederal interest in housing in this country appears to be distinctly a by-product of the depression. Slum clearance and housing were seized upon by the National Government as a means of creating employment and stimulating industry.").

and typically consisted of high-density, high-rise apartment complexes located in urban neighborhoods.[38]

Some housing advocates argued that working-class housing should be sited in suburban neighborhoods which, at that time, were less populated. While suburban land could be purchased for cheaper than land in urban areas at the time, most public housing projects during the Depression era were built in urban areas because of a desire to link urban renewal with affordable housing.[39] Moreover, because cities could use these federal funds to clear "slums," leaders preferred to build public housing projects in urban areas that formerly contained older, dilapidated tenement housing.[40]

Like homeowner-occupied neighborhoods, public housing projects have almost always been racially segregated.[41] Public housing projects are more likely to be placed in lower-income and predominately non-white neighborhoods because of the political clout higher-income homeowners exert when they learn of proposed zoning changes.[42] That is, based in part on what they perceive as their privileges as property owners, homeowners routinely lobby against proposed zoning changes that would permit affordable housing—including housing projects or mixed-income apartments—to be built in their neighborhoods.[43] They seek to exclude

38. See Vale, supra note 36, at 72.

39. See id. at 69–77.

40. Slum clearance projects were enormously profitable with real estate investors, often mortgage companies, after the Depression because these private entities were seeking ways to rid themselves of underperforming real estate. See Pritchett, supra note 5, at 23.

41. See Peattie, supra note 36, at 286–87.

42. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at 186–87.

43. Downs, supra note 2, at 107 ("[T]he more public policy emphasizes homeownership, the more it leads to NIMBY (Not-in-my-backyard!) resistance to affordable housing by suburban homeowner majorities."). Homeowners in upper-income neighborhoods also fight attempts to place socially useful but undesirable properties like half-way housing, homeless shelters, and group homes in their neighborhoods because of concerns that those properties may depress the values of their homes. For example, when the City of Dallas, Texas, sought to place a home for chronically homeless people in public housing units, neighbors mobilized to defeat the plan citing safety risks to school children and arguing that the presence of homeless residents in their neighborhood would depress property values. Kim Horner & Roy Appleton, Oak Cliff Opposition affordable housing from their neighborhoods and place that housing in other neighborhoods based on their view that multi-family housing would change the character of their community, increase traffic, affect the academic rating or performance of their neighborhood schools, increase congestion, and depress their home values.[44]

Concentrating public housing units in low-income, racially segregated neighborhoods has, not surprisingly, caused both public and private low-income housing to experience rapidly decay.[45] One reason public housing units have deteriorated is because there has always been limited public support for increasing funding to repair or upgrade affordable housing projects for lower-income residents.[46] In addition, public housing projects stopped expanding once urban redevelopment programs began to encourage private developers to create low-income housing.[47] Once low-income housing units (whether publicly- or privately-owned) start to deteriorate, the housing becomes undesirable, vacancy and turnover rates rise, and in turn, deterioration of the housing units accelerates.[48]

Shows Why Supportive Permanent Housing in Dallas is Still a Tough Sell, DALLAS MORNING NEWS (June 13, 2010), http://www.dallasnews.com/news/community-news/dallas/headlines/20100613-Oak-Cliff-opposition-shows-why-supportive-8560.ece.

44. LEEANN LANDS, THE CULTURE OF PROPERTY: RACE, CLASS, AND HOUSING LANDSCAPES IN ATLANTA, 1880–1950, 210–15 (2009).

45. Peattie, supra note 36, at 287.

46. See generally Marc Bussanich & Jarrett Murphy, Protest as City Auctions Land Despite Housing Need, CITYLIMITS.ORG (Oct. 30, 2015), http://citylimits.org/2015/10/30/protest-as-city-auctions-land-despite-housing-need/ (discussing New York City's sale of lands for private ownership despite the housing needs). The Mayor of New York City has proposed building mixed-income housing in a public housing project in order to generate more revenue for the city's public housing authority. Mireya Navarro, In Chelsea, a Great Wealth Divide, N.Y. TIMES (Oct. 23, 2015), http://www.nytimes.com/2015/10/25/nyregion/in-chelsea-a-great-wealth-divide.html.

47. Vale, supra note 36, at 92.

48. Peattie, supra note 36, at 297.

IV. Creating and Perpetuating Blight: Private Actors

A. Urban Landlords

Most low-income housing in urban areas is privately owned. A common myth associated with urban blight is that absentee "slumlords" who own the private housing units help perpetuate the blighted conditions by allowing their rental properties to deteriorate. In the myth of the urban slumlord, the absentee landlord purchases property with the goal of extracting "the maximum possible cash flow from the property," making an above-market return on the property, and then selling the property to a tenant or abandoning the property if there is no available buyer.[49] According to the myth, because the property owners (especially if they are not the same race as the tenants) often do not live in the low-income properties they rent,[50] they make only the repairs that are required by applicable housing regulations or the minimal expenditures they need to attract tenants.[51]

While some urban landlords fit the profile of the slumlord,[52] not all owners of low-income housing in urban areas are slumlords.[53] Indeed, research indicates that some owners choose not to make major improvements to their properties because they are concerned that they would need to raise rents and displace

---

49. Arthur D. Little, Inc., supra note 1, at 86, 88. See generally George Sternlieb & Robert W. Burchell, Residential Abandonment: The Tenement Landlord Revisited 53–55 (1973) (discussing the "myth" of the urban slumlord).

50. A study of Newark low-income housing found black owners are five times more likely to live in their rental properties than whites who owned rental property in low-income neighborhoods. Sternlieb & Burchell, supra note 49, at 102–03.

51. Arthur D. Little, Inc., supra note 1, at 88.

52. For example, a 1938 planning report that examined blighted neighborhoods throughout the U.S. criticized municipal agencies for failing to promptly respond to decaying housing ("old disease breeders and fire traps") and for allowing owners "to derive profit by renting them to the public long after they have become a menace to the community." Walker, supra note 6, at 82, 111.

53. In addition, while the property owner in the myth of the urban slumlord is often assumed to be white, a study of low-income housing in Newark found that both the landlord and tenants of many rental homes are black. Sternlieb & Burchell, supra note 49, at 97–133.

long-term tenants to recoup their investment in the property.[54] Likewise, some owners stop making repairs or doing major maintenance on their properties because they are elderly and can no longer do or afford the repairs needed to rehabilitate the building.[55] Some landlords ultimately decide to abandon their properties for pure economic reasons.

Landlords who conclude that the cost to repair their properties to meet applicable building code requirements exceeds their anticipated rate of return (based on the rents they can collect for the units)[56] often choose to allow their properties to deteriorate. In addition, some urban landlords abandon their rental property because of high crime rates, vandalism, and worries that those factors make it unlikely they will ever be able to sell the property.[57] Similarly, owners who believe the city will condemn the property have little incentive to repair their dilapidated housing units if they have concluded that making any additional repairs would be economically senseless.[58] In addition, owners sometimes abandon rental properties in deteriorating neighborhoods if they conclude that the neighborhood has become so dangerous that they no longer feel safe going to their properties to make repairs (or even to collect rent).[59] Regardless of the reason landlords choose to neglect or abandon rental properties, dilapidated or vacant private rental properties contribute to urban blight, and the presence of those properties destroy the value of all homes in the neighborhood.[60]

---

54. STERNLIEB & BURCHELL, supra note 49, at 69–71.

55. STERNLIEB & BURCHELL, supra note 49, at 76 ("The facts of age frequently play a role in the abandonment of a unit.").

56. ARTHUR D. LITTLE, INC., supra note 1, at 106–07. While tenants might be willing to pay the cost of amenities that make their rental housing secure, they likely are not willing to pay the cost the landlord incurs to bring the rental unit up to code. Id. at 93.

57. STERNLIEB & BURCHELL, supra note 49, at 298–93.

58. Id. at 291; see also Pritchett, supra note 5, at 22 (suggesting that some landlords during the post-depression era became "increasingly amenable to condemnation as a means to exit a failing market. Where they once opposed any government regulation, landlords now wanted to be 'bailed out' of their troubled investments.").

59. STERNLIEB & BURCHELL, supra note 49, at 137–41.

60. Id. at 53.

B. Suburban White Flight

As older neighborhoods in many urban cities deteriorated during the early part of the twentieth century, federal transportation policies and laws created and funded the national system of interstate highways. Having a comprehensive four-lane highway system in the 1940s made it easier for white residents to flee from urban cities to live in the suburbs but return daily to work in the city.[61] Once whites abandoned urban neighborhoods, real estate developers then focused on building homes in the suburbs.[62] Eventually, jobs followed whites to the suburbs, and since the turn of the twenty-first century, job growth in suburban areas has been five times faster than job growth in urban areas.[63]

Many cities used federal funds to create comprehensive highway systems in the 1950s that razed—or split in half—urban, predominately black communities.[64] Blacks could not leave the decaying urban areas by purchasing and moving to suburban homes because of redlining,[65] because of realtors steering blacks away from white neighborhoods,[66] and because of other discriminatory housing policies that existed until the 1960s. Likewise,

---

61. See Tex. Dep't of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs v. Inclusive Cmtys. Project, Inc., 135 S. Ct. 2507, 2511 (2015) ("Rapid urbanization, concomitant with the rise of suburban developments accessible by car, led many white families to leave the inner cities. This often left minority families concentrated in the center of the Nation's cities.").

62. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at 152–53; Pritchett, supra note 5, at 14.

63. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at 153.

64. See Semuels, supra note 35 (describing a close-knit community in Syracuse that was split in half by highway construction).

65. Generally speaking, redlining divided neighborhoods into colors based on their perceived stability. The race of the homeowners was used to categorize and rate neighborhood stability, safety, and desirability. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at 146–47. The phrase "redlining" arose because black neighborhoods (which received the lowest ranking) were coded red while upper-income white neighborhoods were shaded blue on the rating maps. Dickerson, supra note 20, at 184; see also infra Section IV.C (discussing the effects of reverse redlining).

66. Tex. Dep't of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs, 135 S. Ct. at 2515 ("[S]teering by real-estate agents led potential buyers to consider homes in racially homogenous areas."); Dickerson, supra note 20, at 184 (discussing how white realtors steered black clients away from white neighborhoods to preserve racially segregated neighborhoods).

blacks were trapped in decaying urban areas because realtors routinely refused to rent properties in white neighborhoods to blacks.[67] Even now, low-income black and Latino residents cannot escape from blighted urban neighborhoods because there are virtually no public housing projects in suburban neighborhoods and because many landlords still resist renting to tenants whose rent will be paid in part with a Section 8 housing voucher.[68]

C. Lenders

Foreclosure rates nationwide hit record highs during the recession, and urban cities with large black or Latino populations (including Memphis) were hit especially hard. One reason cities like Memphis and Baltimore had such high foreclosure rates is because of reverse redlining, i.e., the practice of steering borrowers to certain products based on their race. Studies found that lenders systematically steered black and Latino borrowers to higher cost and higher risk subprime loans which—because of the cost and risks—have higher rates of foreclosure. One study found that these higher cost loans accounted for fifty-one percent of refinance loans in predominately black neighborhoods but only nine percent of subprime refinance loans in white neighborhoods.[69] Similarly, more than fifty percent of all loans blacks received to buy homes and forty percent of the loans Latinos received were subprime loan products, while only eighteen percent of the loans whites used to purchase homes were high-cost subprime loans.[70]

Many minority and lower-income neighborhoods that were hit particularly hard by foreclosures during the recession still have not recovered. A 2014 study found that home prices in black and Latino neighborhoods were still depressed and that a disproportionate percentage of homeowners in those neighborhoods were at risk of losing their homes because they were "underwater," i.e.,

---

67. See Dickerson, supra note 20, at 184–86.

68. Tex. Dep't of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs, 135 S. Ct. at 2514 (discussing that segregated housing patterns exist in predominantly black inner-city areas because of the allocation of low income tax credits in those areas rather than predominantly white suburban neighborhoods); see also Semuels, supra note 35 (describing the obstacles blacks in urban Syracuse neighborhoods encounter when they try to move out of high-poverty neighborhoods).

69. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at ch. 7.

70. Id.

they owed more on their mortgages than the homes are worth.[71] Property owners who have underwater mortgages and assume they might lose their home in a foreclosure sale may perceive that they have little financial stake in those homes, which may give them less of an incentive to properly maintain their homes.

There are often signs of blight in neighborhoods that consist of homes where owners have little economic incentive to perform or pay for routine maintenance on the homes or where there are homes that were sold in a foreclosure or short sale. Homes in these neighborhoods often have overgrown lawns, have broken windows, are in a visibly deteriorated condition, and sit abandoned until the bank completes the foreclosure process or a new owner buys the home. In addition, data consistently show that neighborhoods with a high percentage of foreclosed homes or with rental properties that are abandoned by absentee landlords have higher rates of crime (including arson, prostitution, and looting), and the homes themselves are often used to commit crimes.[72] In addition, vacant and deteriorated homes in some urban cities have been occupied by homeless people, are often stripped bare both inside and outside of anything of value, and even attract wild animals.[73]

In addition to the disproportionate number of high-cost subprime loans that were steered to lower-income neighborhoods, evidence shows that banks and lenders treat the homes they foreclose on and own, i.e., Real Estate Owned ("REO"), differently depending on where the REO properties are located. That is, a report found that banks, lenders, and investors were far less likely to allow foreclosed properties in predominately black and Latino neighborhoods to become (or remain) in disrepair than properties in white neighborhoods.

---

71. HAAS INST. FOR A FAIR AND INCLUSIVE SOC'Y, UNDERWATER AMERICA 5 (2014), http://diversity.berkeley.edu/sites/default/files/HaasInsitute_UnderwaterAmerica_PUBLISH_0.pdf.

72. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at ch. 8. One group of "investors" who purchased foreclosed homes at bottom rock prices used the homes to grow marijuana plants. Norimitsu Onishi, Foreclosed Houses Become Homes for Indoor Marijuana Farms, N.Y. TIMES (May 6, 2012), http://www.nytimes.com/2012/05/07/us/marijuana-growers-move-to-the-suburbs.html.

73. Meghan Hoyer & Matthew Jones, Urban Blight, Investors Buy, Abandon Properties as Part of Profit Plan, Data Show, VIRGINIAN PILOT (July/Aug. 2007).

REO properties in black and Latino neighborhoods were more likely to exhibit visible signs of blight, including chipped paint, broken fences, or broken or boarded-up windows. Homes in those neighborhoods also were more likely to have trash strewn on the property and overgrown (or dead) lawns. Similarly, those REO homes were frequently left unlocked, which encourages thefts from the unsecured homes and also encourages people to engage in criminal activities inside the homes.[74] In contrast, REO homes in white neighborhoods were more likely to have manicured lawns and be securely locked.[75] Finally, the study further found that foreclosed properties in black and Latino neighborhoods were more likely to be vacant and abandoned for longer periods than homes in white neighborhoods and were less likely to have "For Sale" signs in the yards than homes in white neighborhoods.[76]

While not all current blight in urban neighborhoods was caused by discriminatory lending practices, there are negative economic consequences to living in a neighborhood that is littered with deteriorated and abandoned buildings. Real estate agents are less likely to show homes that show signs of blight to clients who seek to live in the home. As a result, it is less likely that properties with substandard maintenance will be purchased by an owner-occupant and more likely that the buyer will be investors who seek to use the homes as rental property.

Vacant and deteriorated homes and buildings in a neighborhood impose costs on other homeowners because the blighted properties depress the value of all other properties in the neighborhood. Specifically, homes that are sold in a foreclosure or short

---

74. See MICHAEL BONDS, RACE, POLITICS, AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT FUNDING: THE DISCOLOR OF MONEY 33 (2004) ("[In Milwaukee], the property listings in largely African-American and integrated neighborhoods were only half as likely to be advertised . . . and only one-fourth were as likely to have an open house relative to homes in white neighborhoods.").

75. NATIONAL FAIR HOUSING ALLIANCE, THE BANKS ARE BACK—OUR NEIGHBORHOODS ARE NOT: DISCRIMINATION IN THE MAINTENANCE AND MARKETING OF REO PROPERTIES 18 (2012), http://www.nationalfairhousing.org/portals/33/the_banks_are_back_web.pdf; Danielle Douglas, Wells Fargo Settles Complaint on Foreclosed Homes, WASH. POST (June 6, 2013), http://www.washingtonpost.com/business/economy/wells-fargo-settles-complaint-on-foreclosed-homes/2013/06/06/18e55954-ce24-11e2-9f1a-1a7cdee20287_print.html.

76. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at ch. 8.

sale, especially abandoned blighted homes, are almost always sold at a discount. Homes sold at a discount depress the market value of other homes in the neighborhood largely because appraisers assess the value of homes based partially on recent sales of comparable homes in the neighborhood.[77] Thus, properties sold at below market prices depress the market values and selling prices of all homes located near those properties even when the existing owners have taken care of and maintained their homes. These lower selling prices make it harder for owners to sell their homes for a profit or to use their homes as collateral for a loan. Finally, vacant and blighted properties in neighborhoods generally prevent the functioning of a stable housing market as tenants and businesses are less willing to move into blighted neighborhoods.[78]

Higher foreclosure rates and depressed home values do more than just harm individual homeowners. Depressed home values also reduce municipal real estate tax revenue, which accounts for about 75% of local tax revenue.[79] In addition, cities with vacant properties also incur additional costs in the form of additional police, fire, and other public safety services related to these vacant properties. Moreover, because cities often try to prevent blight from spreading and they seek to encourage economic activity in blighted areas, cities often incur costs to preserve property values in blighted neighborhoods. For example, cities have demolished uninhabitable abandoned properties and paid maintenance costs for habitable properties. However, because of lower tax revenues, some cities found they simply could not afford the cost of maintaining abandoned properties.[80]

---

77. W. Scott Frame, Estimating the Effect of Mortgage Foreclosures on Nearby Property Values: A Critical Review of the Literature, FED. RES. BANK OF ATLANTA 5–7 (2010); Dan Immergluck & Geoff Smith, The Impact of Single-Family Mortgage Foreclosures on Neighborhood Crime, 21 HOUSING STUD. 851, 851–66 (2006).

78. ARTHUR D. LITTLE, INC., supra note 1, at 106–07.

79. Mark Niquette & Tim Jones, Foreclosure Deal May Help States Prop Up Budgets, Raze Homes, BLOOMBERG.COM (Feb. 13, 2012, 6:52 AM), http://www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2012-02-13/foreclosure-windfall-may-help-u-s-states-prop-up-budgets-raze-houses; Shaila Dewan, A City Invokes Seizure Laws to Save Homes, N.Y. TIMES (July 29, 2013), http://www.nytimes.com/2013/07/30/business/in-a-shift-eminent-domain-saves-homes.html.

80. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at 169.

Some municipalities that were particularly hit hard by foreclosures threatened to use their eminent domain powers to seize underwater mortgages if the investors who owned the mortgages refused the city's offer to buy the loans at an amount that roughly equals the fair market value of the home. If investors refused the city's offer to purchase the loan at lower than face value, the city threatened to reduce the principal loan balance and then resell the reduced mortgages to new investors (or refinance the now lower amount with a government-backed loan).[81] Other cities, including Memphis, responded to revenue losses and blighted vacant homes by suing the banks who engaged in reverse redlining.[82]

Memphis and other cities sued Wells Fargo Bank and alleged that it steered minority borrowers to higher-cost subprime loans even though many of those borrowers could have qualified for lower-cost and lower-risk loans.[83] The cities argued that these lending practices resulted in disproportionately high foreclosure rates and caused property values and municipal tax revenues to plummet because of the number of homes in neighborhoods that had vacant foreclosed homes. Wells Fargo ultimately settled the claims the City of Memphis filed against it by investing more than $400 million in loans to help generate economic development.[84]

V. TRADITIONAL MUNICIPAL RESPONSE TO URBAN BLIGHT

In general, cities respond to deteriorating or blighted neighborhoods by seeking to repair, demolish, or transfer ownership of properties in the area to third party investors who agree to remove the blight or restore the decaying properties. Just as federal funds were used to build public housing units, cities (including Memphis) have used federal funds to demolish decaying public

---

81. Ian Urbina, Foreclosures Prompt Cities to Make Plea for Aid, N.Y. TIMES (Jan. 24, 2008), http://www.nytimes.com/2008/01/24/us/24mayors.html. Some states used funds they received as part of the national foreclosure settlement against lenders to demolish abandoned and dilapidated homes. Niquette & Jones, supra note 79; Dewan, supra note 79.

82. Creola Johnson, Symposium, Fight Blight: Cities Sue to Hold Lenders Responsible for the Rise in Foreclosures and Abandoned Properties, 2008 UTAH L. REV. 1169, 1186–92 (2008).

83. DICKERSON, supra note 26, at 169–70.

84. Id. at ch. 7.

housing projects.[85] While destroying dilapidated low-income housing will help revitalize blighted neighborhoods, a consistent consequence of blight removal is the displacement of low-income residents, who are typically pushed to another blighted neighborhood.[86]

A. Eminent Domain

Originally, localities used their eminent domain power to condemn land that would be used to construct government buildings, highways, or public utilities. Since at least the 1920s, government agencies have also used their eminent domain police powers to condemn vacant or structurally unsound buildings.[87] Once buildings are deemed to be blighted and to endanger the public safety, health, or welfare, the buildings or entire areas can be treated as a public nuisance, and the governing body can order owners to repair or destroy the buildings.[88] If owners refuse to (or are unable to) comply with an abatement order, the city can use its police powers to clear the blighted buildings or areas[89] (as long as private

85. Hyra, supra note 19, at 504.

86. Peattie, supra note 36, at 300–01; Hyra, supra note 19, at 510 (discussing research that considers whether public housing tenants who are displaced from housing projects receive any positive benefits from the displacement).

87. Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26, 32 (1954). Eminent domain is provided for in the United States Constitution and is also authorized by statutes or constitutions in most states. See U.S. CONST. amend. V (private property cannot "be taken for public use, without just compensation"); Kellen Zale, The Government's Right to Destroy, 47 ARIZ. ST. L.J. 269, 293–94 (2005); See, e.g., TEX. CONST. art. I, § 17 ("No person's property shall be taken, damaged, or destroyed for or applied to public use without adequate compensation being made.").

88. Pritchett, supra note 5, at 25 (noting that slums were deemed to be a public nuisance, urban renewal efforts that ordered them to be destroyed would be a valid use of a city's eminent domain powers).

89. A 1938 urban planning report notes cities' traditional response to dilapidated housing:

> A very effective method of getting rid of bad housing is to demolish it. In most cities there are ordinances of rather long standing authorizing one or more city departments . . . to notify an owner when a building is in an unsafe condition. If the owner sees fit neither to remedy the condition nor to demolish the building, the city official may order demolition at the expense of the owner.

owners are paid for the taking of their property) if the blight poses health or safety risks to other citizens, decreases tax revenues, or decreases the values of neighboring properties.[90]

B. Urban Renewal

1. Slum or Blight Removal Programs

Since Congress passed the Housing Act of 1949, cities have developed and implemented urban renewal programs to revitalize blighted areas in neighborhoods near the business districts of major U.S. cities. Urban renewal programs in the mid-twentieth century used war-like terminology to describe the need to fight blight, and even today, political leaders often refer to blight as an infectious disease that must be eliminated before it spreads to other areas of the city.[91] Cities typically use their redevelopment authorities or agencies to develop urban planning policies, and for a number of reasons, those policies almost always are designed to condemn then destroy blighted properties.

Cities often seek to destroy dilapidated housing projects and relocate lower-income residents away from the urban core because blight is viewed as "geographically contagious" and "detrimental to the well-being of people living in or near such areas"[92] and because buildings in blighted areas generate little tax revenue but have higher needs for police and social services. Blighted

---

WALKER, supra note 6, at 132.

90. Zale, supra note 87, at 291–92.

91. For example, efforts to renew the Morningside Heights/Harlem neighborhood in Manhattan in the 1950s characterized blight as "a parasite that was able to infect a healthy host body" and urged the need to contain blight and prevent it from spreading to (and infecting) the Columbia University campus. Carriere, supra note 13, at 11. Likewise, in announcing plans to demolish 4,000 buildings in Baltimore, the mayor was quoted as saying that "[f]ixing what is broken in Baltimore requires that we address the sea of abandoned, dilapidated buildings that are infecting entire neighborhoods." Patrick Clark, Can we Fix American Cities by Tearing them Down?, BLOOMBERG EXPRESS (Jan. 13, 2016, 11:42 AM), http://www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2016-01-13/can-we-fix-american-cities-by-tearing-them-down-; see also William J. Collins & Katharine L. Shester, Slum Clearance and Urban Renewal in the United States, 5 AMER. ECON. J. 239, 240 (2013) ("Proponents of urban renewal believed that blight was rooted in powerful negative externalities and was therefore 'contagious.'").

92. Collins & Shester, supra note 91, at 243.

neighborhoods are viewed as a "drain on public resources, and both a cause and consequence of middle-class flight and local governments' fiscal problems."[93] Given these concerns, urban renewal programs have focused on reinvigorating central city business districts, making decaying cities become more economically viable[94] and encouraging white upper- and middle-class suburbanites to return to cities.[95]

Cities have often relied on federal funds to remove blight. Until the end of the 1970s, virtually all major urban renewal programs in the country were financed using funds provided by federal housing acts.[96] While not all urban renewal programs are funded totally with federal funds, cities continue to receive grants from the federal government to remove blight from their communities. For example, to create more housing in downtown areas, housing authorities in Memphis and other major cities used federal funds provided by the Hope VI program to demolish decaying public housing projects and replace them with mixed-income housing.[97] Likewise, housing authorities used federal Community Development Block Grants ("CDBG") and federal funds provided by the HOME Investment Partnership Program to rebuild infrastructure in urban areas and to create affordable housing for lower- and moderate-income households.[98]

After the 2007–2009 recession, cities used funds from HUD's Neighborhood Stabilization Program to demolish or rehabilitate abandoned properties. The U.S. also allowed states to use money they received from the Hardest Hit Fund to demolish dete-

---

93. Id.

94. Hyra, supra note 19, at 502 ("Urban renewal was a downtown preservation and minority containment revitalization strategy.").

95. For example, New York City suffered a population loss of almost one million people in the 1970s. The population of the city has consistently increased since the 1980s, which has now exacerbated housing unaffordability concerns for lower-income New Yorkers. State of New York City's Housing and Neighborhoods—2014 Report, NYU FURMAN CTR. (2014), http://furmancenter.org/files/sotc/NYUFurmanCenter_SOCin_2015_4MAY2016.pdf.

96. See Hyra, supra note 19, at 503; VON HOFFMAN, supra note 3, at 8–14 (2003) (discussing slum clearance programs).

97. Hyra, supra note 19, at 504.

98. For an overview of the CDBG program and how some politicians misuse CDBG funds by allocating them in a racially discriminatory manner, see BONDS, supra note 74, at 14–22, 75–89.

riorated, vacant residences.[99] The Hardest Hit Fund was originally created to provide funds to help homeowners prevent foreclosures. The large number of abandoned residences and buildings in some states caused the U.S. to allow a few states with high foreclosure rates to use Hardest Hit Fund allocations to demolish blighted properties and prevent those properties from harming the value of neighboring residences and also to decrease burglary, theft, and vandalism in blighted areas.[100]

Urban renewal programs have always been controversial. Some property rights scholars contend that these programs allow cities to encroach on individual property owners' rights and force owners into involuntary sales at prices that may be less than market value.[101] Other critics argue that the programs displace poor residents, destroy cohesive and viable neighborhoods, and are biased in favor of modern facilities over older or historic structures because newer facilities can provide more tax revenues for cities. Urban renewal or revitalization programs are also controversial because of the wide discretion they give municipalities when they are determining whether a building is blighted or merely old.

Some critics suggest that the inherent biases of urban renewal programs and the officials who administer these programs cause buildings or entire neighborhoods to arbitrarily be deemed blighted.[102] As long as there is a reasonable difference in opinion

---

99. CHRISTY L. ROMERO, OFF. SPECIAL INSPECTOR GEN., TREASURY SHOULD DO MUCH MORE TO INCREASE THE EFFECTIVENESS OF THE TARP HARDEST HIT FUND BLIGHT ELIMINATION PROGRAM 12, 14–15 (Apr. 21, 2015), https://www.sigtarp.gov/Audit%20Reports/SIGTARP_Blight_Elimination_Report.pdf.

100. Clark, supra note 91. See generally Zale, supra note 87, at 271 (detailing the number of demolished properties in Cleveland, Buffalo, and Detroit).

101. Collins & Shester, supra note 91, at 240, 248 (listing criticisms of urban renewal programs); Pritchett, supra note 5, at 21 (observing that blighted areas often "supported viable businesses and provided affordable housing to working class persons" but were deemed to not be "profitable enough" because they failed to produce sufficient tax revenues for cities or "profit opportunities for those who most coveted the land").

102. See Eric R. Claeys, Don't Waste a Teaching Moment: Kelo, Urban Renewal, and Blight, 15 J. AFF. HOUS. & COMM. DEV. L. 14, 16 (2005) (suggesting that cities can deem homes to be "deteriorating or detrimental by laying a paper trail to document broken windows and frayed porch screens, or by citing the fact that the houses were more than twenty years old").

about whether an area is blighted, cities can almost always deem a neighborhood or property as blighted and use their eminent domain powers to condemn and destroy private land. Because there is no clear definition of blight, one housing advocate has suggested that if the only tool cities have to address blight is a hammer, then "everything looks like a nail."[103]

Urban renewal programs can order the destruction of private property even if the existing landowners disagree that their properties are substandard or pose health risks to the community.[104] While destroying decaying buildings may revitalize the neighborhood or make redevelopment more likely, deeming old homes and buildings in lower-income neighborhoods to be blighted in order to pave the path for the construction of newer housing and trendy businesses often ignores the value that the existing (but soon-to-be-displaced) lower- and working-class residents might place in their neighborhood. Perhaps the biggest criticism of urban renewal programs, though, is that they have a disproportionately negative impact on racial minorities.

Most areas that have been deemed blighted have been in ethnic neighborhoods.[105] Some urban renewal projects have provided jobs for some black residents and cities like Detroit and Baltimore have "greened" some of the vacant lots, and allowed them to become parks.[106] Generally speaking, though, urban renewal generally has negative economic effects for black residents whose communities are razed or, in some instances, split in half by highway projects and once public or low-income housing is destroyed, cities rarely rebuild affordable housing units on the vacant land. Instead, displaced residents typically are forced to find other low-

---

103. Clark, supra note 91.

104. See generally Semuels, supra note 35 (observing that black residents fondly viewed the Syracuse neighborhood as a "close-knit black community that socialized around Wilson Park, a square of green grass and trees in the center of town" while whites viewed the predominately black neighborhood as a slum that was "ripe for redevelopment because of its proximity to downtown").

105. See Pritchett, supra note 5, at 20 ("Ethnic prejudice underlay much of the analysis of blighted areas . . . .").

106. For example, Detroit destroyed over 3,000 homes and used some of the vacant lots for storm water control. Clark, supra note 91. Baltimore, which intends to destroy up to 16,000 vacant homes, may ultimately build affordable housing on those lots but initially will convert the vacant lots into parks. Id.

income housing or are relocated to public housing in other lower-income, predominately black neighborhoods.[107] In short, although slum or blight clearance programs might eliminate blight in one part of a city, the poverty and conditions that caused the first neighborhood to be blighted often shift to another neighborhood.

2. Urban Renewal: Economic Development

In addition to using eminent domain to stop blight (however defined), properties in some urban areas are now being condemned as part of cities' economic development efforts. Generally speaking, if a governing body deems property to be blighted and used in an economically inefficient manner, the property can be condemned and the land transferred, sold, or leased to a private developer who promises to generate revenue for the city in the form of new job creation and additional tax revenues. The United States Supreme Court held in Kelo v. City of New London[108] that it is constitutional for cities to take private property and transfer the property to another owner as part of the city's economic development efforts. As a result, urban planners who view "blight" as an impediment to economic development now have even stronger incentives to condemn older buildings in lower-income, non-white neighborhoods in order to develop modern facilities that can attract upper-income (white) residents and upscale businesses to those neighborhoods.

Since Kelo, courts have given cities wide discretion to condemn and destroy property deemed to be blighted as part of the cities' economic development efforts. For example, one court observed that "only where there is no room for reasonable difference of opinion as to whether an area is blighted" are judges allowed to "substitute their views as to the adequacy with which the public purpose of blight removal has been made out" for the views held by the legislatively designated governing body that condemned the private property.[109] Urban renewal programs that focus on economic development are even more controversial than programs that are designed to eliminate blight because these programs essentially take property owned by private individuals and transfer it to other private owners who will then use the property to build homes or businesses.

107. Hyra, supra note 19, at 504.

108. 545 U.S. 469, 483–84 (2005).

109. Goldstein v. N.Y. State Urban Dev. Corp., 921 N.E.2d 164, 172 (2009).

Critics of urban renewal economic development programs suggest that cash-strapped cities are now using their eminent domain powers, not for the public good but, to profit from public-private partnerships that allow real estate developers to cheaply acquire property that owners have been forced to sell.[110] Rather than put the property to public use (for example, building a highway), critics suggest that the private developer rather than the city's residents primarily benefits from the taking of the "blighted" property. The residents who are most harmed by these renewal efforts are often lower-income people who live in the neighborhoods that are being revitalized.

For the last several decades, urban renewal programs have caused waves of gentrification in many large cities in the U.S. The "back-to-the-city" movement caused young, upper-income (and mostly white) residents to return to live in funky, hipster downtown areas in major metropolitan areas, like New York, Los Angeles, Washington, D.C., and Chicago.[111] Their return to the city has, however, caused housing prices to soar.[112]

Soaring housing prices and higher property taxes in revitalized and gentrified neighborhoods often displace lower-income (and mostly non-white) residents and also make it hard for middle-income residents to live in the central business districts of many cities.[113] In fact, recent urban renewal projects in Chicago, New

---

110. See generally Pritchett, supra note 5, at 2–4 ("[E]minent domain could be used only where it provided specific benefits to the general public, and critics and supporters alike questioned whether urban renewal met this standard.").

111. Gregor, supra note 18 (describing the gentrification process in the Crown Heights section of Brooklyn).

112. Id. (describing how abandoned and underutilized warehouses, factories, and auto shops were turned into high-income condominiums).

113. See generally Eugene L. Meyer, Washington Neighborhood Is Remade for Young Urbanites, N.Y. TIMES (Dec. 1, 2015), http://www.nytimes.com/2015/12/02/realestate/commercial/development-redefines-character-of-washingtons-shaw-area.html (discussing the economic impact of gentrification on an urban neighborhood).

York, Washington, D.C., and other major U.S. cities forced existing residents out of gentrified, urban neighborhoods and into suburbs.[114] Gentrification combined with the lingering economic problems from the recent recession have increased suburban poverty, and suburban poverty rates often exceed the poverty rates in the recently revitalized neighborhoods.[115]

VI. INNOVATIVE URBAN RENEWAL

A. Preserving Neighborhoods

Once a neighborhood starts to transition "downward," urban blight is almost inevitable unless policymakers intervene. Before blight becomes irreversible, cities should engage in creative efforts to help older urban neighborhoods remain economically viable, to encourage investment in those neighborhoods, and to help existing residents remain in their neighborhoods. To encourage investment in an aging but sustainable community, cities should urge lenders—especially if they have participated in renewal efforts in other parts of the city—to increase their presence in lower-income neighborhoods.

Traditional banks have fewer branches in low-income neighborhoods, which causes residents of those neighborhoods to use financial services provided by higher-cost payday lenders and

114. For example, the Mayor of New York has proposed renewal plans that would lease land within a public housing project to a developer who would then create mixed-income housing. Navarro, supra note 46. Likewise, the Mayor announced plans to change zoning laws in certain neighborhoods in order to build housing that would be both affordable and also market rate. Id. Critics fear that development efforts that privatize or destroy affordable public housing might improve decaying neighborhoods, make the neighborhood safer, and improve the neighborhood schools but would almost inevitably result in displacing the poor residents who currently rent in those areas. Id.

115. See Hyra, supra note 19, at 512 (observing that "the revival of the central city and inner city gentrification coincided with the movement of poverty to the suburbs"); Henry Grabar, More Americans are Going Hungry in the Suburbs, ATLANTIC CITY LAB (Jan. 26, 2016), http://www.citylab.com/housing/2016/01/more-americans-are-going-hungry-in-the-suburbs/426786/?utm_source=SFTwitter.

check-cashing companies.[116] In addition, entrepreneurs and businesses in lower-income neighborhoods often must travel farther to get access to capital. Traditional banks seem amenable to opening branches in low-income, non-white neighborhoods only when forced to do so as part of settlements of lawsuits alleging that they engaged in lending discrimination (as First Tennessee Bank recently did).[117]

Cities should actively encourage banks to return to older, urban neighborhoods or to partner with community-based organizations to provide credit or financial services to residents. To make it easier for businesses that already operate in aging urban neighborhoods or ones that would like to invest in those neighborhoods, cities should help ensure that they have access to financial capital and have fair access to both municipal and private-sector contracting opportunities.[118] To ensure that entrepreneurs have access to capital, cities should continue to monitor and gather data about potential discrimination against black-owned businesses.

To ensure that lower-income residents who are displaced as part of urban renewal projects have access to affordable housing, local planning commissions must be willing to truncate the legal challenges suburban homeowners are allowed to mount to prevent affordable housing units from being built in their communities.[119] Similarly, cities must find ways to internalize the costs that wealthy neighborhoods place on lower-income neighborhoods when they insist that socially beneficial (but societally undesirable) projects, like public housing projects or homeless shelters, be placed in lower-income communities. Since the presence of these 116. See DICKERSON, supra note 26, at 173–75 (discussing dearth of traditional lending facilities in lower-income neighborhoods and the resulting prevalence of high-cost loans in minority communities).

---

117. See Ben Lane, First Tennessee Bank Reaches $1.9 million Settlement Agreement Over Discriminatory Lending, HOUSINGWIRE (Feb. 1, 2016), http://www.housingwire.com/articles/36175-first-tennessee-bank-reaches-19-million-settlement-over-discriminatory-lending?utm_source=dlvr.it&utm_medium=twitter&utm_campaign=housingwire.

118. Carolyn M. Brown, Black Farmers Shut Out Of $10 Billion Legal Marijuana Business, BLACK ENTERPRISE (Nov. 10, 2015), http://www.blackenterprise.com/small-business/black-farmers-shut-out-of-legal-marijuana-business/.

119. Ben-Joseph, supra note 35, at 180.

projects makes it more likely that the community will become blighted, lower-income communities that are forced to accept these properties should receive additional support—perhaps in the form of additional parks or neighborhood school funding.

If renewal programs succeed in revitalizing urban neighborhoods and attracting higher-income residents, many lower-income residents will be displaced. To make it possible for developers to build affordable higher density housing (both in the urban core and also in inner suburbs), many cities will need to revise zoning requirements (including density, height, and parking requirements) or grant zoning variances. In addition, cities should adopt inclusionary zoning laws that require builders of new developments to set-aside a certain percentage of the units in their new residential housing projects for lower- or middle-income residents.[120]

Cities must also commit to creative uses of land banks. Land banks are entities (often controlled by governments) that hold title to land that is often vacant, abandoned, dilapidated, or owned by the city because of tax delinquencies.[121] Land banks typically are given the authority to buy, rehabilitate, destroy, or resell the housing held in the bank and quickly return the property to productive uses. Most land banks are used to ensure that municipalities have a quick and efficient means of transferring blighted property to new private owners who can redevelop the process and, in the process, help generate tax revenues for the city.[122] If cities opt to use land banks to keep housing affordable for residents who live in neighborhoods that are (or are at risk of becoming) blights, the bank must insist that private developers who acquire the property at low (or no) cost agree to invest in the blighted community and also set aside some of the redeveloped housing units for middle- or lower-income residents who currently live in the community.

120. Robert W. Burchell et al., Inclusionary Zoning: A Viable Solution to the Affordable Housing Crisis?, NEW CENTURY HOUSING (Oct. 5, 2000), http://www2.nhc.org/media/documents/InclusionaryZoning.pdf. The California Supreme Court recently upheld an inclusionary zoning ordinance that requires developers to set aside housing for moderate-income households, pay a fee in lieu of providing the housing, or provide equivalent substitute housing. See Cal. Bldg. Indus. Ass'n v. City of San Jose Cal., 61 Cal. 4th 435 (2015), cert. denied, 136 S. Ct. 928 (2016); Emily Badger, Why it's so Hard to Afford a Rental Even if you Make a Decent Salary, WASH. POST (Dec. 9, 2015), https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/wonk/wp/2015/12/09/why-its-so-hard-to-afford-a-rental-even-if-you-make-a-decent-salary/.

121. Zale, supra note 87, at 297.

122. Id.

Cities should also support the attempts of Community Land Trusts' ("CLTs") and Community Development Corporations' ("CDCs") to preserve affordable housing. Generally speaking, CDCs enter into long-term residential property leases with low-income residents in neighborhoods that are at risk of gentrifying and pricing out existing residents.[123] CLTs help create permanently affordable homes by giving low- and moderate-income households the opportunity to purchase homes that would otherwise be unaffordable. Homeowners generally are permitted to remain in homes held in a CLT indefinitely, and they can build equity in those homes while they live there. They cannot, though, rent out the homes and if they sell the home it must be to another lower-income household at an affordable price. By limiting the owner's property rights, CLTs ensure that the home remains affordable to lower-income families.[124]

CLTs and CDCs, while valuable, have high operating costs in part because they must purchase and potentially upgrade or refurbish homes before selling or leasing them to owners. Costs would be lower if CLTs and CDCs received additional financial support from financial institutions or if cities made it easier and more affordable for CLTs and CDCs to purchase blighted properties. If used on a larger scale, these entities could play a greater role both in helping to eliminate blight and in assisting existing residents remain in their neighborhoods.

Finally, one example of an innovative approach to fighting blight and encouraging existing residents to improve their communities is the Shelby County Land Bank's "mow-to-own program."[125] This program gives people who own land adjacent to vacant city- or county-owned lots the opportunity to purchase

---

123. A. Mechele Dickerson, Millennials, Affordable Housing and the Future of Homeownership, J. AFFOR. HOUSING (forthcoming 2016).

124. Id.

125. Linda A. Moore, Memphis' Mow-to-Own Takes Off in 2016, COM. APPEAL (Dec. 21, 2015), http://www.commercialappeal.com/news/government/city/memphis-mow-to-own-takes-off-in-2016-276e0cf9-a163-7881-e053-0100007f0f3a-363181171.html.

those vacant lots at below-market costs. Participating owners are required to register for the program, pay $175, and maintain the appearance of the lot for up to 3 years by mowing the property one initial time and then committing to mowing and maintaining the lot in the future.[126] Residents who comply with these requirements are then awarded credit toward buying the vacant lots.[127]

B. Sharing Revitalization's Benefits

Unless city leaders consider the likely results of their revitalization efforts before those efforts start, gentrification is almost an inevitable result of urban renewal efforts. Gentrification, like urban renewal, implicates race because gentrification has always involved affluent whites moving to urban neighborhoods that have become chic or desirable. As noted in a federal housing report almost forty years ago, "[d]ramatic restoration of aged and blighted housing stock is almost exclusively a white phenomenon, undertaken by families whose alternative residence is the suburbs."[128]

Of course, there is no reason that city leaders must reflexively respond to blight by immediately destroying all existing buildings and replacing them with condominiums, bagel pubs, and trendy cafes. That is, while revitalization efforts that succeed in stimulating economic growth in an area will likely displace some of the existing residents, the forced displacement of the existing low-income (black or Latino) households need not be the inevitable result of urban renewal programs.

Texas housing advocate John Henneberger (the recipient of a MacArthur "genius" grant)[129] has articulated four rights he believes all low-income households should have when cities are developing plans to revitalize a low-income or blighted area:

- the right to choose to live in a stable, mixed-race neighborhood;

- the right to stay in their neighborhoods and not be displaced by higher-income residents;

---

126. Id.

127. Id.

128. ARTHUR D. LITTLE, INC., supra note 1, at 128.

129. MacArthur Fellows Program, MACARTHUR FOUND. (Sept. 17, 2016), https://www.macfound.org/fellows/916/.

- the right to equal access to public services and facilities; and

- the right to have a say in how their neighborhoods will be redeveloped.[130]

While it is unrealistic to think that wealthier residents will reverse their trend of moving into revitalized neighborhoods, urban renewal efforts must be more inclusive. Specifically, urban planners should make sure that existing residents participate in the benefits associated with the revitalized neighborhood and renewal plans should include mandatory set-asides for affordable housing.

One successful example of a city's inclusive urban renewal efforts involves the culturally historic Shaw neighborhood in Washington, D.C. Shaw is in the process of transforming from a working-class neighborhood where predominately black families have lived for generations to a trendy upper-income neighborhood of mostly young, white, single-person households.[131] The renewal efforts have, by design, ensured that the revitalized neighborhood will provide economic benefits for current residents. For example, the real estate development firm that is spearheading the revitalization efforts is headed by a black native Washingtonian whose firm has committed to having thirty percent of the units reserved for middle-income tenants.[132] Urban renewal projects in other cities (including Chicago and New York) that were revitalized in the 2000s also ensured that (1) black real estate development firms helped construct or manage new inner city housing developments; (2) black churches participated in community economic redevelopment programs; and (3) black banks are allowed to help finance the redevelopment projects.[133]

---

130. John Henneberger, The Right to Choose, the Right to Stay, the Right to Equal Treatment, the Right to Have a Say: Reimagining Fair Housing, TEX. HOUSERS (Oct. 24, 2015), http://texashousers.net/2015/10/24/the-right-to-choose-the-right-to-stay-the-right-to-equal-treatment-the-right-to-have-a-say-reimagining-fair-housing/.

131. Meyer, supra note 113; see also Gregor, supra note 18 (noting that most new residents were in their late twenties and early thirties).

132. Meyer, supra note 113.

133. Hyra, supra note 19, at 511.

VII. CONCLUSION

Urban blight has always existed and always will. Unfortunately, the country's history of pushing poor residents out of revitalized neighborhoods will remain a part of our present and future as long as the goal of urban renewal programs is to demolish and destroy. As a 1938 urban planning report observed: "Government[s] must provide the framework of legislation within which private industry can operate effectively. Zoning laws, building restrictions, mortgage laws, tax policies, and land control are some of the important obligations of the government."[134]

While urban blight will never disappear, cities can do more to anticipate and respond to the consequences of urban renewal programs. Although urban renewal programs should demolish buildings that cannot be rehabilitated, these programs should also make every effort to renovate or modernize buildings that still have value. Moreover, even if it is not feasible to save the existing buildings in a neighborhood, land use policies must take care to provide affordable housing for the displaced residents of blighted neighborhoods.

134. WALKER, supra note 6, at 87.

Affirmatively Furthering Neighborhood Choice: Vacant Property Strategies and Fair Housing

JAMES J. KELLY, JR.*

I. INTRODUCTION 1009
II. AFFIRMATIVELY FURTHERING FAIR HOUSING 1013
III. DISCUSSING MARKET-SENSITIVE VACANT PROPERTY STRATEGIES IN ASSESSMENTS OF FAIR HOUSING AND CONSOLIDATED PLANS..1026

I. INTRODUCTION

When many of us think about fair housing enforcement, scenes involving undercover apartment applicants ferreting out racially biased landlords come to mind. Indeed, fair housing "testers" have been and continue to be an important element of civil rights accountability.[1] However, implementation of the Fair Housing Act of 1968 has had at least as much to do with increasing the supply of decent, affordable housing options to members of protected groups as with assuring those individuals that they will not be denied a particular housing unit because of the color of their skin or a disability.[2]

---

* Clinical Professor of Law, Notre Dame Law School. I would like to thank the participants in the Symposium, particularly my fellow presenters, for their engaging questions and feedback. I am especially grateful to the editors of this symposium issue and my colleagues, Kermit Lind, Joe Schilling, Danny Schaffzin, and Steve Barlow, for all their work in organizing this wonderful discussion of these vitally important issues.

1. Michael J. Yelnosky, What Does "Testing" Tell us About the Incidence of Discrimination in Housing Markets?, 29 SETON HALL L. REV. 1488, 1492 (1999); see also Teresa Coleman Hunter & Gary L. Fischer, Fair Housing Testing—Uncovering Discriminatory Practices, 28 CREIGHTON L. REV. 1127, 1132–34 (1995).

2. The Fair Housing Act bans housing discrimination on any one of six bases: "race, color, religion, sex, familial status, or national origin." 42 U.S.C.

This macro aspect of fair housing enforcement has been led by organized activists challenging the policies, actions, and inactions of state and local housing and land use agencies. Early on, it involved battles over the siting of public housing projects outside areas of concentrated poverty, like the 1980's-era struggle in Yonkers depicted in the recent critically acclaimed HBO series, Show Me a Hero.[3] As housing subsidy increasingly took the form of rent payment vouchers, advocates litigated to force local agencies to facilitate the voluntary relocation of poor, inner-city residents of color to suburban areas that had good schools as well as jobs.[4]

Critical to plaintiffs' prospects for success in these impact cases has been the ability to establish a violation of the Fair Housing Act through evidence that showed that the policies in question disproportionately harmed the housing opportunities of federally protected racial groups. Proving racial bias as the motivation behind the adoption of a harmful governmental policy has been even more difficult than it has been in the reason for denial of an apartment or mortgage application. The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that a showing of deliberate discrimination is required to establish a violation of constitutional rights under the Equal Protection Clause, but the lower court, upon remand, held that the Fair Housing Act was not so limited in its protection.[5] Evidence that a facially neutral policy nevertheless harmed the housing prospects of a protected group would at least shift the burden of proof to the defendant governmental unit to justify the policy approach.[6] Advocates battling against the exclusion of affordable housing have had some success in showing that targeted policies harm the hous-§ 3604(a) (2012). Racial minorities and the disabled, however, face the most compromised housing options because they, to a greater extent than religious minorities, face significant economic marginalization, which causes them to be harmed by shortages of affordable housing. See The Fair Housing Act, U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE, https://www.justice.gov/crt/fair-housing-act-1 ("The number of cases filed since 1968 alleging religious discrimination is small in comparison to some of the other prohibited bases, such as race or national origin.") (last visited April 4, 2016).

---

3. Show Me a Hero (HBO 2015).

4. See, e.g., Hills v. Gautreaux, 425 U.S. 284 (1976); Thompson v. U.S. Dep't of Hous. & Urban Dev., 348 F. Supp. 2d. 398 (D. Md. 2005).

5. Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 270–71 (1977), remanded to 558 F.2d 1283 (7th Cir. 1977).

6. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp. v. Arlington Heights, 558 F.2d at 1294–95.

ing options of racial minorities.[7] But, local jurisdictions' ability to escape liability by showing a non-racial basis for a detrimental policy has contributed to a declining overall success rate in federal appellate courts.[8] Such a record has encouraged activists to look elsewhere in the law to advance housing justice for protected groups.[9]

Potentially more important than the ability to prove unlawful discrimination through disparate impact evidence is the capacity to scrutinize a local agency's compliance with its Fair Housing Act obligation to Affirmatively Further Fair Housing ("AFFH").[10] Offered as a possible "missing link" in the chain of fair housing accountability,[11] AFFH has significant potential to affect local decision-making. By law, recipients of funding from the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development ("HUD") not only have to avoid policies that deny protected groups housing opportunities, they also are required to work proactively to eliminate entrenched segregation in their communities regardless of who is to blame for its creation.[12]

---

7. This success with prima facie cases against exclusionary policies is particularly notable when compared with the struggle to challenge revitalization efforts. See Stacy E. Seicshnaydre, Is Disparate Impact Having Any Impact? An Appellate Analysis of Forty Years of Disparate Impact Claims Under the Fair Housing Act, 63 AM. U. L. REV. 357, 399–402 (2013).

8. Id. at 388–89.

9. Advocates have sought state law remedies against exclusionary zoning in the courts. See, e.g., S. Burlington Cty. NAACP v. Mt. Laurel, 336 A.2d 713, 713 (1975). Advocates have also sought these remedies in the legislature through the enactment of inclusionary housing land use measures. See, e.g., MASS. GEN. LAWS ANN. ch. 40B, §§ 20–30 (West 2012).

10. 42 U.S.C. § 3608(e)(5) (2012) ("The Secretary of Housing and Urban Development shall . . . administer the programs and activities relating to housing and urban development in a manner affirmatively to further the policies of this title . . . ."); 24 C.F.R. § 5.150–5.180 (2015) (establishing regulations which further the policy of affirmatively furthering fair housing).

11. Stacy E. Seicshnaydre, The Fair Housing Choice Myth, 33 CARDOZO L. REV. 967, 1006 (2012), reprinted in 23 J. AFFORDABLE HOUSING & COMTY. DEV. L 149, 188 (2015).

12. The AFFH duty applies to all barriers to the housing opportunities of protected groups, but those impediments to fair housing brought about by a local jurisdiction's policies may be entitled to a priority response under its AFFH strategy. See infra text accompanying note 65.

In 2009, the new leadership at HUD began a process of developing regulations for the AFFH duty. Those efforts came to fruition in July 2015 with the publication of the Final Rule for AFFH.[13] In this Article, I will examine how the new AFFH rule impacts local government efforts to confront the epidemic of vacant houses in America's older cities. Market-sensitive responses to vacant properties drive many of the best practices in code enforcement and land banking.[14] Reconnecting marginalized areas to functioning real estate markets promotes neighborhood choice not only because remaining in the communities they have called home should be a viable option for residents of color but also because the ability of local government to provide essential services requires the elimination of vacant property nuisances. Yet, the short-term effects of these strategies and their similarities to previous publicly sanctioned instances of government redlining raise profound questions of racial and social equity.[15] The first Part of this Article will examine both the unique role of AFFH within the Fair Housing Act and its articulation in the recently released Final Rule. The next Part will articulate how local governments required by the Final Rule to submit Assessments of Fair Housing ("AFHs") to HUD should structure and discuss innovative, market-based approaches to their vacant property challenges.

---

13. Affirmatively Furthering Fair Housing, 80 Fed. Reg. 42,272–42,371 (July 16, 2015) (to be codified at 24 C.F.R. pts. 5, 91, 92, 570, 574, 576, & 903).

14. Understanding the availability of capital investment for renovations is vital to a municipality's strategic planning for vacant property nuisance responses. James J. Kelly, Jr., A Continuum In Rem*edies: Reconnecting Vacant Properties to the Market*, 23 ST. L. U. PUB. L. REV. 109, 117–20 (2013). Mapping neighborhoods for the strength of their housing markets can "make it possible not only to design cost-effective strategies for revitalization but also to adjust them to reflect changes in market conditions." ALAN MALLACH, BRINGING BUILDINGS BACK: FROM ABANDONED PROPERTIES TO COMMUNITY ASSETS 23. For an explanation of how data can inform vacant property strategies, see Ira Goldstein, Using the Market Value Analysis to Analyze Markets, Set Strategy and Evaluate Change, THE REINVESTMENT FUND (2013), http://www.trfund.com/using-the-market-value-analysis-to-analyze-markets-set-strategy-and-evaluate-change.

15. JAMES J. KELLY, JR., JUST, SMART: CIVIL RIGHTS PROTECTIONS AND MARKET-SENSITIVE VACANT PROPERTY STRATEGIES 2 (2014), reprinted in 23 J. AFFORDABLE HOUS. & CMTY. DEV. L. 209, 210–11 (2015).

Market-sensitive vacant property strategies affirmatively further fair housing as long as they are not implemented in a way that runs afoul of the Fair Housing Act's prohibitions and provided that they look to the potential unintended consequences of strengthening real estate markets in marginalized neighborhoods.[16] Furthermore, framing vacant property strategies as an AFFH approach may have benefits for vacant property reforms, especially those connected with acquisition of vacant properties by land banks. Because the AFFH framework sees the problem of housing justice for statutorily protected groups as a regional one, municipal jurisdictions in need of cooperation from county governments in order to achieve their land banking goals may be able to use the AFFH requirement as leverage.

II. AFFIRMATIVELY FURTHERING FAIR HOUSING

The Fair Housing Act prohibits discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, family composition, disability, or national origin in the marketing and management of residential real estate.[17] Specifically it prohibits motivated rejection or steering of a prospective tenant or homebuyer, discriminatory advertising, and blockbusting.[18] These prohibitions directly address many of the tactics that individual private actors employed to perpetuate residential segregation of various kinds but especially that of race. But, the Fair Housing Act also provides mechanisms for eliminating systemic barriers to neighborhood integration.

The Fair Housing Act makes it unlawful to "otherwise make unavailable or deny a dwelling to any person because of race."[19] Civil rights groups, affordable housing activists, and anti-poverty advocates have used the "otherwise make unavailable"

---

16. Paul C. Brophy & Jennifer S. Vey, Seizing City Assets: Ten Steps to Urban Land Reform, THE BROOKINGS INST. CEOS FOR CITIES RES. BRIEF 18 (Oct. 2002), http://www.brookings.edu/~/media/research/files/reports/2002/10/metropolitanpolicy-brophy/brophyveyvacantsteps.pdf ("Step 9: Be Sensitive to Gentrification and Relocation Issues").

17. 42 U.S.C. § 3604(a) (2012).

18. 42 U.S.C. §§ 3604, 3605. The FHA also makes it illegal to hinder those who support protected persons in securing their fair housing rights. 42 U.S.C. § 3617.

19. 42 U.S.C. § 3604(a).

language to confront various housing assistance,[20] community development[21] and zoning[22] policies, and decisions of state and local governments. As with the provisions holding parties in real estate deals accountable, the broader prohibition on discriminatory policies can be proven with a showing that the banned action was motivated by bias. However, if proof of racist or other discriminatory intent can be difficult to uncover when someone's apartment application is denied, it is all but impossible to find evidence of similar intent behind the enactment of a policy that prevents the construction of the entire apartment building.

In seeking to invalidate a policy under the Fair Housing Act, advocates have offered, and courts have considered, statistical evidence of the policy's disproportionate adverse impact on a protected group's access to housing.[23] Because the actions of both governments and private institutions can be motivated by a wide range of goals and have an even greater number of effects, courts have allowed defendant policymakers to respond to showings of disparate impact by presenting evidence of legitimate, neutral policy objectives that cannot be attained, easily or, sometimes, at all, without the cited adverse impacts.[24] The approach of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, sometimes labeled "impact plus," incorporates elements of both effect and intention.[25] In 20. See, e.g., Gautreaux v. Chicago Hous. Auth., 436 F. 2d 306 (7th Cir. 1970).

---

21. See, e.g., Resident Advisory Bd. v. Rizzo, 564 F. 2d 1261 (3rd Cir. 1977).

22. See, e.g., Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp. v. Arlington Heights, 558 F.2d 1283 (7th Cir. 1977).

23. 100 A.L.R. Fed. 97, § 2(a).

24. Bradley v. U.S. Dep't Hous. & Urban Dev., 658 F.2d 290, 295 (5th Cir. 1981) ("If the court ruled, as the plaintiffs would have us, that the transfer of funds to redevelopment planning was illegal because it did not benefit persons of low and moderate income as much as would rehabilitation of the area's stock housing, we would be usurping the legislature's role in determining community needs and establishing priorities.").

25. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 558 F.2d at 1290 ("We therefore hold that at least under some circumstances a violation of section 3604(a) can be established by a showing of discriminatory effect without a showing of discriminatory intent. . . . [W]e agree that a showing of discriminatory intent is not required under section 3604(a), we refuse to conclude that every action which products discriminatory effects is illegal.").

examining the rejection of a petition to rezone a parcel for the development of affordable multifamily housing, the Seventh Circuit found that the plaintiffs' evidence should be judged by weighing the following factors: (1) the presentation of strong evidence for discriminatory effect; (2) the existence of some evidence for discriminatory intent; (3) the lack of a substantial nondiscriminatory basis for the defendant's action; and (4) a showing that the defendant is interfering with, rather than merely failing to produce, housing opportunities for protected persons of color.[26]

As influential as this and other, similar disparate impact tests have been in the federal courts, the U.S. Supreme Court did not rule on the sufficiency of disparate impact evidence until its 5-4 decision last year in Texas Department of Housing & Community Affairs v. Inclusive Communities Project, Inc.[27] In an opinion authored by Justice Anthony Kennedy, the majority upheld the disparate impact test but emphasized the burden plaintiffs bore to show a strong causal connection between the challenged policy and the adverse effects on protected groups.[28] The Court also cautioned lower courts not to disregard defendants' justifications for policy decisions if they are not shown to be "artificial, arbitrary and unnecessary barriers."[29] Even as the courts have solidified the Fair Housing Act as a tool against unlawful practices and policies, another FHA mechanism for dismantling segregation and promoting meaningful residential choice is only now coming into its own nearly half a century after its enactment.

Even with the ability to challenge harmful policies by demonstrating causation if not intent, civil right advocates struggle against an overwhelming array of state and local government decisions that contribute to the isolation of poor people of color. Many of these decisions will never be successfully invalidated in federal court. Complainants can produce a compelling account of the desperation that racial minorities and the disabled face in their search for decent, affordable housing. They may go further and show how various exclusionary zoning practices aggravate that hardship.

---

26. Id. at 1290–93.
27. 135 S. Ct. 2507 (2015).
28. Id. at 2523.
29. Id. at 2522 (quoting Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 431 (1971)).

But, once the defendant local government articulates an otherwise neutral—that is, nondiscriminatory—basis for the policies, the burden remains on the plaintiff to show how that objective can be achieved, at little or no additional cost, without the adverse impact on any protected group.[30] Striking down practices and policies, while effective in some cases,[31] fails to hold local and state agencies accountable for the persistence of deeply-rooted racial segregation spanning decades and generations.

The Fair Housing Act charges HUD not only to enforce its prohibitions but to "affirmatively further" its stated goals of ending segregation in housing and increasing meaningful housing choice for members of protected groups.[32] The principal method by which HUD has affirmatively furthered fair housing is to extend that obligation to the hundreds of states, participating jurisdictions, and public housing authorities that receive HUD funding. The legal obligations of many state and local agencies do not end, then, with mere compliance with FHA's primary prohibitions against interfering with the housing and neighborhood choices of protected group members. On the contrary, these municipal and county actors appear to have an unbounded mandate to break down barriers to racial integration, no matter their role in creating or sustaining those barriers. Given the broad array of governmental actions that could be taken to bring about more housing choice for marginalized racial minorities and disabled persons, it is not completely surprising to read that some conservative commentators have greeted the Obama administration efforts to more effectively implement the AFFH duty with alarm bordering on panic.

In a 2015 National Review article entitled "Attention America's Suburbs: You Have Just Been Annexed," Stanley Kurtz professes amazement at the lack of media attention to the "breathtaking radicalism" embodied by HUD efforts to enforce Affirma-

---

30. Id. at 2515.

31. In 2006, the Greater New Orleans Fair Housing Center sued St. Bernard Parish over its zoning ordinance prohibiting property owners, 93% of whom were white, from renting to anyone not related to them by blood, marriage, or adoption and forced the county government to repeal the blatantly racist law. Time Runs Out for St. Bernard Parish, N.Y. TIMES (Mar. 29, 2011), http://www.nytimes.com/2011/03/30/opinion/30wed3.html.

32. 42 U.S.C §§ 3601–3619 (2012).

tively Furthering Fair Housing.[33] Kurtz claims the Federal government will confront wealthy suburban governments with the facts of regional housing inequality and then they would be "obligated to nullify their zoning ordinances and build high-density, low-income housing at their own expense."[34] Comparing the obligations that these local governments have under the "otherwise make unavailable" prohibition and AFFH, it seems plausible that the latter may be the missing piece for federal efforts to strike down barriers to housing choice for protected groups. But, neither the elation nor the panic is justified. The Fair Housing Act does not empower HUD to mandate the spending priorities of state and local governments or to force its funding recipients to abandon their duly adopted policies or laws, even if they clearly run counter to a mission of affirmatively furthering fair housing. Instead, federal law explicitly prohibits HUD from conditioning its funding on the abolition of any state or local government law, policy, or practice that does not itself violate federal law.[35]

AFFH is not a wholesale Congressional revision of local land use law, however crucial that might be to ending patterns of residential discrimination in certain parts of the country. Instead, AFFH creates the basis for a discussion between HUD and its recipients about what those recipients are doing "to overcome historic patterns of segregation, promote fair housing choice, and foster inclusive communities that are free from discrimination."[36] HUD cannot require a suburban county government to repeal its exclusionary zoning practices as a condition of continued funding. HUD can, however, insist that it acknowledge that such duly adopted laws create barriers to affordable housing, the lack of which disproportionately harms racial minorities and perpetuates

---

33. Stanley Kurtz, Attention America's Suburbs: You Have Just Been Annexed, NAT'L REVIEW (July 20, 2015, 10:01 AM), http://www.nationalreview.com/corner/421389/attention-americas-suburbs-you-have-just-been-annexed-stanley-kurtz.

34. Id.

35. 42 U.S.C.A. § 12711 (West 2015). A jurisdiction that has violated the law may negotiate a settlement of the related charges that may include its commitment to make specific changes in its laws and/or fund, at its own expense, the development of affordable housing, but that is a mutually acceptable form of punishment.

36. 24 CFR § 5.150 (2015).

racial segregation.[37] Moreover, HUD can insist that the same local government explain how its priorities and goals are designed to "overcome the effects" of those contributing factors and related fair housing issues.[38]

Under the system of fair housing reporting that existed prior to the adoption of the Final Rule on AFFH last year, state and local jurisdictions, as well as public housing authorities, that received Community Planning and Development Formula Grant Program funds[39] were required to submit an annual certification that each had prepared an Analysis of Impediments ("AIs") to the achievement of fair housing in its program or jurisdiction.[40] Each was also required to articulate steps taken to overcome those impediments and document information related to the impediments and/or the remedial actions.[41] A 2010 study of AIs by the Government Accountability Office, however, found that many of them were outdated or lacked plans for responding to fair housing barriers.[42] The same report criticized HUD's own efforts to promote AFFH pointing out that funding recipients lacked guidance as to the content and format of AIs and that funding recipients had little reason to fear enforcement actions by HUD related to AFFH.[43]

With the issuance of the Final Rule in July 2015,[44] HUD has responded to each of these problems. Instead of certifying the existence of a fair housing analysis, recipients of HUD funds will now be required to submit an Assessment of Fair Housing to HUD

---

37. See infra notes 59–60 and accompanying text.

38. Westchester v. U.S. Dep't of Hous. & Urban Dev., 802 F.3d 413, 434 (2nd Cir. 2015) (citing 24 C.F.R. § 91.225(a)(1) (2015)).

39. 24 C.F.R. § 5.162(b)(1)(ii)(B) (2015).

40. Timothy M. Smyth, Michael Allen & Marisa Schaith, The Fair Housing Act: The Evolving Landscape for Federal Grant Recipients and Sub-Recipients, 23 J. AFFORDABLE HOUSING & COMMUNITY DEV. L. 231, 235 (2015).

41. Id. at 236.

42. U.S. GOV'T ACCOUNTABILITY OFFICE, HOUSING AND COMMUNITY GRANTS: HUD NEEDS OT ENHANCE ITS REQUIREMENTS AND OVERSIGHT OF JURISDICTIONS' FAIR HOUSING PLANS 1 (2010), http://www.gao.gov/products/GAO-10-905.

43. Id. at 1–2.

44. Affirmatively Furthering Fair Housing, 80 Fed. Reg. 42,272-01 (to be codified at 24 C.F.R. pt. 5).

for review and acceptance.[45] By creating this new reporting approach to fair housing, HUD is setting the stage for a broader and more consistent enforcement of the duty to Affirmatively Further Fair Housing. The Final Rule takes an expansive approach to the subject matter and geography of fair housing. While some commenters objected during the rulemaking process that HUD's new reporting system would require analysis of governmental functions not funded by HUD or even controlled by state and local agencies funded by HUD,[46] HUD insisted that a thorough analysis of barriers to fair housing had to include all of the factors affecting the availability of housing opportunities for statutorily protected groups.[47] Nothing in the statute or in the case law restricts the discussion of AFFH compliance to those areas of state and local government function that are administered by housing and community development agencies. If local tax policies within the control of local jurisdictions have an impact on fair housing in a metropolitan area, then the reporting grant recipient cannot merely disclaim any responsibility just because control of those functions have been assigned to the finance department. The housing and community development agency is reporting on behalf of the entire city or county and must articulate how that unit of government is complying with AFFH.[48]

Similarly, analysis of barriers to housing opportunities cannot be compartmentalized within a single set of municipal or county boundaries. Housing markets are metropolitan in their overall scope and the analysis of fair housing barriers must be regional as well.[49] Here, however, the AFFH duty does not become a collective duty. Each participating jurisdiction has its own AFFH duty. But, the Final Rule encourages reporting fund recipients to collaborate with other participating jurisdictions in the same metropolitan area to produce reports that systematically analyze segregation in the area and offer collaborative integration strategies.[50]

---

45. 24 C.F.R. § 5.154 (2015).

46. Affirmatively Furthering Fair Housing, 80 Fed. Reg. at 42,278, 42,281, 42,284–85.

47. Id. at 42,282, 42,285.

48. Id. at 42,285.

49. Id. at 42,286.

50. 24 C.F.R. § 5.156 (2015).

The Final Rule also combats compartmentalization in the understanding of fair housing objectives. The quality of housing opportunities for racial minorities and the disabled is not judged exclusively by the physical condition and suitability of the housing unit itself. An analysis of housing availability must also look to the neighborhood environments associated with the possible residential options. Certainly, the level of crime, especially burglaries and home invasions, is relevant to evaluating the adequacy of a housing opportunity. But, AFFH is not limited to those aspects of life associated with actual physical presence in the home.

Appropriate housing type and physical quality of structure are important, but, increasingly, residence location is key to a variety of developmentally essential public goods. Frequently, a family's access to strong primary and secondary schools is determined by where that family lives. For people of limited means, public transportation may be essential to connecting with good jobs and/or training and education resources. Even access to quality food, health, and recreation resources are often dependent on the neighborhood one lives in. Even as racial segregation has moderated over the last three decades, isolation of poor households has intensified.[51] The result is that the typical poor African-American or Hispanic family was more likely to live in area with high concentration of poverty in 1990 than it was twenty years earlier.[52] Thus, HUD's AFH process requires analysis of and strategies responsive to "significant disparities in access to opportunity."[53]

The redesign of the reporting process provides for clearer accountability by making submission to and acceptance by HUD a prerequisite of continued funding. But, the process also requires that reporting entities listen to their citizens and base their analysis on the quantitative indicators most relevant to an assessment of fair housing in a particular geographic area. HUD has taken it upon itself to provide this "data related to education, poverty, transit access, employment, exposure to environmental health hazards,

---

51. Douglas S. Massey, Jonathan Rothwell, & Thurston Domina, The Changing Bases of Segregation in the United States, 626 ANNALS AM. ACAD. POL. & SOC. SCI. 74, 77, 82 (2009).

52. PAUL A. JARGOWSKY, POVERTY AND PLACE: GHETTOS, BARRIOS AND THE AMERICAN CITY 40 (1996).

53. 24 C.F.R. § 5.154(d)(2)(iii) (2015).

and other critical community assets, as well as nationally uniform local and regional data on patterns of integration and segregation; racial and ethnic concentrations of poverty; disproportionate housing needs based on protected class; and outstanding discrimination findings."[54] HUD's communication of the data is not itself a judgment by HUD as to the severity of segregation and housing inequality in the region. On the other hand, the fact that the Fair Housing Act has been held by the U.S. Supreme Court to embrace disparate impact arguments clears the way for HUD to make a strong connection between affordable housing availability and fair housing goals.[55]

Enforcement of AFFH would have been significantly limited if the Supreme Court in Inclusive Communities had ruled that the Fair Housing Act itself and/or the 5th Amendment's guarantee of equal protection excluded consideration of disparate impact showings in adjudicating Fair Housing Act violations.[56] Although the immediate consequence of such a ruling would have been to protect all policies that could not be shown to be the products of deliberate discrimination, the argument could have then been made that the only kind of segregation that could be the legitimate concern of AFFH was segregation that was deliberately created. If so, then even clear statistical demonstration of the lack of affordability in opportunity areas and the lack of opportunity in areas with plenty of low-cost housing would not be enough to put local governments to the question as how they would respond as required by AFFH. As it is, the high court's confirmation of disparate impact allows HUD to supply data that raises compelling AFFH questions simply by showing the spatial mismatch of affordable housing and important community goods. Doing so requires that HUD's evi-

---

54. Affirmatively Furthering Fair Housing, 78 Fed. Reg. 43,710, 43,731 (July 19, 2013) (to be codified at 24 C.F.R. pt. 5).

55. See infra note 58 and accompanying text. For an analysis of the "robust causality" required by Inclusive Cmtys. Project, see William J. Callison, Inclusive Communities: Geographic Desegregation, Urban Revitalization, And Disparate Impact Under The Fair Housing Act, 46 U. MEM. L. REV. 1039, 1048–50 (2016).

56. HUD cited the Supreme Court ruling in response to comments about the use of disparate impact theories in the articulation of the Final Rule. 80 Fed. Reg. 42,272-01, 42,283 (citing Texas Dept' of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs v. Inclusive Cmtys. Project, 132 S. Ct. 2507, 2525–26 (2015)).

dence shows that certain protected groups, usually the disabled as well as economically disadvantaged racial minorities, are disproportionately harmed by the lack of affordable housing in desirable neighborhoods. The data provided by HUD is not the only source of information to which reporting jurisdictions must respond.

The AFH process also facilitates citizen participation by requiring participating jurisdictions to seek input from those wishing to address local fair housing issues.[57] Community groups will confront reporting jurisdictions with accusations of deliberate discrimination and challenge the justifications of policies that disproportionately harm protected groups. They, along with civil rights and affordable housing advocates, will offer their own views on what are the most important fair housing issues and the best ways to address them. As seen from the Final Rule's description of the AFH report's structure, local governments must be prepared not only to relate these messages on to HUD, but also to state whether or not they agree and why.

The Final Rule on Affirmatively Furthering Fair Housing provides the following breakdown of the Assessment of Fair Housing Report:

> (1) Analysis: Identification of integration and segregation patterns, racially or ethnically concentrated areas of poverty, significant disparities in access to community assets for all protected classes, and disparities in access to housing for all protected classes.
>
> (2) Fair Housing Priorities and Goals: A prioritized list of fair housing issues, a list of the most significant factors in shaping the fair housing situation, and goals for addressing them.
>
> (3) Community Input: Process for and content of community input as well as the reporting jurisdiction's responses.[58]

57. 24 C.F.R. § 5.158(a) (2015).
58. Id. § 5.154.

After it has been submitted, HUD has sixty days to reject the AFH report.[59] Obviously, if the report' s summary of community input reveals substantiated allegations that the reporting jurisdiction deliberately discriminates against protected groups or "otherwise . . . make[s] unavailable"[60] their housing options, HUD can reject the report and require any future funding be contingent on compliance with the basic obligations of the Fair Housing Act.[61] Likewise, an AFH report will be required to relay information from civil rights advocates that the reporting entity's policies reinforce or aggravate segregation by preventing the creation of affordable housing in desirable neighborhoods or by frustrating revitalization efforts. The legitimate land use or fiscal objectives behind these policies may prevent them from being invalidated under the Fair Housing Act.[62] But, the question remains as to whether or not the duty to AFFH is not somehow increased by a reporting jurisdiction's policies being shown to be a contributing factor to the reinforcement of segregation. An argument could be made that, in prioritizing the contributing factors to segregation, a reporting jurisdiction has an obligation to elevate the harms it has caused through its own policies.[63] The AFH would also then name among its top goals responses to these contributing factors. Following this logic through the integrated reporting process, the consolidated plan of that jurisdiction would articulate strategies and actions that give special attention to remedying those negative effects caused by the jurisdiction's own actions.

More than anything, the AFH should explain how a reporting jurisdiction is overcoming any spatial mismatch between opportunity and affordable housing. HUD was challenged on its fo-

---

59. Id. § 5.162.

60. 42 U.S.C. §3604 (2012).

61. See supra notes 42–43 and accompanying text.

62. See supra notes 6–8, 25–31 and accompanying text.

63. The Supreme Court has recognized the relevance of a local history of de jure segregation to the imposition of desegregation remedies by federal courts and the adoption of affirmative action mechanisms where such responses would be problematic legally in the absence of past deliberate discrimination. See Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 745–47 (1974); Parents Involved v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 551 U.S. 701, 721 (2007) (citing Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 494 (1992)).

cus on concentration of poverty with the argument that "[p]overty is not a protected class."[64] In response, HUD stated:

> it is entirely consistent with the Fair Housing Act's duty to affirmatively further fair housing to counteract past policies and decisions that account for today's racially or ethnically concentrated areas of poverty or housing cost burdens and housing needs that are disproportionately high for certain groups of persons based on characteristics protected by the Fair Housing Act. Preparation of an AFH could be an important step in reducing poverty among groups of persons who share characteristics protected by the Fair Housing Act. The focus and purpose of the AFH is to identify, and to begin the process of planning to overcome, the causes and contributing factors that deny or impede housing choice and access to opportunity based on race, color, religion, sex, national origin, familial status, and disability. In addition, a large body of research has consistently found that the problems associated with segregation are greatly exacerbated when combined with concentrated poverty. That is the legal basis and context for the examination of RCAPs/ECAPs [Racially & Ethnically Concentrated Areas of Poverty], as required by the rule.[65]

Many of the fair housing advocates urging increased attention to the problems associated with overconcentration of poverty have championed mobility strategies over revitalization investments to overcome the spatial mismatch between affordable housing and economic opportunity. They have fought for the development of subsidized housing in areas that lack affordable housing opportunities, even when such siting costs additional time and money. Inclusive Communities, the plaintiff in the recent landmark Supreme Court case, has directly opposed the diversion of

---

64. Affirmatively Furthering Fair Housing, 80 Fed. Reg. 42,272-01, 42,283 (July 16, 2015) (to be codified at 24 C.F.R. pt. 5).

65. Id.

affordable housing subsidy from areas of opportunity to neighborhoods that are already home to many low-income households.[66] As AFFH made its way through the rulemaking process, advocates for investment in distressed neighborhoods expressed concern that HUD was discouraging recipients from developing affordable housing opportunities in or near areas of concentrated poverty.

With the issuance of the Final Rule, HUD made clear that "strategically enhancing access to opportunity include[d] . . . : Targeted investment in neighborhood revitalization or stabilization; preservation or rehabilitation of existing affordable housing" in addition to "promoting greater housing choice within or outside of areas of concentrated poverty and greater access to areas of high opportunity."[67] HUD added this clarification in response to comments it received about earlier versions of the rule.[68] Commenters argued that, as originally framed, the AFFH rule "appears to prohibit program participants from using Federal resources in neighborhoods of concentrated poverty."[69] HUD responded that "[t]he duty to affirmatively further fair housing does not dictate or preclude particular investments or strategies as a matter of law. . . . HUD's rule recognizes the role of place-based strategies, including economic development to improve conditions in high poverty neighborhoods . . . ."[70]

HUD's commitment to recognizing both the revitalization of dilapidated neighborhoods and the facilitation of the voluntary relocation of the low-income households to opportunity areas is critical for cities and counties struggling with vacant and abandoned properties. These communities depend greatly on the funds they receive from HUD in the form of HOME funds, Emergency Solutions Grants and, particularly, Community Development Block Grants ("CDBG"). Their softer real estate markets make housing affordability less of a concern than in higher-demand regions. But, the older, post-industrial cities of the Rust Belt also exhibit some of the most severe and intractable patterns of racial 66. See Texas Dept' of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs v. Inclusive Cmtys. Project, 132 S. Ct. 2507 (2015).

67. 24 C.F.R. § 5.150 (2015).

68. Affirmatively Furthering Fair Housing, 80 Fed. Reg. 42,272, 42,277–79 (July 16, 2015) (to be codified at 24 C.F.R. pt. 5).

69. Id. at 42,278.

70. Id. at 42,279.

segregation in the country. As such, these jurisdictions need to be especially attentive to recent developments in AFFH and make sure that their revitalization programs that depend on HUD funding support their AFFH goals.

III. DISCUSSING MARKET-SENSITIVE VACANT PROPERTY STRATEGIES IN ASSESSMENTS OF FAIR HOUSING AND CONSOLIDATED PLANS

Local governments seeking to make their distressed neighborhoods attractive to potential residents choosing new homes must be able to express these revitalization goals as consonant with the promotion of fair housing even as they contend with accusations their market-sensitive approaches to vacant properties reinforces segregation patterns. They must be able to respond to any allegations from the community that their vacant property strategies are deliberately discriminatory or that they disproportionately and unjustifiably impair the housing opportunities of racial minorities. Even if the market-sensitive approaches are justifiable, the local governments still need to be attentive to any disparate impact they may have on the access that minority households have to decent, affordable housing and key community goods. Most importantly, county and municipal agencies that embrace market-sensitive approaches to code enforcement and land banking must show how these strategies will achieve the AFFH goal of promoting stable, inclusive communities.

At first it would appear that HUD's acceptance, as a legitimate fair housing goal, of revitalization of concentrated areas of poverty would end the discussion there. But, the importance of attracting private capital to these distressed areas puts vacant property revitalization strategies in apparent conflict with the goal of promoting the housing prospects of low-income families of color. In chasing households who already have housing choices, these older cities seem to be casting aside those with limited options. A superficial understanding of the market-sensitive approach to code enforcement would not only disqualify the market-sensitive approach to vacant properties as an AFFH strategy but would cast doubt on its compatibility with the anti-discrimination provisions of the Fair Housing Act. Only a thorough exploration of the logic that animates market-sensitive code enforcement and land banking can illustrate its true worth as a mechanism for affirmatively furthering neighborhood choice as well as pointing out genuine areas of concern with regard to fair housing compliance.

An appreciation of the place of vacant property revitalization in the larger struggle for housing justice begins with an understanding of how vacant properties ruin neighborhoods. When left completely unsecured and open to casual entry, vacant properties attract criminal activity and unauthorized occupancy and pose a significant fire danger. Both vacant houses and abandoned lots can harbor rats and other vermin as well as pose dangers for neighborhood children.[71] Because abandoned houses can inflict fire and water damage on adjacent houses, neighboring property owners have encountered, sometimes insurmountable, difficulties in obtaining casualty and liability insurance for their own properties.[72] The lack of such basic protection can make mortgage financing unavailable or even cause a current mortgage loan to be declared in default despite the owner being current on his or her monthly payments.[73] Given the variety of serious spillover effects, one can easily imagine how a lone vacant house can diminish the value of compliant houses within a block or two by 1.5% to 3%.[74]

Given the severity of the impact of abandonment, local governments would apparently be well-served to aggressively pursue enforcement of any relevant code in all cases. And indeed, addressing vacant properties has become an urgent priority for many older cities. But, the market conditions of a neighborhood dramatically impact the ability of code enforcement authorities to compel the rehabilitation of dilapidated houses.

---

71. Brian Nordli, Boy Killed in Fire was Playing with Brother Inside Vacant Home, LAS VEGAS SUN (May 2, 2013, 5:15 PM), http://www.lasvegassun.com/news/2013/may/02/house-fire-claims-life-las-vegas-child.

72. MARGARET BASS ET AL., VACANT PROPERTIES: THE TRUE COST TO COMMUNITIES 11 (2005).

73. See e.g., Federal National Mortgage Association Indiana Mortgage Form, FANNIE MAE §5, https://www.fanniemae.com/singlefamily/security-instruments (last visited Apr. 11, 2016); Federal National Mortgage Association Multistate Fixed-Rate Note, FANNIE MAE § 10, https://www.fanniemae.com/singlefamily/notes (last visited Apr. 11, 2016).

74. Stephan Whitaker & Thomas J. Fitzpatrick IV, The Impact of Vacant, Tax-Delinquent, and Foreclosed Property on Sales Prices of Neighboring Homes 35 (Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland Working Paper 11-23R).

An example will illustrate the impact of neighborhood real estate markets. Imagine a freestanding wood-frame house with 1,500 square feet of interior space. If this house has been unoccupied and neglected for more than a year or two, it may have sustained significant damage to the exterior doors and windows exposing its interior to the elements. At $50 per square foot, a conservative, full-scale attempt to bring this vacant house into full code compliance would cost $75,000. Even properties that can be made ready for occupancy for substantially less nearly always require more cash than a typical owner would have on hand for ordinary repairs.[75] Since elimination of a vacant house nuisance always involves a major capital investment, no sensible response strategy can ignore the importance of the return on that investment. Even if an owner is willing to make repair expenditures that cannot be recaptured through increased use, income, or resale value, no lender may be willing to provide the necessary funds. With so much money involved, the financial feasibility of that capital investment often dictates whether or not it goes forward, the owner's obligations under local codes notwithstanding.

Nothing limits the ability of a property to make a return on rehabilitation investment more than the weakness of the surrounding real estate market. If nearby houses, even ones not impacted directly by the abandoned property, are not selling for more than $50,000, it is unlikely that a $75,000 investment will pay off for the renovating owner of the vacant house. In many Rust Belt inner-city neighborhoods, inhabitable homes can be purchased for less than $25,000. But, if such properties are allowed to fall into severe disrepair, their rehabilitation will not necessarily be achievable for less than $25,000. As such, their owners may simply walk away from them rather than throw good money after bad.

Local building codes allow authorities to impose fines and even seek court orders against owners that fail to bring vacant properties into basic code compliance.[76] But, even these powerful

---

75. Leila Atassi, Cleveland's Glut of Vacant Housing Could Cost Billions to Eliminate at Current Pace, CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER (Sept. 25, 2011, 3:02 PM), http://www.cleveland.com/metro/index.ssf/2012/09/clevelands_glut_of_vacant_hous.html.

76. See e.g., INT'L BLDG. CODE § 116.1 (2012); IND. CODE §36-7-9-1 (2015).

remedies will have limited impact on an owner that lacks the cash to return the property to productive use. They certainly will not induce a third party to buy the property and make a clearly bad bet by rehabbing the house. Likewise, no court order or fines will induce a bank to lend the desperate owner money on such a property, even if it happens to be free and clear of any preexisting mortgages. For those relatively few owners with the available resources to bring the property up to code, coercion may make all the difference. Even here though, courts may be reluctant to require them to make the property habitable if more modest means of mitigating the nuisance effects on surrounding properties are available.

For those vacant properties, however, located in neighborhoods with stronger real estate markets, the prospects are quite different. Once renovated, a formerly vacant property should be able to command the same rent or sale price as comparable properties on the same block. If those values are sufficient to justify the cost of the renovation, then the question shifts from whether, when or how the repairs are to be made to why not immediately, especially when code enforcement looms as an additional inducement. Many times, a financially prudent renovation of a vacant house is delayed indefinitely by an owner's unwillingness or ability to carry out the repairs. Coercion by code enforcement remedies functions to force such an owner to internalize the costs imposed on the neighborhood. If the owner is incapable of bringing about the repairs, then a voluntary sale may be the best solution. If the owner's obstinacy, total absence, or title problems with the property limit the prospects of market transfer, then a more innovative code enforcement procedure may be needed.

In the early 1990's, the City of Baltimore amended its Building Code to create a special proceeding that authorized a court to appoint a receiver for an unoccupied residential property with serious, long-standing code violations.[77] Like receivership remedies for occupied multifamily buildings that had been enacted in large cities, this vacant house receivership proceeding authorized the receiver to place a super-priority lien against the property for any code-related expenses incurred. Unlike those preexisting approaches, however, the Baltimore version of receivership allowed for an almost immediate foreclosure on that lien, if the owner or one of the affected mortgagees did not step forward and commit to immediate elimination of the code violations.[78] The ordinance provided for a special auction process that required the foreclosing receiver to ensure that all bidders were ready, willing, and able to bring the property into full code compliance.[79] Although this pre-renovation sale remedy is far from universal, Ohio and Indiana have also enacted similar vacant building receivership provisions.[80] As more jurisdictions see the benefit of being able to "fire" an owner unwilling or incapable of renovating his or her property, neighborhoods still strong enough to support renovations of their vacant properties will have the legal means to achieve them.

77. BUILDING, FIRE, AND RELATED CODES OF BALTIMORE CITY §121 (2013).

Comparing the truly distressed areas with stronger neighborhoods, we see that vacant properties virtually identical in their defects may have completely different futures depending on the values of the occupied properties around them. Neighborhood market strength so strongly determines the economic feasibility of major repairs that even equally aggressive code enforcement in each situation will not significantly improve the rehabilitation prospects for the vacant house in the deteriorated neighborhood. Those houses will not be fixed up one at a time. Rather, investment in them needs to be coordinated. For this reason, cities dealing with large, concentrated inventories of vacant houses have turned to land banking.

Land banking is nothing more than the large-scale acquisition of vacant properties for subsequent return to productive use. Tax foreclosure of delinquent houses and lots allows for land assembly and a bundled disposition process. Land banking strategies can work in tandem with demolition of vacant houses to create usable open space in severely undercrowded neighborhoods. Newly created vacant lots can be made available to neighboring homeowners as side yards and to community greening groups as vegetable gardens and pocket parks. By gaining control and taking responsibility for vacant properties right now, land banks can set the stage for a grounded move forward for communities contending with decades of demographic decline. But, while land banking may offer a viable future to the distressed neighborhood, it does so on a much more extended timetable than the revitalization offered to the healthier neighborhoods receiving targeted, aggressive code enforcement.

78. Id.; see James J. Kelly, Refreshing the Heart of the City: Vacant Building Receivership as a Tool for Neighborhood Revitalization and Community Empowerment, 13 J. AFFORDABLE HOUS. & CMTY. DEV. L. 210, 217 (2004).

79. BUILDING, FIRE, AND RELATED CODES OF BALTIMORE CITY §121.

80. OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 3767.41 (2015); IND. CODE §36-7-9-20 (2015).

One neighborhood receives immediate renovation of its remaining vacant properties while another receives demolitions and long-term plans for future revitalization. The Fair Housing Act implications of the stark difference, at least in the short run, between these governmental responses becomes more clear when we recognize that the truly distressed neighborhoods, especially in older cities in the Northeast and the Midwest, are overwhelmingly occupied by African-Americans. On the other hand, the healthier neighborhoods, even in cities with large African-American populations, tend to be a mix of majority-white and majority-black areas. Rather than closing the gap between Racially Concentrated Areas of Poverty and more viable neighborhoods, market-sensitive code enforcement and land banking seem to be reinforcing and, possibly, expanding it.

Scholars have argued about whether choices made to save those neighborhoods that can be saved while letting others slip away constitute "planned abandonment" of African-American communities.[81] While such academic discussions have continuing relevance, jurisdictions depending on CDBG and other HUD funds for their community development programs will certainly be more focused on the recriminations that may come their way as part of the AFH-required community comment process. As market-sensitive vacant property strategies are facially race neutral, they will be as safe from accusations of deliberate discrimination as nearly all local government policies are. Code enforcement strategies, however, that deliver immediate results in many white-majority neighborhoods while offering only distant hope for poor, black areas would seem to raise serious disparate impact issues. But, the case outlined above for market-sensitive code enforcement addresses not only justification but also causation. That is, the argument for not pursuing repair orders as aggressively in the distressed neighborhoods as in healthier blocks is not based on the contention that the resulting renovations would not be enough to significantly improve the more deteriorated communities. Rather, the reality is that more aggressive prosecution of repair orders would not produce any meaningful number of full-scale rehabilitations at all. When it is known that diligent effort will produce only failure, the decision not to even try cannot be said to be the cause of the lack of success.

81. In Planned Abandonment: The Neighborhood Life-Cycle Theory and National Urban Policy, 11 HOUSING POL'Y DEBATE 7 (2000), John Metzger attacked Anthony Downs "[t]riage planning [as] the synthesis of the redlining thesis and the postriot FHA [greenlining to promote neighborhood stability] antithesis." Id. at 24. Metzger defined triage planning as the "target[ing of] federal funds to neighborhoods where there was a moderate decline in property values but not yet a clear downward trend of population loss, housing abandonment, and increasing poverty." Id. at 17. For a response by Downs and others, see Anthony Downs, Comment on John T. Metzger's "Planned Abandonment: The Neighborhood Life-Cycle Theory and National Urban Policy," 11 HOUSING POL'Y DEBATE 41 (2000); George C. Galster, Comment on John T. Metzger's "Planned Abandonment: The Neighborhood Life-Cycle Theory and National Urban Policy"(2), 11 HOUSING POL'Y DEBATE 61 (2000), and Kenneth Temkin, "Comment on John T. Metzger's "Planned Abandonment: The Neighborhood

Nevertheless, it is true that targeting code enforcement resources on the relatively few vacant properties in healthy neighborhoods will not only keep those areas from becoming unable to support individual, uncoordinated renovations but also set them on a path to a decidedly brighter immediate future than the more distressed communities. To the extent that these resurgent neighborhoods have smaller proportions of African-American residents, these revitalization efforts will disproportionately benefit a city's white residents. For this reason, it is vital that market-sensitive code enforcement be accompanied by meaningful land banking efforts so that the gap between a distressed neighborhood and a healthy one can eventually be diminished rather than increased.

Substantive land banking efforts require publicly funded resources. A city housing agency or a specially created land bank authority has been given by the state legislature the ability to obtain the right to foreclose on tax-delinquent vacant houses and lots without having to pay the full amount of taxes owed on the properties.[82] Even so, there will be substantial costs in obtaining the necessary information about the titles to these properties and notifying the various stakeholders of their final chance to redeem their interests by paying off the tax debts completely. Once the property is acquired, the land bank will need to spend money to minimize any nuisances associated with the property and to market it for return to productive use. City officials can hope that the sale or rental of properties owned by the land bank might fund these activities, but it is unlikely that land banks focusing on distressed neighborhoods will be self-sustaining. If the value to be gained from assembling dilapidated properties and bundling them for sale clearly produced short-term gain, then there would be little need in the first place for public intervention. Leading national experts call upon land banking advocates to argue for public funding for a land bank "by showing that its activities provide a significant return to the local treasury, either in the form of revenues from property sales or tax revenues generated from properties being placed back in productive use."[83]

---

Life-Cycle Theory and National Urban Policy" (3), 11 HOUSING POL'Y DEBATE 55 (2000).

HUD acknowledges that AFFH cannot be used to mandate specific spending priorities. Local governments engaged in market-sensitive vacant property strategies retain the discretion as to when, if at all, they pursue land banking in their distressed neighborhoods. If, however, jurisdictions use CDBG funds to aggressively pursue repair orders in viable neighborhood real estate markets and do nothing to stabilize the markets in more distressed neighborhoods, then those jurisdictions will face great difficulties in showing their overall approach to neighborhood revitalization mitigates rather than aggravates racial segregation and the relative lack of decent, affordable housing options for their residents of color.

A local government's commitment to land banking may allow it to argue very persuasively in its AFH report that it has a long-term plan to promote the viability of its racially concentrated areas of poverty. But two aspects of land banking may alienate members of the community anxious to see their neighborhood restored to its former vitality: the message of defeat communicated by house demolition and the common land-banking practice of selling properties in bundles rather than in single lots. The dangers associated with long-term abandonment of vacant properties[84] require that land banks seriously consider demolishing the houses rather than continuously securing them against entry and the elements. Tearing down these houses sends a clear signal that rehabilitation of these and similar properties in the neighborhood is not feasible. In February 2014, the Mayor of South Bend announced that the City would transform 1,000 vacant houses in 1,000 days. Even though the overwhelming majority of the properties were located in severely distressed neighborhoods,[85] the City was able to renovate 378 of those properties while the rest were demolished.[86] While some might see this as an unexpectedly positive result, some of the owners of the demolished properties feel that they were deprived of the opportunity to fix up the houses they owned. Regina Williams-Preston lost to demolition three such houses that she and her husband had recently purchased after he unexpectedly fell ill.[87] They wanted to be part of a grassroots effort but were unable to convince the City to give them the time they needed to complete renovations. It is not clear whether the City's decisions were based on the weakness of the neighborhood market or on the owners' inability to bring the properties into code compliance right away or some combination of both. What is clear is that Ms. Williams-Preston, as a newly elected member of the South Bend Common

---

82. Frank S. Alexander, Ctr. for Cmty. Progress, Land Banks and Land Banking 76–77 (2011).

83. MALLACH, supra note 16, at 141.

84. See supra notes 76–77 and accompanying text.

85. CITY OF SOUTH BEND, VACANT AND ABANDONED PROPERTIES TASK FORCE REPORT 10 (2013), http://southbendin.gov/sites/default/files/files/Code_FinalVATF_Report_2_red.pdf.

86. Erin Blasko, City Reaches its Vacant and Abandoned Housing Goal, SOUTH BEND TRIBUNE (Sept. 23, 2015), http://www.southbendtribune.com/news/local/south-bend-reaches-vacant-and-abandoned-housing-goal/article_9ec592d9-efec-52e4-b1ed-45f892ac18ae.html.

87. Erin Blasko, Candidate: House Issues Due to Illness, SOUTH BEND TRIBUNE (April 12, 2015), http://www.southbendtribune.com/news/local/candidate-house-issues-due-to-illness/article_f1c751bb-a348-5ace-8545-955815c068d2.html.

Council, wants to explore the racial justice issues raised by the aggressive use of demolition orders in distressed neighborhoods.[88]

Apart from its reliance on demolition, land banking can also frustrate grassroots advocates of revitalization when it advocates that vacant properties be sold in bundles rather than one at a time. When repair orders on vacant houses were not aggressively pursued because the neighborhood market was found to be too weak, those responsible for disposing of these same vacant houses and lots may be skeptical of a development proposal limited to just one property. Land bank staff may determine that it is in the long-term interest of the neighborhood to make sure the properties go to a developer that can create or renovate several houses together and achieve a return that would be unlikely in the case of a much smaller change in the neighborhood. Such developers may have significant resources and be relatively unknown to the long-time members of the community. With both the demolition and bundled disposition aspects of land banking work, local governments committed to the long-term viability must work to involve members of the community in these decisions or be prepared to face widespread backlash after inviting community comments about the fair housing aspects of their land banking efforts. Because the challenges that the AFH process presents to a local government taking innovative approaches to vacant properties arise from the AFH community input component, it is critical that land banks not only practice social equity but also communicate with and involve those most affected by their work.

Even success in land banking can raise racial justice concerns. Once a distressed neighborhood has gained traction with people shopping for places to live, the history and lore of gentrification recast residents from their previous roles as disregarded persons into their new identities as potentially displaced persons. After decades of enduring urban renewal and revitalization efforts, inner-city residents of color have come to believe that if the neighborhood they live in is being improved by money from outside the community, then the intention is to improve it for someone other than them. As a form of urban revitalization that seeks to reestab-

88. District 2: Regina Williams-Preston, CITY OF SOUTH BEND, INDIANA, https://www.southbendin.gov/government/content/district-2-regina-williams-preston (last visited Apr. 11, 2016).

lish market activity in distressed neighborhoods, land banks do in fact seek to make these communities attractive to households that have an array of choices of where they can live. Achieving these goals can raise property taxes and rents for residents and small businesses in the community. Since land banks bring potential sites for decent, affordable homes into government ownership, it is entirely reasonable for housing advocates to insist that all, or at least some, of those properties be dedicated to the needs of low- and moderate-income residents. The Community Land Trust ("CLT") model has been put forward as an ideal solution especially in cities such as Philadelphia and Baltimore, where large-scale abandonment exists side-by-side with very exclusive residential development.[89] Community Land Trusts are democratically controlled, nonprofit organizations dedicated to holding land for the benefit of local communities.[90] They typically focus on creating and stewarding permanently affordable owner-occupied homes.[91] The legal mechanisms they use to allow homes to be affordable not only to the original owners but also to future owners as well are uniquely effective with single-family homes.[92] Advocates of equitable development have argued that it is never too soon to plan for high land values and the attendant lack of affordable housing.[93] While a CLT can play a key role in insuring that a reinvigorated real estate market does not drive out the very people who revitalized the community, other measures may also further the goal of

89. Jill Feldstein, Winning a Land Bank We Can Trust, SHELTERFORCE (Oct. 2, 2014), http://www.shelterforce.org/article/3910/winning_a_land_bank_we_can_trust2/; BALTIMORE HOUSING ROUNDTABLE, COMMUNITY + LAND + TRUST: TOOLS FOR DEVELOPMENT WITHOUT DISPLACEMENT 24–35 (2015), https://d3n8a8pro7vhmx.cloudfront.net/unitedworkers/pages/239/attachments/original/1453986068/C_L_T_web.pdf?1453986068.

90. James J. Kelly, Jr., Land Trusts that Conserve Communities, 59 DEPAUL L. REV. 69, 79–81 (2009).

91. Id. at 82.

92. James J. Kelly, Jr. Homes Affordable for Good: Covenants and Ground Leases as Long-Term Resale Restriction Devices, 29 ST. LOUIS U. PUB. L. REV. 9, 38 (2009).

93. SHELTERFORCE, THE ANSWER: WHAT'S THE POINT OF SHARED-EQUITY HOMEOWNERSHIP IN WEAK MARKET AREAS (2015), http://cltnetwork.org/wp-content/uploads/2014/04/CLTs-and-Land-Banks-Article1.pdf.

community conservation.[94] Long-time homeowners, especially the elderly, or others living of fixed incomes, may be pressured to sell if rising land values in their neighborhood dramatically increase their property tax burdens.[95] Broad or targeted protections against such increases may promote the socioeconomic diversity in an increasingly attractive neighborhood that can be a core goal of an AFFH strategy.[96]

Whether responding to charges of redlining or making the case for their own AFFH efforts, local governments involved in land banking not only need to get those reading their AFH reports to think in the long term, they must do so themselves. Land banks cannot be just an excuse for not deploying more code enforcement resources to a distressed neighborhood. There must be a long-haul commitment not only to mitigating vacant property nuisances here and now but also reconnecting these communities to the good, services and housing consumers of the metropolitan area. Until this point, this Article has looked at the AFH as a challenge for any community wishing to justify market-sensitive vacant property strategies. But this mechanism for fair housing accountability can also deliver real benefits to cities struggling to get their land banking activities underway.

As noted above,[97] land banks depend largely on tax foreclosure to acquire clear title to the hundreds and thousands of vacant houses and lots in their designated territories. In most states, property tax collection processes are controlled by county governments. Municipal land banks that wish to acquire vacant properties through tax foreclosure often need to go "hat in hand" asking the county for the ability to acquire those vacant properties without having to pay the full balance of the outstanding liens. Sometimes, tax foreclosure reforms enacted at the state level, often as part of push to implement land banking, will give the cities the ability to purchase the tax liens at or below the actual value of the property rather than at the, often much higher, total amount of the public liens on the abandoned property.

---

94. James J. Kelly, Jr., Sustaining Neighborhoods of Choice: From Land Bank(ing) to Land Trust(ing), 54 WASHBURN L. J. 613, 621-22 (2015)

95. Id. at 623.

96. Id. at 622–24.

97. See supra note 84 and accompanying text.

In slow-growth regions with entitlement jurisdictions cities, the surrounding counties themselves not only receive but depend upon Community Development Block Grant funds for their own economic development and neighborhood stabilization work. Their obligation to deal with regional fair housing issues in their AFFH reporting can be an opportunity for cities to exert pressure on them to collaborate in stabilizing inner-city neighborhoods through tax foreclosure reforms that allow land banks to acquire clear title over vacant properties. But, these reforms are far from universal and, where they are lacking, cities remain beholden to counties in their efforts to reconnect distressed neighborhood vacant properties to a functioning real estate market.

As already described,[98] HUD cannot use AFFH to invalidate a policy or practice that is not itself prohibited by law. But, when a county government refuses to release liens or lower the minimum tax sale bid on a vacant property in a city and has no valid reason for doing so, the consequences of that decision for the city's AFFH efforts to create a community with sustainable socioeconomic diversity makes the county's refusal an AFFH issue. Even if the county and the city do not submit a joint AFH, the community input process may allow for several ways for the county to be confronted with its obstruction of revitalization efforts within the municipal boundaries.

98. See supra note 37 and accompanying text.

Inclusive Communities: Geographic Desegregation, Urban Revitalization, and Disparate Impact Under the Fair Housing Act

J. WILLIAM CALLISON*

I. INTRODUCTION 1039
II. THE INCLUSIVE COMMUNITIES CASE......................................1042
III. OBSERVATIONS 1048
IV. CONCLUSION...1054

I. INTRODUCTION

Housing, and in particular affordable housing, is a critical element of urban revitalization for at least two reasons. First, the placement and design of a revitalized community will depend on the extent that it is residential and affordable in nature. Second, the availability of financial resources may depend, at least to some degree, on whether affordable housing is part of the overall revitalization effort.[1]

Both the placement question and the finance question have been part of the affordable housing and community revitalization dialog for many years. Some have argued that the emphasis should be on community development strategies that upgrade the places where people are already living; others have argued that mandates of justice dictate residential integration and changing where people can choose to live.[2] In my view, it is necessary to determine which

---

* Partner, Faegre Baker Daniels LLP, Denver, Colorado.

1. See J. William Callison, Achieving Our Country: Geographic Desegregation and the Low-Income Housing Tax Credit, 19 S. CAL. REV. OF LAW & SOC. JUST. 101 (2010) (discussing project financing using low-income housing tax credits).

2. One community development goal encourages investment in low-income communities, thus "making separate equal." See Elizabeth K. Julian, Fair Housing and Community Development: Time to Come Together, 41 IND. L.

REV. 555, 555, 557–58 (2008) (noting the 1968 Kerner Commission report's declaration that the country was "moving toward two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal"; stating that the progressive fair housing and community development movements "have seemed to operate in parallel universes and, at worst, have reflected tension and even conflict that belie their common commitment to social and racial justice[,]"; and arguing that this is a false dichotomy that must be overcome). Another view encourages geographic desegregation. See Owen M. Fiss, What Should Be Done for Those Who Have Been Left Behind?, in A WAY OUT: AMERICA'S GHETTOS AND THE LEGACY OF RACISM 3 (Joshua Cohen, et al. eds., 2003). These issues predate the 1968 Fair Housing Act. See THURSTON CLARKE, THE LAST CAMPAIGN: ROBERT F. KENNEDY AND 82 DAYS THAT INSPIRED AMERICA 258–60 (2008) (comparing Eugene McCarthy's and Robert Kennedy's urban plans); ARTHUR MEIER SCHLESINGER, JR., ROBERT KENNEDY AND HIS TIMES 785–89 (1978) (discussing Kennedy's Bedford-Stuyvesant plan). For a historian's perspective, see THOMAS J. SUGRUE, THE ORIGINS OF THE URBAN CRISIS: RACE AND INEQUALITY IN POSTWAR DETROIT 181–209 (1996). See also Philip D. Tegeler, The Persistence of Segregation in Government Housing Program, in THE GEOGRAPHY OF OPPORTUNITY: RACE AND HOUSING CHOICE IN METROPOLITAN AMERICA 197 (Xavier de Souza Briggs ed., 2005) (noting that the most important low-income housing development programs are largely unregulated from a civil rights perspective; stating that this reflects a growing emphasis on community revitalization strategies (upgrading the places where disadvantaged people are already living) while efforts to promote residential integration (changing where people can and do choose to live) have faced repeated and seemingly intractable obstacles). Xavier de Souza Briggs argues that public debate over housing policy tends to ignore a "crucial distinction":

> Framed as a question of strategy, the distinction is this: Should we emphasize reducing segregation by race and class (through what I term 'cure' strategies), or should we emphasize reducing its terrible social costs without trying to reduce the extent of segregation itself to any significant degree (via 'mitigation' strategies)? Put differently, should we invest in changing where people are willing and able to live, or should we try to transform the mechanisms that link a person's place of residence to their opportunity set? . . . For ethical and practical reasons, it is hard to imagine choosing one strategy, always and everywhere, instead of the other . . . .

Xavier de Souza Briggs, Politics and Policy: Changing the Geography of Opportunity, in THE GEOGRAPHY OF OPPORTUNITY: RACE AND HOUSING CHOICE IN METROPOLITAN AMERICA 310, 329 (Xavier de Souza Briggs ed., 2005). In a more positive vein, although building subsidized housing in high-poverty neighborhoods may initially heighten poverty concentration, it can be argued that over time there will be a lessening of poverty concentration as neighborhoods improve approach is to be taken, or more likely to determine the appropriate balance between the two approaches, as part of any overall community revitalization plan. As with other discussions of this nature, the law plays a significant role in resolving affordable housing siting questions, raising questions involving both the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause and the Fair Housing Act of 1968 ("FHA").

In order to claim that the siting of housing violates the Constitution's Equal Protection Clause, a plaintiff must be a member of a constitutionally protected class and must plead, and ultimately prove, that the complained-of action or inaction constituted "disparate treatment" resulting from a "[racially] discriminatory purpose."[3] Stated differently, an Equal Protection Clause claim cannot be based on disproportionate effect absent a showing of intent. Since most actors have the sophistication to avoid announcing their discriminatory intent, proof of intent generally relies on circumstantial evidence.[4] Proving intent is thus exceedingly difficult, and housing discrimination cases generally cannot be brought as a constitutional matter. In addition, discriminatory practices often occur due to structural, systematic causes, entirely without specific intent; in such cases, a disparate treatment claim would fail.

Based on the general unavailability of equal protection claims in the housing arena, the focus of this article is on the FHA, particularly on the application of the disparate impact theory under and higher-income people move into them. In this view, the LIHTC program is a tool for both neighborhood revitalization and neighborhood integration.

---

3. See Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 238–39 (1976), for a discussion on employment discrimination. See Village of Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252 (1977), for a discussion of plaintiff's burden in cases alleging housing discrimination.

4. Under McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792, 802–04 (1973), the Supreme Court adopted a burden-shifting analysis which, in order to prove discriminatory intent, plaintiffs must disprove legitimate reasons offered by the defendant for the defendant's actions. See Tex. Dep't of Cmty. Affairs v. Burdine, 450 U.S. 248, 253–56 (1981) (holding that a defendant need only "articulate legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason" to rebut an allegation of intent. St. Mary's Honor Center v. Hicks, 509 U.S. 502, 519 (1993) (explaining that even if trial court disbelieves defendant's offered legitimate purpose, verdict does not automatically follow).

the FHA. Courts have recognized that statutory claims can be brought under the FHA using a disparate impact theory, which directs tribunals to consider the racial effects of facially neutral, unintentional practices.[5] In a disparate impact case, the plaintiff does not need to show intentional discrimination.[6] Instead, the plaintiff needs to demonstrate that the defendant has engaged in practices that have a "disproportionately adverse effect on minorities" or other statutorily protected group and show that the practices or policies are not justified by a legitimate governmental rationale.[7] Given the infirmity of constitutional discrimination claims, if there were no disparate impact basis, there would likely be significantly fewer civil rights claims brought under the FHA. Historically, all federal appellate courts have recognized claims for FHA violations under a disparate impact theory.[8] Since the courts of appeals were unanimous in the conclusion that the FHA can be violated through disparate impact, there was concern that the United States Supreme Court's repeated acceptance of these cases on certiorari indicated that the Court was likely to reverse the field and hold that disparate impact claims are not cognizable under the FHA.[9] It did not do so, as the next part of this article demonstrates.

II. THE INCLUSIVE COMMUNITIES CASE

In Texas Department of Housing and Community Affairs v. Inclusive Communities Project, Inc.,[10] the Inclusive Communities

---

5. See Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424 (1971), for a decision regarding employment discrimination. For a decision regarding housing discrimination, see United States v. City of Black Jack, 508 F.2d 1179 (8th Cir. 1974). A recent Supreme Court case limited Title VII's disparate impact doctrine with respect to employment discrimination, and created concern whether the doctrine ultimately could withstand constitutional scrutiny. Ricci v. DeStefano, 557 U.S. 557, 584–85, 593 (2009).

6. See Ricci, 557 U.S. at 577.

7. Id.

8. Most of the appellate cases are cited in Tex. Dep't of Cmty. Affairs v. Inclusive Cmtys. Project, Inc. (Inclusive Cmtys. Project III), 135 S. Ct. 2507, 2519 (2015).

9. See Twp. of Mount. Holly v. Mount Holly Gardens Citizens in Action, Inc., 658 F.3d 375, cert. granted, 133 S. Ct. 2824 (2013); Magner v. Gallagher, 636 F.3d 380, cert. granted, 132 S. Ct. 548 (2011).

10. 132 S. Ct. 2507.

Project ("ICP"), a nonprofit corporation that promotes housing integration in the Dallas area, alleged that the Texas Department of Housing and Community Affairs ("TDHCA") violated FHA sections 804(a)[11] and 805(a)[12] by allocating too many low-income housing tax credits ("LIHTC") for housing in inner-city neighborhoods and too few for housing in suburban neighborhoods.[13] ICP argued that TDHCA's allocation plan ceased to prioritize the goal of desegregation and caused minorities to be segregated in poor areas of Dallas.[14] TDHCA argued that it legitimately prioritized high-poverty neighborhoods, which often require investment and may have outdated housing stock.[15] The district court accepted ICP's statistical evidence of a disparity in LIHTC allocations and concluded that ICP had established a prima facie disparate impact case.[16] The district court then shifted the burden to TDHCA to 11. Section 804(a) provides that it shall be unlawful: "To refuse to sell or rent after the making of a bona fide offer, or to refuse to negotiate for the sale or rental of, or otherwise make unavailable or deny, a dwelling to any person because of race, color, religion, sex, familial status, or national origin." 42 U.S.C. § 3604(a) (2014).

---

12. Section 805(a) provides: "It shall be unlawful for any person or other entity whose business includes engaging in real estate-related transactions to discriminate against any person in making available such a tion, [533] or in the terms or conditions of such a transaction, because of race, color, religion, sex, handicap, familial status, or national origin." 42 U.S.C. § 3605(a) (2014).

13. Inclusive Comtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2514; see Callison, supra note 1, at 231–33 (discussing LIHTC allocations). From 1989 to 2008, TDHCA allocated LIHTCs for 49.7% of proposed non-elderly housing projects in areas where white individuals and families made up less than 10% of the population, while allocating LIHTCs for 37.4% of non-elderly housing projects in areas where more than 90% of the population was white. In Dallas, 92.29% of all housing units built using LIHTC financing were located in majority-minority census tracts. Inclusive Cmtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2514.

14. Inclusive Cmtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2514.

15. Inclusive Cmtys. Project Inc. v. Tex. Dept. of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs (Inclusive Cmtys. Project I), 860 F. Supp. 2d 312, 319 (N.D. Tex. 2012). Building low-income housing in high-poverty neighborhoods arguably perpetuates segregation by economic class, and ICP argued that it perpetuated racial segregation as well.

16. Inclusive Cmtys Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2514. The district court also held that ICP failed to prove its intentional discrimination claims. Inclusive Cmtys. I, 860 F. Supp. 2d at 319.

prove that its stated interests in the allocation were legitimate and that there were no less discriminatory alternatives available.[17] The court assumed the legitimacy question but held that TDHCA failed to prove there were no less discriminatory alternatives to the challenged allocations.[18] The court subsequently issued a remedial order requiring TDHCA to add additional selection criteria for its LIHTC allocations, including awarding points for projects constructed in neighborhoods with good schools and disqualifying projects located in high crime areas.[19]

On appeal, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals assumed that ICP established its prima facie case and addressed only the issue of whether the trial court had applied the appropriate burden-shifting standard to TDHCA.[20] The appellate court noted that different appellate courts had applied different standards and that following the district court's decision HUD had issued fair housing regulations setting forth a burden-shifting standard.[21] The Fifth Circuit adopted HUD's approach and remanded the case so that the trial court could consider and apply the HUD regulations.[22]

The concurring opinion stated that, on remand, the trial court also "should reconsider the State's forceful argument that [ICP] did not prove a facially neutral practice that caused the ob-

---

17. Inclusive Cmtys. Project, Inc. v. Tex. Dept. of Hous. & Cmty Affairs (Inclusive Cmtys. Project II), 747 F.3d 275, 279–81 (5th Cir. 2014).

18. Id. at 279–80.

19. Id. at 280.

20. Id. at 280–81.

21. Id. at 280–282; see Implementation of the Fair Housing Act's Discriminatory Effects Standard, 78 Fed. Reg. 11460, 11482 (Feb. 15, 2013) (to be codified at 23 C.F.R. pt. 100). The HUD regulations interpret the FHA to encompass disparate impact liability and establish a burden-shifting framework for disparate impact claims. Id. A plaintiff must first make a prima facie case of disparate impact and cannot make such a case if a statistical discrepancy is caused by factors other than the defendant's practice. Id. After a plaintiff makes a prima facie showing, the burden shifts to the defendant to show that the challenged practice is necessary to achieve one or more substantial, legitimate and nondiscriminatory purposes. Id. The plaintiff can then present evidence that the same purposes can be accomplished without discriminatory effect. Id. Although the Inclusive Communities decision generally follows the approach taken in the HUD regulations, it is not grounded in deference to the regulatory agency. Inclusive Cmtys. Project II, 747 F.3d at 282.

22. Inclusive Cmtys Project II, 747 F.3d at 282–83.

served disparity" in LIHTC allocations.[23] It noted that Supreme Court employment discrimination decisions had required more than statistical evidence of a disparity to establish a prima facie case and to shift the burden, and that "plaintiff must specifically identify the facially neutral policy that caused the disparity" in order to avoid dismissal of the case.[24] The concurring opinion also noted that there are numerous criteria for allocating LIHTCs and that the allocation process is "anything but simple."[25] In particular, the concurrence stated that the LIHTC statute advantages projects "located in low income census tracts or subject to a community revitalization plan" and that ICP essentially seeks "a larger share of the fixed pool of tax credits at the expense of other low-income people who might prefer community revitalization."[26] As will be seen, the concurring opinion heavily influenced the Supreme Court's ultimate decision.

The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to review the following question: "Whether disparate impact claims cognizable under the Fair Housing Act?"[27] Writing for a 5-4 majority, Justice Kennedy applied traditional canons of statutory interpretation to conclude that disparate impact claims are legally cognizable but also noted important limitations on the use of disparate impact theory that demonstrate the Court's current conception of the relationship between race and law.[28]

With respect to cognizability, TDHCA argued that statutory differences between the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"), which the Court previously held supports disparate impact liability, and the FHA demonstrate that disparate impact liability is unsupported by the FHA.[29] The Court rejected this ar-

---

23. Id. at 283–84 (Jones, J., concurring).
24. See id. at 283.
25. Id. at 284.
26. Id.
27. Inclusive Cmtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2513.
28. Id. at 2525.
29. See Smith v. City of Jackson, 544 U.S. 228 (2005). In Smith, a plurality of the Court held that section 4(a)(2) of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act ("ADEA"), which prohibits acts that "otherwise adversely affect" an employee because of his or her age supports a disparate impact claim and held that "the text focuses on the effects of the action on the employee rather than the motivation for the action of the employer." 544 U.S. at 235–36. A gument and held that there was sufficient evidence of congressional intent that the FHA supports disparate impact claims.[30] Specifically, the Court stated that the phrase "otherwise made unavailable" in FHA section 804(a) "refers to the consequences of an action rather than the actor's intent."[31] The Court also noted that FHA was amended in 1988 after nine courts of appeal had concluded that the FHA encompassed disparate impact claims. This constituted "convincing support" for a conclusion that Congress accepted and ratified the disparate impact rulings.[32] Finally, the Court recognized that the FHA's "central purpose" was served by recognizing disparate impact liability because it roots out systemic problems that have the effect of perpetuating segregation.[33] In addition, it "plays a role in uncovering discriminatory intent" by allowing "plaintiffs to counteract unconscious prejudices and disguised animus that escapes easy classification as disparate treatment."[34]

However, in dictum the Court articulated "cautionary standards" and stated "disparate-impact liability has always been properly limited in key respects that avoid the serious constitutional questions that might arise under the FHA, e.g., if such liability were imposed based solely on a showing of statistical disparity."[35] The Court warned against taking an approach to disparate impact concurring opinion in Smith noted that ADEA section 4(a)(1)'s "because of" language required discriminatory intent and thus did not support disparate impact liability. Id. at 251. TDHCA argued that since the FHA does not contain "otherwise adversely affect" language but only "because of" language, FHA violations require a showing of discriminatory intent. *Inclusive Cmtys. Project II*I, 135 S. Ct. at 2519.

---

30. Inclusive Cmtys.Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2519–20.

31. Id. at 2511. This "results-oriented language" was similar to provisions in Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1984, which was construed to allow disparate impact claims in Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424 (1971), and ADEA section 4(c), discussed in Smith. Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 436 (1971); Smith, 554 U.S. at 240.

32. Inclusive Cmtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2520.

33. Id. at 2521–22.

34. Id. at 2522.

35. Id. at 2524, 2512. The fact that the Court's stated limitations on disparate impact analysis are dicta, and thus probably do not have stare decisis effect, point to the importance of the Court's composition in future fair housing cases.

liability that "may be seen simply as an attempt to second-guess which of two reasonable approaches [TDHCA] should follow in the sound exercise of its discretion" in making LIHTC allocations.[36] Instead, housing authorities and private developers should be given leeway to state and explain the valid interests served by their policies.[37] Similarly, courts should not "impose onerous costs on actors who encourage revitalizing dilapidated housing in our Nation's cities merely because some other priority may seem preferable."[38] The Court thus adopted a deferential attitude toward TDHCA's decisions.

Citing to its earlier decision in Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Antonio,[39] the Court stated, "[A] disparate-impact claim that relies on a statistical disparity must fail if the plaintiff cannot point to a defendant's policy or policies causing that disparity."[40] Further, the Court stated that "policies are not contrary to the disparate-impact requirement unless they are 'artificial, arbitrary, and unnecessary barriers'" to housing.[41] This "barrier" requirement stands in contrast to the previous "facially neutral policy" requirement.[42] Thus, imbalance, without more, does not establish a prima facie case of disparate impact. In the Court's view, a robust causality requirement prevents race from being used in a pervasive way that would "almost inexorably lead governmental or private entities to use numerical quotas" resulting in "serious constitutional questions" by "perpetuat[ing] race-based considerations rather than mov[ing] beyond them."[43] Thus, if ICP were unable to show a causal connection between TDHCA's policies and a disparate impact, for example because federal law concerning LIHTC alloca-

36. Id. at 2522.

37. Id. These can include objective factors, such as cost and traffic patterns and subjective factors, such as historical preservation. Id. at 2523.

38. Inclusive Cmtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2523.

39. *490 U.S. 542 (1989).

40. Inclusive Cmtys Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2523.

41. Id. at 2522 (citing Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 431 (1971)).

42. See Gallagher v. Magner, 619 F.3d 823, 833 (8th Cir. 2010) (holding that plaintiffs "must show that facially neutral policy had significant adverse impact on members of a protected group").

43. Inclusive Cmtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2523–24.

tion priorities limits TDHCA's discretion, then the case should be dismissed. The Court further noted that "remedial orders must be consistent with the Constitution" and must "concentrate on the elimination of the offending practice" through race-neutral means.[44] The Court affirmed the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals' decision, and remanded the case "for further proceedings consistent with [its] opinion."[45]

III. OBSERVATIONS

1. Disparate impact theory lives. The Court ruled 5-4 that disparate impact claims are recognized under the FHA. Inclusive Communities demonstrates that although disparate impact litigation, at least with respect to race,[46] is a costly, burdensome, and low probability strategy, it remains a strategy nonetheless.[47] Potential disparate impact liability creates risk for governmental and private actors, which may cause them to negotiate the fair housing thicket by including racial integration factors in their calculations. In addition, favorable results may be achievable through the settlement of disparate impact claims.

2. When applied as a tool to force racial desegregation in housing, the disparate impact theory is weak.

(a) Robust Causality. Other than its holding that disparate impact claims are actionable under the FHA, another important component to the Inclusive Communities decision is the Court's statement that a disparate impact claim relying on statistical disparities must fail if the plaintiff fails to allege facts or produce statistical evidence demonstrating a causal connection between the de-

---

44. Id. at 2524.

45. Id. at 2526.

46. It is important to note that the FHA prohibits discrimination based on race, color, national origin, religion, sex, familial status and disability. See 42 U.S.C. §§ 3604–3606, 3617 (2002). Inclusive Communities permits disparate impact claims based on the six factors other than race: color, religion, sex, handicap, familial status, and national origin. Inclusive Cmtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2518.

47. See Stacy E. Seicshnaydre, Is Disparate Impact Having Any Impact? An Appellate Analysis of Forty Years of Disparate Impact Claims Under the Fair Housing Act, 63 AM. U. L. REV. 357, 393–94 (2013) (concluding that Plaintiffs received positive decisions in fewer than twenty percent of disparate impact cases, and that the success rate has dropped since the 1980s).

fendant's "policies" and the disparity. It is unclear whether this "robust causality requirement", which is phrased by the Court in racial and constitutional terms, applies only in the case of race-based claims, or whether it extends to other FHA claims that do not implicate constitutionally protected categories. It seems likely that Inclusive Communities is limited to race and can be expanded only to other constitutionally protected classes, based on the Court's citation to Wards Cove Packing Co. and its references to racial imbalance and racial disparities.

In addition, although Justice Kennedy's decision states a broad "robust causality" requirement, Inclusive Communities offers little guidance concerning application of robust causality. The guidance that is offered in the majority opinion does little other than indicate that judgments, such as those made by TDHCA, should not be subject to challenge without adequate safeguards, that a "prompt resolution" of disparate impact cases is important, and that decisions that do not equate to "policies" may not be an appropriate subject of disparate impact litigation. Since developers likely do not have "policies" concerning one-time decisions concerning affordable housing location, micro-level location-based claims may not be cognizable even when the location disparately affects minorities. Larger institutions, such as governmental entities, banks and insurance companies, are more likely to have placement, financing, lending and insurance underwriting "policies" that bring disparate impact analysis into play.

However, even with respect to governments and large institutions, the "policy" requirement can be important. Since the Inclusive Communities decision, one trial court has considered the robust causality requirement. In City of Los Angeles v. Wells Fargo & Co., the City of Los Angeles argued that Wells Fargo engaged in discriminatory and predatory lending practices that resulted in a disparate number of residential home foreclosures in Los Angeles.[48] The court granted summary judgment for Wells Fargo

48. City of Los Angeles v. Wells Fargo & Co., No. 2:13-cv-09007-ODW, 2015 WL 4398858, at *1 (C.D. Cal. July 7, 2015). The City argued that Wells Fargo engaged in "reverse redlining" by extending mortgage credit or predatory terms to minority borrowers in minority neighborhoods on the basis of race and ethnicity. Id.

because the City failed to point to a policy or policies that caused the disparity:

> First, the City fails to actually identify any policy that created an artificial, arbitrary or unnecessary barrier. Instead, the City argues that the lack of a policy [e.g., adequate monitoring policies] produced the disparate impact. There is no authority that suggests that disparate impact claims are designed to impose new policies on private actors. Guidance from the Supreme Court is unambiguous that disparate impact claims must solely seek to remove barriers . . . .
>
> Second, the City is essentially advocating for racial quotas . . . . Such a policy is inapposite to instructions from the Supreme Court. . . . The City . . . advocates for the implementation of "serious constitution" concerns.[49]

Previous fair-lending cases relied on alleged statistical disparities to proceed past the dismissal stage, and the courts imposition of a positive "policy" requirement can be a formidable obstacle to a disparate impact case.

The Court's emphasis on an early causation showing, coupled with its limitations on the use of statistical discrepancies, renders housing disparate impact claims particularly difficult. For example, the Court noted that "[i]f a statistical discrepancy is caused by factors other than the defendant's policy, a plaintiff cannot establish a prima facie case, there is no liability."[50] In effect this could mean that district courts may mandate more robust statistical controls to eliminate alternate causes for a disparity. It is also unclear how courts will engage in multivariate analysis, in which multiple factors including nonracial factors have a statistically significant effect, to make these determinations.

(b) Protections for defendants when the burden does shift.

49. Id. at *8 (emphasis added).
50. Inclusive Cmtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2514.

Even if a plaintiff pleads and presents a prima facie disparate impact claim, the Court emphasized that "[a]n important and appropriate means of ensuring that disparate-impact liability is properly limited is to give housing authorities and private developers leeway to state and explain the valid interest served by their policies."[51] Thus, "[e]ntrepreneurs must be given latitude to consider market factors" and zoning officials "must often make decisions based on a mix of factors, both objective (such as cost and traffic patterns) and, at least to some extent, subjective (such as preserving historic architecture)."[52] Since "[t]he FHA does not decree a particular vision of urban development,"[53] it seems likely that a determination to revitalize an urban core, even if it means concentrating or deconcentrating affordable housing serving protected classes, would satisfy a "valid interest" test. However, it remains to be seen the type and strength of interest that is required to meet the "valid interest" test.[54]

Further, the court reaffirmed the lower court ruling that, after the defendant provides a "valid interest" served by its policy, the plaintiff has the burden of demonstrating that the justification is a pretext or must be rejected.[55] To meet that burden, the plaintiff must demonstrate "that there is 'an available alternative . . . practice that has less disparate impact and serves the [defendant's] legitimate needs.'"[56] In this equation, however, it is not sufficient for the plaintiff to second-guess the policies since "the FHA is not an instrument to force housing authorities to reorder their priorities."[57]

In conclusion, while Inclusive Communities did not eliminate disparate impact as a cause of action under the FHA, it severely limited the scope of the theory and expanded the discretion of the policy-making defendant.

---

51. Id. at 2522.
52. Id. at 2523.
53. Id.
54. Id. at 2522.
55. Id. at 2518–23 (stating that "so too must housing authorities and private developers be allowed to maintain a policy if they can prove it necessary to achieve valid interest.").
56. Id. at 2518 (quoting Ricci v. DeStefano, 557 U.S. 557, 578 (2009)).
57. Id. at 2522.

(c) Limited Remedy. Even if a disparate impact claim succeeds on the merits, Inclusive Communities demonstrates that available remedies may be severely limited in order to "be consistent with the Constitution."[58] Thus, remedial orders should concentrate on elimination of the offending practice and, if additional measures are adopted "courts should strive to design them to eliminate racial disparities through race-neutral means."[59] It is likely that remedial orders imposing or perhaps even referring to, racial targets or quotas would be constitutionally offensive.[60]

3. Disparate impact also limps when applied as a tool to eliminate consideration of race. As noted above, the majority decision in Inclusive Communities is highly deferential to governmental actions. Although this means that it will be difficult for plaintiffs to argue that governmental and private action insufficiently addresses racial desegregation, it also means that other plaintiffs will have a difficult case when arguing that governmental and private actions are unlawful simply because they are motivated by racially integrative purposes. In this way, Justice Kennedy's decision in Inclusive Communities can be viewed as adopting the position he articulated in his concurring opinion in the Parents Involved case.[61]

In Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1, Justice Kennedy wrote that state actions that do not racially classify individuals are not constitutionally suspect simply because their purpose is racial integration.[62] This distinction between classification and purpose is constitutionally im-

---

58. Id. at 2524.

59. Id.

60. Id. at 2525; see Parents Involved in Cmty. Sch. v. Seattle Sch. Dist. No. 1, 551 U.S. 701, 789 (2007) (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

61. Parents Involved, 551 U.S. at 789; see also Fisher v. Univ. of Texas at Austin, 133 S. Ct. 2411 (2013).

62. 551 U.S. at 788–90 (stating that governmental actors "may pursue the goal of bringing together students of diverse backgrounds and races through other means [i.e., not racial classifications], including strategic site selection of new schools; drawing attendance zones with general recognition of the demographics of neighborhoods; allocating resources for special programs; recruiting students and faculty in targeted fashion; and tracking enrollments, performance and other statistics by race.").

portant, but the Court has never defined the term "classification."[63] By ruling that the FHA provides for disparate impact liability in some race-based cases, the Court essentially ruled that disparate impact law is itself constitutional and disavowed the "color blindness" argument espoused by Chief Justice Roberts and other members of the Court.[64] However, having done so, the Court focused on issues involving the application of the disparate impact theory and stated that considering race in an effort "to foster diversity and combat racial isolation" is a legitimate purpose for a policy.[65]

Notwithstanding the legitimacy of racial considerations, Justice Kennedy's opinion is clear that "we must remain wary of policies that reduce homeowners to nothing more than their race,"[66] and that race cannot be used in a "pervasive way" that would lead to the use of numerical quotas.[67] In essence, Inclusive Communities creates an environment of disparate impact law that allows governmental and other actors to consider race, unless consideration tips to classification and quotas. This is the flip-side of 63. See Reva B. Siegel, Foreward: Equality Divided, 127 HARV. L. REV. 1, 48–49 (2013). The Court has held that racial classifications trigger strict constitutional scrutiny. See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200 (1995). The disparate treatment case demonstrates that discriminatory intent can cause a facially neutral policy to be treated as a racial classification, thereby triggering strict scrutiny. Id. at 213. The Court had not, at least until Inclusive Communities, decided whether disparate racial impact triggered strict constitutional scrutiny. See Ricci v. DeStefano, 557 U.S. 557, 595–56 (2009) (Scalia, J., concurring) ("[T]he war between disparate impact and equal protection will be waged sooner or later, and it behooves us now to begin thinking about how—and—on what terms—to make peace between them.").

---

64. See Parents Involved, 551 U.S. at 701, 748 ("The way to stop discrimination based on race is to stop discriminating on the basis of race."). On the other hand, the Court also did not adopt an anti-subordination theory, which might allow explicit racial consideration if used to benefit a marginalized racial group. See Reva B. Siegel, From Colorblindness to Antibalkanization: An Emerging Ground of Decision in Race Equality Cases, 120 YALE L. J. 1278, 1281 (2011).

65. Inclusive Cmtys. Project III, 135 S. Ct. at 2525 ("When setting their larger goals, local housing authorities may choose to foster diversity and combat racial isolation with race-neutral tools, and mere awareness of race in attempting to solve the problems facing inner cities does not doom that endeavor from the outset.").

66. Id.

67. Id. at 2523.

the Court's limitations on using disparate impact theory to force the policymaker's hand since that might lead to prohibited racial classification and quotas. In either event, Inclusive Communities is deferential to governmental and private actors that can state some legitimate purpose for policies that do not cross over the line to constitute "classification." Stated differently, Inclusive Communities demonstrates that it will be very difficult both to force action to create racial integration and to forestall action that does purposefully encourage racial integration.[68]

4. Inclusive Communities may change the focus of fair housing litigation to discriminatory intent. As noted above, under Inclusive Communities it may prove exceedingly difficult for plaintiffs to allege and succeed on a disparate impact claim. Arguably, this may put pressure on "disparate treatment" arguments that actions or inactions, which might not meet the "policy" requirement, intentionally discriminate on the basis of race and, therefore, fail under the Equal Protection Clause's strict scrutiny standard. In this regard, one should not ignore the Court's statement that the "recognition of disparate-impact liability . . . plays a role in uncovering discriminatory intents," and that such intent can include both "disguised animus" and "unconscious prejudices."[69] This reference to "unconscious bias" may lead to further development of disparate treatment law.

IV. CONCLUSION

As a doctrinal matter, Inclusive Communities understanding of equal protection Justice Kennedy articulated in the Parents Involved case—namely, state actions that do not classify individuals based on race do not violate the Constitution only because they are motivated by racially integrative purposes. Thus, disparate impact theory does not surrender to equal protection theory as long as disparate impact does not stray into classification waters. Inclusive Communities thereby gives a fuzzy and perhaps unstable roadmap but a roadmap nonetheless, to guide state and private actors in making housing placement and financing decisions. It is clear that in the Court's view, disparate impact does raise constitutional questions, but these questions involve the application and not the existence of disparate impact theory. The focus will now likely shift to particular questions of whether consideration and purpose slide into prohibited classifications.

68. Id. at 2525 (explaining that disparate impact claims encourage "race-neutral efforts to encourage revitalization of communities that have long suffered the consequences of segregated housing patterns" and promote efforts "to foster diversity and combat racial isolation with race-neutral tools").

69. Id. at 2522.

It seems clear that the Court has steered a path between the anti-subordination theory, in which explicitly racial considerations would be constitutional if used to benefit a marginalized class, and color-blind theory, in which all explicit racial considerations would be presumptively unconstitutional. Inclusive Communities attempts to straddle these approaches and supports a pragmatic view permitting racial considerations while retaining a renunciation of racial classifications and quotas. Race may be considered, but consideration must be expressed by using race neutral proxies and tools.

The University of Memphis School of Law
Fall 2015 Externship Program

Objectives, Policies, and Procedures

The University of Memphis Externship Program is designed to expose law students to legal practice in a wide range of contexts while providing a framework for understanding and managing the practical, ethical, and personal challenges that are an inherent part of the legal profession. Stepping outside of the traditional classroom, externs are presented with the opportunity to learn by doing and observing under the direction of a field placement supervisor. To maximize this hands-on learning experience, externs participate in a faculty-led seminar in which they reflect upon and assess the skills, relationships, issues, and mindsets that prevail in the practice setting.

While specific objectives will necessarily vary across the spectrum of field placements, the Externship Program aims to help each student extern achieve the following goals:

- To strive toward practice readiness through continued development of legal skills, including research and writing;
- To better understand the day-to-day work of a lawyer;
- To apply classroom learning to the world of legal practice;
- To develop the habits of a reflective practitioner who understands how to learn from experience;
- To identify, explore and address issues of legal ethics and professional responsibility;
- To evaluate and utilize various approaches to problem solving in the context of real-life legal work;
- To improve upon essential communication and relationship-building skills;
- To explore career interests and goals; and
- To build professional and personal networks.

Through participation in both the field placement and classroom seminar aspects of the Externship Program, it is anticipated that students will further hone their lawyering skills at both practical and theoretical levels, learning from experience, from synthesis, from critique, and from responsibility.

Policies and Procedures of the Externship Program

A. Student Eligibility

1. Prerequisites to Application and Enrollment

Students who have successfully completed their required first year of coursework and at least 28 credit hours toward graduation are eligible to enroll in the Externship Program. Additional prerequisites may be set upon request by specific field placement offices and/or at the discretion of the Director of Clinical Programs and Externships. In exceptional circumstances, the prerequisites may be waived with the approval of the Director of Clinical Programs and Externships in consultation with the Associate Dean for Academic Affairs.

2. Academic Standing

Students must be in good academic standing in the semester preceding their participation in the Externship Program.

In consultation with the Associate Dean of Academic Affairs, the Director of Clinical Programs and Externships retains the discretion to base program admission on a student having compiled an academic record that exceeds the good standing requirement. A student falling below good academic standing (placed on academic probation) while participating in the Externship Program may continue participating barring extraordinary circumstances.

3. Limitations on Externship Credit and Enrollment

Students may enroll in the Externship Program subject to the following limitations:

a. In accordance with the Law School's Academic Regulations, not more than a total of twelve (12) credit hours may be utilized toward satisfying graduation requirements by satisfactorily completing the following courses: Any Externship, Law Review, Moot Court (including credit for participation on travel teams), and independent research.

b. For satisfying graduation requirements, a student is permitted a total of three (3) externships, two (2) clinic courses, or a combination of one (1) clinic and two (2) externship courses. A student may not repeat the same clinic or externship.

c. A student may not enroll in both a Clinic course and the Externship Program in the same semester or summer session.

d. Students may not take more than a total of sixteen (16) hours, including enrollment in the Externship Program, in the semester (or its equivalent in the summer) in which they are enrolled in the Externship Program.

e. For enrollment purposes, students who have already taken and received credit for the participation in the Externship Program will not receive priority for enrollment in the Externship Program for a second semester or summer session.

f. The Director of Experiential Learning, after consultation with the Associate Dean of Academic Affairs, may grant waivers, on a case-by-case basis, to permit repetition of a placement in the Externship Program or enrollment in the Externship Program that may result in the student exceeding the ungraded credit limitation or the limitation on the number of externships in which the student may enroll.

B. Student Application Requirements

1. Pre-Application Processes

a. Prior to applying for enrollment in the Externship Program, students must thoroughly familiarize themselves with the Objectives and Goals of the Externship Program as well as the Program's Policies and Procedures.

b. Although not required, interested students should make every effort to attend the Externship Information Session that will be held in advance of registration each semester. Students should also be encouraged to meet with the Director of Experiential Learning to discuss any questions or concerns in advance of moving forward with applications for enrollment.

2. Application Process

Students must apply for an Externship Program placement by completing the Externship Program Application. It is anticipated that the application will be distributed to students via electronic means (e-mail, law school website, Simplicity, etc.) and made available in the Office of the Director of Experiential Learning. In addition to submitting the completed application, students may be asked to submit a cover letter, a current professional resume, a writing sample, and/or a current law school transcript.

3. Security Clearance

Many externship field placements (primarily judicial and government) require a security clearance, a process that may take several months. If a student seeks an externship field placement that requires security clearance, it is expected that the student will work with the Director of Experiential Learning to provide the field placement with all information necessary to secure that clearance.

C. Standards for Selection of Students for Externships

Offers for enrollment in the Externship Program will be made by and at the discretion of the Director of Experiential Learning. In making enrollment decisions, the following factors will be considered:

1. Compatibility

The Director of Experiential Learning will assess whether the placement a good fit for the student and whether the student has the legal, professional, interpersonal and intellectual skills for a productive externship experience in the particular placement. In making this determination, the Director may examine the student's law school transcript, though academic performance will not necessarily be conclusive. In addition, an interview with the student, input from faculty, consultation with the prospective field placement, and performance in other experiential learning settings may be considered.

2. Reason for Wanting to Participate in the Placement

The Director of Experiential Learning will consider whether the placement fits into the educational goals and career interests of the student.

3. Compliance with Requirements and Prerequisites

The Director of Experiential Learning will consider whether the student has complied with all placement and Externship Program requirements and prerequisites.

D. Requirements after Acceptance of an Externship Placement

1. Acceptance and Registration

Once a student accepts an offer to enroll in the Externship Program, that student will be formally enrolled by the Registrar's office. Once enrollment is complete, a student will not be permitted to drop the Externship course without petitioning for and receiving approval of the Director of Experiential Learning to withdraw from the course.

2. Withdrawal

If a student accepts an offer for enrollment in the Externship Program, he or she will not be able to withdraw the commitment except for compelling reasons. To obtain permission for withdrawal, the student must immediately, upon the knowledge of such compelling reasons, petition in writing to the Director of Experiential Learning. The petition must specify the compelling reasons for withdrawal. Failure to petition and receive approval may result in a grade of "Unsatisfactory" for the course and jeopardize the student's chances of being considered for future enrollment in the law school's Experiential Learning courses, including clinical programs and externships.

3. Compensation

Students may not accept compensation of any kind for externship work. Where it is the practice of a particular field placement to reimburse reasonable out-of-pocket expenses related to the placement, the extern may receive such reimbursement.

4. Fulfillment of Externship Placement Requirements

Subject to the Policies and Procedures of the Externship Program, externs must comply with all working hours requirements and conditions implemented by the field placement. Field placement will generally run from the first day of instruction through the last day of instruction of the academic semester or session. It is expected that the extern will be at the placement each week of the semester or summer session. Students must complete their externship in the semester or term they begin it. A student who fails to complete an externship or who receives a grade of "Unsatisfactory" may be barred from future enrollment in any of the law school's Experiential Learning courses, including clinical programs and externships.

5. Completion of Externship Seminar Requirements

Student externs will be required to attend and fulfill the requirements of a regularly convened, faculty-led classroom seminar designed to focus on and enhance the learning that the externs will be doing in their field placements.

Requirements for the classroom seminar, as well as for submission of Externship-related work product and time sheets, will be specified in the course syllabus for the Externship Program.

In general, it is anticipated that students will be expected to reflect on their field placement experiences through a series of written assignments, including a Final Self-Assessment and Reflection Memorandum. Written assignments may focus on the effective development of legal skills; confidentiality, ethics, and professional responsibility; expectations, conduct, and realities of externship work; learning from experience and reflection; workplace communication and feedback; workplace teams and leadership; community and social responsibility of lawyers; the legal system; developing lawyer skills; and job stress and job satisfaction.

6. Confidentiality

The extern is expected to hold in strictest confidence all communications received in the course of the externship placement that are not matters of public record, and to adhere fully to the standards of professional conduct set forth in the Code of Professional Responsibility of the American Bar Association, the Tennessee Rules of Professional Conduct, and any other applicable rules of professional ethics (e.g., codes of judicial conduct)

7. Conflicts of Interest

All externs must avoid conflicts of interest based on past or concurrent employment (or volunteer work) situations. Some externship field placements may prohibit an extern from engaging in concurrent employment or volunteer work. An extern who does plan to engage in concurrent employment or volunteer work during the externship semester must confer with the Director of Experiential Learning, the externship field placement supervisor, and the employment or volunteer work supervisor before the start of an concurrent externship/employment work arrangement. Externs with questions about a potential conflict should immediately consult the Director of Experiential Learning.

8. Unlawful Practice of Law

Within their placements, externs may have the opportunity for contact with clients or potential clients, the court, other attorneys, etc. Externs should be extremely cautious in their communications so that they are limited to and do not overstep the scope of work that they are authorized to perform. All communications should be prefaced by disclosing the student's extern status.

9. Professionalism

Externs are required to exhibit professional conduct at all times during their externships. Students will be appropriately attired as determined by the field placement supervisor. Students will attend all called meetings of the field placement supervisor and/or the faculty supervisor, unless excused by the appropriate party. Students will be familiar with the appropriate Rules of Procedure and other assigned materials.

In the sole judgment of the Director of Experiential Learning, any extern failing to achieve an acceptable level of professionalism may have the academic credit for his/her placement reduced or eliminated.

10. Removal from Externship Program

At the discretion of the Director of Experiential Learning, students may be removed from the Externship Program for unsatisfactory or untimely work, unethical conduct, violation of any agreements with the field placement supervisor or law school, breaches of confidence, inappropriate behavior or attire, violation of any rules of court, or at the request of the field placement supervisor.

Credit and Grading

A. Grading

1. Upon completion of the Externship semester, all externs will be assigned a grade of Excellent, Satisfactory, or Unsatisfactory.

2. The determination of grade assignment and credit allocation will be made by the Director of the Experiential Learning after receiving a student evaluation prepared by the field placement supervisor at semester's end. The assigned grade and allocation of credit will be based upon satisfactory and timely completion of the requisite externship hours and work assigned during the placement, satisfactory participation in the classroom seminar component of the Externship Program course (including consideration of the work product), the evaluation of the field placement supervisor, and the student's compliance with all course requirements.

3. At the discretion of the Director of Experiential Learning, any student enrolled in an externship placement who fails to comply with any requirements of the Externship Program (set forth herein or in the course materials), of the Student Honor Code, or appropriate regulations governing the profession, may be assigned a grade of "Unsatisfactory," awarded no credit and be barred from future enrollment in any of the law school's Experiential Learning courses, including clinical programs and externships.

Cecil C. Humphreys
School of Law

Lawyering Fundamentals
Course Syllabus

Overview
Lawyering Fundamentals (LF) lasts three days. You will attend classes in which you will be questioned on the assigned reading, answer law school exam-style questions, and receive helpful strategies for success in law school. Most importantly, the course will attempt to demystify your law school classroom by previewing what you will experience and teaching you how to prepare to learn in this unfamiliar, and often intimidating learning environment. Our goal is to minimize the mystery of law school so you acclimate and succeed.

Class Meeting Times
Classes will meet from 9:00 am to 4:00 pm on the following dates:

Wednesday, August 10th
Thursday, August 11th
Friday, August 12th

Course Professors
Professor Everett Chambers
Professor Samuel Farkas

Course Binder
You will receive a course binder containing reading assignments, homework assignments, in-class exercises, reflection entries, and other course related materials. Please bring your course binder with you to class every day. As detailed below, there are daily pre-class assignments, including assignments that you must complete prior to the first day of class.

Course Site
LF also has an online classroom component called the Matrix. You will receive log in information to access the Matrix course page prior to the first day of class.

Reading and Homework Assignments

You are expected to complete the reading and homework assignments prior to each class. This will include uploading completed assignments to the Matrix course site. You may be given additional assignments during class. Your Professors reserve the right to change assignments with sufficient notice.

Please see the assignment schedule below:

Before Day One

Complete the following assignments before the first day of class on August 10, 2016:

1. Read Welcome Letter
2. Read: Course Syllabus
3. Read: Lawyering Fundamentals Learning Outcomes
4. Read and brief the following cases on Intentional Torts*—Intent (p.17-30):
   - Garratt v. Daily
   - Spivey v. Battaglia
   - Ranson v. Kitner
   - McGurie v. Amy
   - Talmage v. Smith
5. Skim: FAQ on Legal Reading
6. Read: FAQ Case Briefing
7. Read: Preparing Yourself for Learning in the Socratic Classroom
8. Skim: Case Briefing Cheat Sheet
9. Skim: Sample Case Brief
10. Skim: Glossary of Legal Terms
11. Complete: Reflection Entry #1*
12. Complete: Writing Sample (The Fruit Problem)*
13. Complete: Pre-Course Survey*

*Upload completed assignment to the Matrix before the start of Day One.

Before Day Two

Complete the following reading assignments and homework before the second day of class on August 11, 2016:

1. Case reading and briefing*
   Intentional Torts—Battery (p.30-37):
   - Cole v. Turner

- Wallace v. Rosen
- Fisher v. Carrousel

Intentional Torts—Assault (p.37-41):

- I de S et ux. V. W de S
- Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Hill

2. Wallace case briefing homework assignment*
3. Complete Daily Quiz #2*
4. Reflection Entry #2*

*Upload completed assignment to the Matrix before the start of Day Two.

Before Day Three

Complete the following reading assignments and homework before the third day of class on August 12, 2016:

1. Case reading and briefing*:
   Intentional Torts—Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress & Consent (p.51-55;92-93)
   - State Rubbish Collectors Ass'n v. Siliznoff
   - O'Brien v. Cunard S.S. Co.
2. Siliznoff case briefing homework assignment*
3. Outline Intent, Assault & Battery*
4. Complete Daily Quiz #3*
5. Reflection Entry #3*

*Upload completed assignment to the Matrix before the start of Day Three.

After Day Three

1. Reflection Entry #4*
2. Post-Course Evaluation*
3. Final Exam Review

*Upload completed assignment to the Matrix one date specified by Professor.

Final Exam

The Lawyering Fundamentals exam will be administered on the final day of class, Friday, August 12th. The final exam will include short answers, essay, and multiple-choice questions. Please bring your laptop.

Lawyering Fundamentals
Welcome Letter

Dear Student,

Congratulations on your acceptance into the University of Memphis, Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. Training to become a lawyer is a very exciting undertaking. We are excited to have partnered with the University of Memphis, Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law to provide you with an intensive, three-day course in Lawerying Fundamentals as part of your Orientation program. Barbri is very pleased to play a small part (through Lawyering Fundamentals) in laying a foundation on which others will build during the rest of your legal training.

Overview

Lawyering Fundamentals (LF) simulates the first semester of law school. It includes daily classes during which you will be questioned on the assigned reading, answer law school exam-style questions, and receive helpful strategies for success in law school. You will also sit for a final exam at the conclusion of LF. Although the exam does not count for law school credit, it will be a tool to help us and you assess your performance to assist you in achieving your potential. However, most importantly, the course will help demystify some of the law school teaching methods to help you acclimate and succeed. Consider LF the first step of your legal training!

Preparation

LF requires the same effort that will be expected of you in law school - but don't worry, it will be worth it! Like preparing a good meal or building a meaningful relationship—your enjoyment of it and the outcome will be equal to the effort and attention you put into it.

Pre-Class Assignments

You will need to complete 12 items prior to the first day of Lawyering Fundamentals on Wednesday, August 10, 2016. We have suggested a time limit for each item, and we even tell you when you can skim a document. Please pace yourself so that you can complete everything. You will need to spend just under 5 hours to complete everything thoroughly.

1. Read: Course Syllabus (10 minutes)
2. Read: Learning Fundamentals Learning Outcomes (15 minutes)
3. Read and brief the following Intentional Torts cases—Intent (p.17-30) (two and a half hours)
   - Garratt v. Daily
   - Spivey v. Battaglia
   - Ranson v. Kitner
   - McGurie v. Amy
   - Talmage v. Smith
4. Read: FAQ on Legal Reading (10 minutes)
5. Read: FAQ Case Briefing (15 minutes)
6. Read: Preparing Yourself for Learning in the Socratic Classroom (15 minutes)
7. Skim: Case Briefing Cheat Sheet (10 minutes)
8. Skim: Sample Case Brief (15 minutes)
9. Skim: Glossary of Legal Terms (15 minutes)
10. Complete: Reflection Entry #1 (20 minutes)
11. Complete: Writing Sample—the Fruit Problem (30-45 minutes)
12. Complete: Pre-class Evaluation (20 minutes)

The course will be challenging, but as you know, nothing worthwhile is ever easy.

Again, welcome to law school! We can't wait to meet you and get started!

Sincerely,

Everett D. Chambers
Vice President, BARBRI's Institutional Programs

Lawyering Fundamentals
Welcome Materials

Copyright © 2016 by BARBRI, Inc. All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopy, recording or any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing by the publisher. Printed in the United States of America.

Lawyering Fundamentals: Learning Outcomes

Timing: Read before Day One

Purpose: This document contains the expected learning outcomes for Lawyering Fundamentals. Use these stated learning outcomes (i) to better understand the intended goals of the course, (ii) as context for the activities and exercises you will complete, and (iii) to monitor your progress as we move through the course.

After completing the Lawyering Fundamentals course:

1. Students will understand how to effectively prepare for and participate in class, including how to meaningfully engage in Socratic classroom dialogue.
2. Students will be able to synthesize class notes, case briefs (and commercial outlines) into a course outline they can use to study for a final exam.
3. When given a legal problem to solve, students will be able to identify the legal doctrines implicated by the facts; create basic arguments by applying facts and rules; write a legal answer organized around IRAC through which they will communicate their reasoning to the question posed.
4. Students will have a basic understanding of some of the differences between law school and their undergraduate experience, including the daily workload.
5. Students will have a basic understanding of many of the critical law school success factors and will gain a basic awareness of their own competencies and motivations with respect to many of the critical law school success factors.
6. Students will become aware of the pathway that will help them reach their goals, and will have begun to the develop the relationships with their peers that is critical to succeeding.

Frequently Asked Questions—Legal Reading

Timing: Read before Day One

Purpose: The purpose of this handout is to provide you with answers to some of the most frequently asked questions about legal reading.

In law school, students are required to complete their assigned reading before class.

Why do we read cases?

1. Reading the cases helps to teach you the law. Cases will show you what the law means, how it works, and how it has been applied in the past.

2. Reading cases introduces you to speaking legalese. Legal opinions are written in English, but they may as well have been written in a different language when you start law school. Completing the assigned reading and creating case briefs for each case you read helps you to learn the language of the law. It's daunting at first, but it gets better with practice.

3. Reading the cases prepares you for law school exams and practicing law. You will encounter fact patterns similar to cases you read and briefed in preparation for class on your law school finals. The good news is that if you learn how to wrestle with the cases in order to wrap your head around the pertinent information, you will be able to do it in your exams. Therefore, when you read and brief, you are doing many of the very things you will have to do in your exams. And as a lawyer, you will not always know how to answer a client's legal question. Thus, you will have to do legal research. Legal research includes reading cases and statutes in search of answers. Therefore, reading cases is a necessary part of your legal training. Do it now, do it well, and the dividends will be huge.

4. Reading the cases prepares you to interact with your professor. Professors rarely say: "The law is…" or "The rule is…" Instead, they expect you to come to class armed with a basic understanding of the rule that you will have pulled from the cases. They tend to use a series of questions and answers (called Socratic dialog) to build and expand your understanding of the rule, and to train you and your classmates to be lawyers. If you don't read before class, you will likely look like a fool. Furthermore, your fellow students pay a lot of money to attend law school; if you don't come to class well-prepared and ready to discuss the case, you are wasting everyone's time. That shows professional incompetence, which is a reputation that could follow you for a long time!

How long should it take to complete my reading?

How long it takes to finish your reading depends on several factors. Consider the following:

1. Size of the Reading Assignment. Obviously, 50 pages will take longer to read than 10 pages.

2. Reading Speed. How fast do you read normally? How many minutes does it take you to read ten pages? How difficult were those pages? Were you reading ten pages of Harry Potter or ten pages of Isaac Newton's The Principia: Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy? Generally, the slower you read, the longer your assigned reading will take. The good news is that over time, if you put in the effort, you should become faster.

3. Vocabulary. How large is your legal vocabulary (e.g., do you know the legal difference between motive and intent?) How familiar are you with legal procedure (e.g., do you know the difference between summary judgment and judgment as a matter of law?) The smaller your vocabulary and the less familiar you are with how the law works, the longer it will take to complete your assigned reading. The good news is that if you put in the effort, your vocabulary and familiarity with the law will grow over time. (Learning the language of the law is critical to your training. Therefore, don't just gloss over unfamiliar terms of art. Although it slows your reading, look up terms in a legal dictionary or on the internet.)

4. Level of Focus. You will complete your assigned reading faster if you are able to focus and minimize distractions. Read in an environment and at a time that helps you learn best.

Will your professor know if you have not read?

As you will find out, it is pretty easy for everyone, including the professor, to tell if a student has read. Students often skip dissenting opinions or the notes following the case—a very unwise mistake. To test if you read and understood the case, your professor will definitely ask you about the items in the Case Briefing Cheat Sheet. But that's not the only reason the professor will question you. The professor may also ask you about other details that are important to your training. Only a student who read thoroughly and spent time thinking about what he or she read will be able to answer. If you devoted sufficient time to prepare, you will sometimes have the answers to these extra questions and sometimes you won't. Everyone can tell the difference between one who has diligently prepared and a slacker. The key is to be diligent and to always go back and correct your notes and case briefs after class.

Frequently Asked Questions—Case Briefing

Timing: Read before Day One

Purpose: The purpose of this handout is to provide you with answers to frequently asked questions on case briefing.

Introduction:

In law school, students take notes on everything they read. When the notes are on a legal opinion, they are called "case briefs." A case brief is a summary of the essential information found in a court opinion—the "key points" of the story. You might also think of it like your shopping list—things you need to get when you read a case. You should create a case brief for every case you read. Typically, your case brief should include each item on the Case Briefing Cheat Sheet (included in your materials). The cheat sheet lists and describes the information you should include. We have also provided a sample case brief with your materials.

Why do I need to case brief?

1. Briefing helps you prepare for class. Briefing trains you to read cases closely, to thoroughly analyze legal issues, and to distill cases down to their essence, which helps you process and retain the important information more efficiently. A well-written case brief will also serve as your guide when you are called upon to speak in class.

2. Briefing helps you develop analytical skills you will need for your final exam and beyond. On a final exam essay, you will use the analytical skills you developed through case briefing to determine the issue, find the legally significant facts, connect the rule to the facts, and present well-reasoned arguments to support the outcome you predict—just as the court supported its holding.

3. Briefing is the first step in creating an exam outline. Your case briefs will serve as the foundation for the notes you will take in class that will later be translated into a course outline. You will use your case briefs in class, which in turn you will use to create your course outline. We will discuss outlining as we move through the course. Hint: If you handwrite your class notes, be sure your briefs have sufficient space.

4. Briefing is an important professional skill. Briefing cases is not just for law school. When you brief, you pull apart how other lawyers reason and write! As a lawyer, you will have to read and analyze cases with a careful eye to detail. You will also have to summarize cases when writing legal memoranda, briefs, and other documents, as well as when making oral arguments to courts. So although it takes a bit of time to develop competence, don't shortchange your training to be a lawyer; start briefing and keep briefing!

Should I type or handwrite my case brief?

Use the method that will work best for you. Handwriting takes time, but it may help you process the materials more fully. Of course, it is much easier to clean up and reformat type-written materials.

Why are the items in case briefing cheat numbered?

Some students have asked us why the items are numbered. Their questions include the following:

1. Are the items numbered because I am supposed to search for them in that order? Not really. Not all courts write in the same way. Therefore, while some of the items will be at the beginning of the case, the location of other items will vary. What is important is that you find the information. The numbering system is just a way for you to logically organize the information you pull out of the case. As your reading comprehension skills improve, you will likely vary the order in which you look for and organize the items.

2. Are they numbered because the professor will ask about them in that order? No, professors ask questions to test you and teach you, so they may or may not ask the questions in this order and may also ask different questions. The list represents the basic information you should always pull out of case.

3. Do I have to write them down in that order? We find it helpful to organize the items in this order, but if you later develop an order that is more comfortable for you, do it.

4. Why are the items numbered? The items are numbered simply for ease of reference in class. If you randomly set down the notes you pulled out of case, it's harder to find specific items when you need them. The list makes your case brief consistent. But headings without numbering will work just as well.

Can't I just Google a summary of the case or buy a commercial case brief?

This analogy might be helpful: What if lawyers are like lifeguards? Both lifeguards and lawyers help people. Imagine that you went to the pool and the lifeguard was wearing a life jacket because he was a weak and slow swimmer; this would be less than ideal. Now imagine that you went to a lawyer who never developed his reading, researching, case-briefing, and writing skills. If you really hate spending time developing these skills, that is perfectly fine, but you may want to reevaluate your decision to practice law.

Prepare Yourself for Learning in the Socratic Classroom: Anticipate the Types of Questions Law Professors Will Ask You in Class

Timing: Carefully read before Day One.

Purpose: This handout lists the types of questions law professors tend to ask during class. It explores why professors ask these types of questions, and discusses how they use their questions to not only teach you the rules, but to train you to become lawyers. Try to fully wrap your head around each question type and use the insight you gain to focus your preparation so you can better prepare for class and more meaningfully participate. Whether you are called on, volunteer, or are just listening, this handout will help you to follow along and fully absorb your new legal training.

Overview:

Learning in law school is very different from the typical undergraduate experience. Professors will not spoon-feed you rules through lectures, and they will not describe what it takes to become a lawyer. They assume you have wrestled with the cases they assigned for you to read prior to coming to class. Professors use class time to build on the foundation you are constructing through your diligent preparation. Therefore, rather than lecture you, professors use questions and answers drawn from the assigned materials to clarify and strengthen your understanding of the rules. But they are not only interested in teaching you the rules. They will also train you to become a lawyer. They will develop and hone your lawyering skills through periods of intensive questions and answers.

These question and answer sessions—they question, you answer—are loosely called the Socratic Method, and will be a staple of your daily classroom experience. But, even after hours of preparation, most students can appear to flounder in a Socratic classroom. They struggle to grasp the meaning and purpose of the questions, not to mention the added pressure of having to "spar" in front of their peers with a seasoned lawyer, the professor. They also struggle because they tend to obsess over the "right answer" instead of focusing on the question, especially the purpose of the questions. Another challenge most students face is how to stay fully engaged in the exchange between the professor and their peers. It seems daunting not to tune out when you aren't in the hot seat, and it's equally challenging not to get lost in what appears to be a meaningless and interminable back and forth.

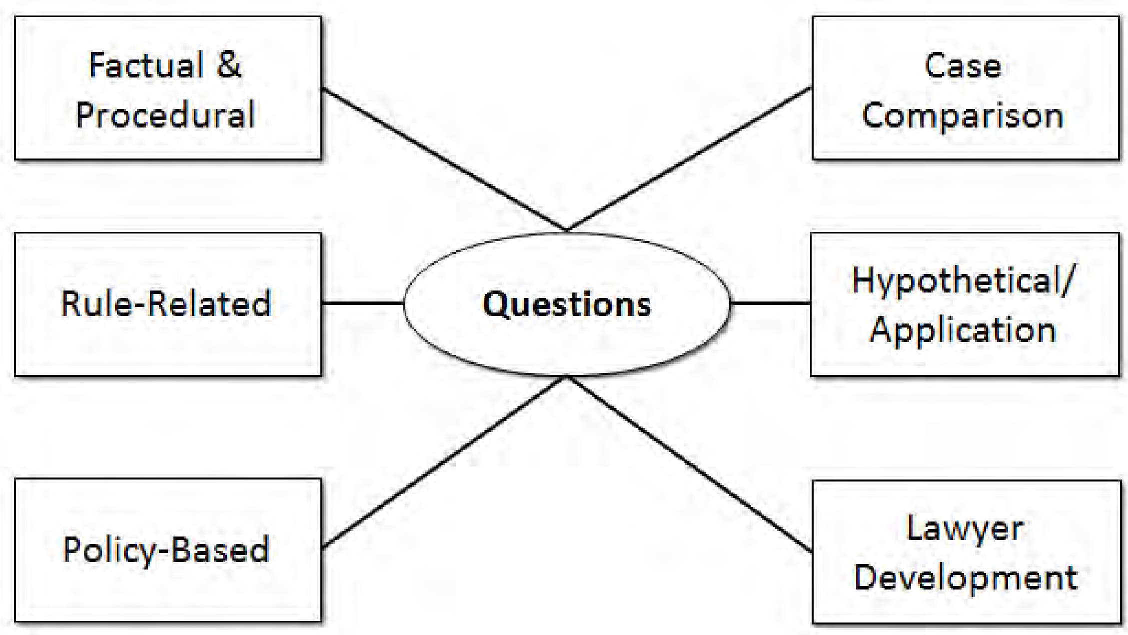
Happily, by taking time ahead of class to fully contemplate the types of questions your professors are likely to ask, you will be able to participate in the Socratic dialog in a more relaxed manner. You will be able to follow and engage in the discussion even when you are not being questioned, and will have the courage to volunteer and answer questions, as well as to pose some of your own questions. The right preparation means you can listen, think, answer, take notes, and ask questions to maximize the benefits of your legal training. Although class will still be challenging, your work outside of class will help you learn faster. You will be "in the know" and you won't flounder when you are called upon.

In this handout, we are passing along one of the main takeaways from Lawyering Fundamentals: a tool to thrive in the Socratic classroom, not just survive it. We truly hope that one outcome of absorbing its insights is that you will be inspired to always be fully prepared for class. But more than that, we hope your diligent preparation will allow you to flourish, whether you are thinking, speaking, or merely listening attentively and taking notes. But even when you undergo challenging examination during Socratic dialog, we urge you to embrace your training with an insatiable desire to advance by making sense of it. Questions are one of the most important tools in a lawyer's toolbox, so we never want you to passively float along in a fog of perplexed discouragement. Above all, we want you to see and use your classroom experience—especially the question and answer part of your training—as a precursor to the courtroom or any other place your law license takes you.

The list of questions below is small sampling of the types of questions that could be asked; it is by no means the complete list. Because a good part of class time will be taken up asking and answering questions, the more you know, the faster you will learn.

Types of Questions Law Professors Ask



Factual & Procedural Questions (FBQs)	Fact based questions to flesh out the story of the case (parties, issues, case history, etc.) E.g.: What were the important facts in the Spivey case? What happened in the lower court? What is this case about? How did this case come before the court? Why did the supreme court send the case back? Are we reading a trial or appellate court opinion? What does remand mean? What is the difference between a petitioner and respondent? Are these terms different from plaintiff and defendant?
Rule-Related Questions (RRQs)	Questions about the rule or legal principle you are studying. E.g.: What is the difference between a subjective standard and an objective standard? What standard do we use to judge the defendant's conduct? When, if ever, would we use a subjective standard?
Rule-Related Questions (RRQs) Continued	Rule Statement/Rule Term Questions—Questions to elicit a precise rule statement. E.g.: How did the Washington Supreme Court define intent?

	Rule Explanation Questions—Questions to clarify the entire rule or a single term or phrase of the rule. E.g.: Can you explain the difference between a subjective and objective standard? What is the difference between motive and intent? Rule Exceptions Questions—Questions to narrow or expand the rule. E.g.: To constitute an assault and battery, is it necessary that the defendant touch the plaintiff's body or even his clothing? What if the defendant intended to harm plaintiff A and ended up harming plaintiff B, is the defendant still liable? Majority/Minority Rule Questions—Questions on jurisdictional splits. E.g.: What narrow exception have several jurisdictions carved out to the general rule that the mentally disabled can be liable for intentional torts? Rule Application Questions—Questions to show what the rule means and how it works; they sharpen and deepen your understanding of the rule. E.g.: Did Prince Charming commit an offensive contact when he kissed Sleeping Beauty? What if Sleeping Beauty enjoyed the kiss?
Policy Based Questions (PBQs)	Policy-Based Questions (PBQs)—Questions that explore and highlight the purpose of the rule and show you the kinds of problems the rule is intended to tackle E.g.: Should we as a society hold small children or the mentally ill liable for their intentional conduct? Should we carve out any exceptions? Even if they did not intend the bizarre results of their conduct, is it appropriate that courts hold intentional tortfeasors liable? What interest are we protecting by recognizing this tort?
Case Comparison Questions (CCQs)	Questions that ask you to compare/contrast the reasoning, holding, etc. from one case to another case or to another source of law (e.g., how a case fits into the context of other cases or how a case connects to a statute or code provision). E.g.: How does the definition of intent in Garratt v. Dailey differ from the definition of intent in Spivey v. Battaglia? Is this difference significant? Why do we have this difference in how we define intent?

Hypothetical/Application Questions (HAQs)	Questions that present you with new facts (hypos) and/or that alter the facts from a case you studied earlier, and ask whether you, as the judge, would have decided the case differently. They develop/extend your understanding of what the rule means and they help you see rule exceptions, and nuances of the rule, etc. Many of these questions come from the notes that follow the cases. E.g.: Could Sleeping Beauty have sued Prince Charming for kissing her? What result if the defendant made an honest mistake? Would we get a different result if…?
Lawyer Development Questions (LDQs)	Questions that are not necessarily connected to the particular rules you are studying, but they connect you to knowledge, skills, and abilities a lawyer needs to develop. E.g.: Why did the defendant, Mr. Battaglia argue that his hug was an assault and battery as a matter of law? Why are Mr. and Mrs. Spivey the plaintiffs in the Spivey case? What was Mr. Spivey's cause of action and on what basis was he able to sue the defendant? What is the restatement? Do you think the court got it right in this case?

Conclusion

You'll soon learn that you won't find the answers to many of these questions directly in the cases. Instead, some of these questions require you to think, use your imagination, common knowledge and common sense and go beyond the obvious. Also, often there are no right answers to some of these questions—at least not a single right answer. Instead, professors ask questions because they want to use them as a springboard for discussion; they are thought provoking. Therefore, don't be surprised when the professor asks you a follow-up question or series of follow-up questions. He or she is not implying that your "answer" is necessarily "wrong." Try to avoid the right/wrong construct. Instead, consider other options or possibilities that your answer did not contemplate. When you prepare and when you are in class, use questions to fire up your imagination and curiosity and take you beyond what you already know. Try to come up with your own list of questions when you read, questions that can enhance your understanding of the subject matter you are studying. Remember, lawyers for the parties in a dispute ask a lot of questions to explore the matter they're tasked to help the client with—this is a big part of what lawyers do. From day one, your professors will use questions—many, many questions—to train you. We recommend you embrace the work out!

Case Briefing Cheat Sheet: A Shopping List of What to Search for in a Judicial Opinion

Item	Description
1. Case Name	The case name is located at the top of the case. It gives the last names of the parties. It is generally formatted like the following: Plaintiff v. Defendant, Petitioner v. Respondent, or Appellant v. Appellee. E.g. Roe v. Wade
2. Court & Date	This is the court writing the opinion (Ex: Supreme Court) and the date of the opinion (1985)
3. Procedural History	The procedural history is generally found in several paragraphs and describes (i) how the defendant wronged the plaintiff, (ii) what the parties argued in the lower court, (iii) how the lower court ruled, (iv) how and why the case moved from the lower court to the higher court (i.e., the basis of the appeal or what the person appealing wants from the higher court). It is generally a blend of facts and legal language.
4. Question Presented (i.e., the issue)	The question presented is generally a legal or procedural question that the appellant wants the higher court to answer. It is the reason why the case moved from the lower court to the higher court. Sometimes the appellant asks more than one question.
5. Facts	Not all facts are relevant; some are relevant for one purpose but not for another. Once you find the question presented and the legal holding, you should have a better feel for which facts are truly important. The facts do not include the court's opinion, but rather include the legally significant points of the story from the plaintiff's and defendant's points of view.
6. Rule (i.e., the law)	The rule may look like three things: (i) a succinct statement of the governing legal principle that the higher court uses to decide the case (about a sentence in length); (ii) a sentence or paragraph where the higher court answers the question presented; or (iii) a paragraph that describes under what circumstances a person is liable. The rule may be all three. You will sometimes have to reduce the number of words the court uses—without losing meaning—to shorten the rule.
7. Reasoning	The reasoning is generally several paragraphs following the rule where the court explains how and why it answered the question presented as it did. It is a blend of facts and legal language. Pay close attention to this as you will have to show your reasoning when you answer essay questions. Take time to fully wrap your head around how the court explains itself. You will encounter clear and well-explained reasoning as well as fuzzy and hard-to-follow reasoning.
8. Holding	The holding is the court's answer to the question(s) presented. There are narrow procedural holdings (for example, "case reversed and remanded") and broader substantive holdings that might deal with the interpretation of the Constitution, statutes, or judicial doctrines. If the issues were stated precisely, the holding can be stated as "yes" or "no," or in short statements taken from the language used by the court. Sometimes it's: "We hold that…"
9. Main Take-Away	Every case is in the textbook for a reason. Before you read and while you read, you should ask yourself over and over, "What is the main takeaway of this case? Why have the authors included this case in the book? And why have they placed the case in this particular section?" Find this and you are golden. But remember that sometimes your professors will use a case for different or additional reasons beyond what the casebook author intended. Don't get nervous, just try to understand why the professor is going there…

Sample Case Brief

Timing: Read before Day One

Purpose: The purpose of this handout is to provide you with a sample case brief that you can use as a template when you prepare your own case briefs.

1. Case Name: Garratt (P) v. Dailey (D) (p. 17)

2. Court & Date: Supreme Court of Washington, 1955

3. Procedural History: (p. 17 & 18) The trial court held that Dailey did not possess "any willful or unlawful purpose" or intent to harm Garratt when he moved the chair. The judge dismissed the action against Dailey. The trial court then determined that Garratt had suffered some $11,000 in damages, in case the decision was to be overruled on appeal. Garratt appealed to the Supreme Court of Washington, requesting entry of judgment in her favor or a new trial.

4. Questions Presented: (P. 18) First, whether the element of intent, for the tort of battery, is satisfied if a defendant knows with "substantial certainty" that his/her act will result in offensive contact? Second, whether a 5-year old can commit an intentional tort? (See holding for answer.)

5. Facts: (P. 18) Conflicting testimony but Garratt alleged that Dailey (who is 5 years old) deliberately pulled a lawn chair out from under her as she started to sit down. Dailey claimed he had moved the chair to sit in it, realized Garratt was about to sit down where chair had been, and was moving it back when she fell and broke her hip. Trial court believed Dailey's version.

6. Rule: (P. 18) "In order that an act may be done with the intention of bringing about a harmful or offensive contact or an apprehension thereof to a particular person . . . the act must be done for the purpose of causing the contact . . . or with knowledge on the part of the actor that such contact . . . is substantially certain to be produced.'"

7. Reasoning: (P. 18) The trial court determined that the plaintiff failed to prove that Dailey pulled the chair out while she was in the act of sitting down. Thus, it cannot be said the act was done for the purpose of causing the contact; however, it is unclear whether Dailey knew that such contact was substantially certain to occur. Plaintiff would establish a battery if, in addition to her fall, she proved Dailey knew with substantial certainty when he moved the chair that she would attempt to sit down where the chair had been. The mere absence of an intent to injure the plaintiff, play a prank on her, embarrass her, or commit an assault and battery on her would not shield Dailey from liability if, in fact, he had such knowledge.

8. Holding: (P. 19) Yes as to both questions presented. The cause is remanded for clarification, with instructions to make definite findings on the issue of whether Dailey knew with substantial certainty that the plaintiff would attempt to sit down where the chair which he moved had been, and to change the judgment if the findings warrant it. The court also held that a minor can be liable for an intentional tort.

9. Main Takeaway: This case defines "intent." A defendant has the required intent (i) when it is his purpose that a specific result occurs or (ii) when he is substantially certain that a given result will occur.

Glossary of Legal Terms

Timing: Read before Day One

Purpose: The purpose of this handout is to provide you with a glossary of some of the frequently-used legal terms and will help you to jumpstart your case reading.

Appellant: The party who is dissatisfied with the judgment of the trial court and seeks to have that judgment reversed or altered by appealing the judgment to a higher court.

Appellee: Sometimes called a respondent, the party opposing the appellant on appeal.

Bluebook: The Bluebook: A Uniform System of Citation is published by the Harvard Law Review and other leading law reviews and sets forth abbreviations and rules of citation for legal materials. It is the accepted standard in law school writing but isn't necessarily followed by courts or attorneys who may be required to follow local rules.

Brief: There are two types of briefs: (1) Briefs of cases and (2) Briefs that are prepared for court. Case briefs are the documents you will create to prepare for class. Your briefs highlight/summarize the most important information in a case. In other words, it's a summary of the high points of the case. Many students find them very useful as a reference when called upon in class. Briefs prepared for court set forth legal arguments and conclusions.

Casebook: The textbook that you will use for your class that is comprised of edited versions of published cases. Note: Most cases have been rather heavily edited by the casebook authors.

Citation: The reference which helps you identify a particular case, law review article, book, statute or other resource, whether primary or secondary. For example, the citation for Roe v. Wade is 410 US 959 (1973). This means the case appears in volume 410 of the official United States Reports beginning at page 959. The opinion was rendered in 1973. 42 USC 1983 is the citation for civil rights legislation which appears in title 42 of the United States Code at section 1983.

Civil/Criminal: Civil cases are typically disputes between persons or entities in which the remedy sought is money damages, or sometimes an order that the defendant do, or refrain from doing, certain acts. Civil cases include torts, suits about contracts, family law cases, etc. A criminal case, by contrast, is always brought by a governmental entity (through a federal or local prosecutor) against a defendant for a violation of a criminal statute where the penalty may be a fine, imprisonment, or both. Although the victim of a crime may be a witness, the victim is not really a party to the prosecution of a criminal defendant.

Court/court: When the word "court" by itself is capitalized in a sentence, it is generally referring to the United States Supreme Court. Lower case "court" refers to all other courts. When naming a specific court, such as the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, the word court is capitalized.

Defendant: The person against whom a lawsuit or prosecution has been brought. In a civil suit this is the person from whom a plaintiff seeks relief. In a criminal action, it is the accused (who is innocent until proven guilty...).

Dissent: A judge's disagreement with the majority of the court. Appellate court cases are heard by a panel of judges that can vary in number depending on the jurisdiction. A judge (or judges) who disagrees with the majority ruling and opinion will often write a dissenting opinion explaining his or her reasons for disagreement.

Opinion: The written product of a judge or judges handing down and explaining a decision. Opinions are usually written by appellate courts, but may also be written by trial judges who resolve legal issues at the trial level. A majority opinion is joined by a majority of the judges participating in the decision. A dissenting opinion disagrees with the holding of the majority; a concurring opinion agrees with the majority's holding but for different reasons; a plurality opinion is joined by the largest number of judges when no majority opinion is achieved; and there can also be opinions that dissent in part, concur in part, etc.

Petitioner: The petitioner is the party who presents a petition to the court. On appeal, the petitioner is usually the party who lost in the lower court. This can be either the plaintiff or defendant from the court below, as either of the parties can present the case to a higher court for further proceedings.

Plaintiff: The individual or organization who initiates a lawsuit by filing a complaint. In a criminal action it is the government. (Typically the government in a criminal matter is not called the plaintiff. Instead, it is called the people or the state or the government…)

Precedent: An existing opinion, usually published, which, because of its similar facts and legal issues, serves to guide a court in the case before it. Our common law system is based upon precedent. Courts will look to principles established in earlier cases. Those decisions that involve similar facts or legal issues serve to guide a court and are regarded as precedent.

Remand: An order made by an appellate court whose ruling was sought by appealing parties. A remand does not end the case. Instead, the case is sent back (remanded) to the lower court to do whatever is necessary to be consistent with the appeals court's decision. This may mean conducting a new trial, entering judgment for a different party, holding a hearing on a part of the case, etc.

Restatement: Several volumes produced by the American Law Institute and authored by legal scholars and experts that set forth statements of major areas of law (as contracts, torts, trusts, and property) and are widely referred to in jurisprudence but are not binding. It is the not the law but a restatement of the law by non-judges who are deemed experts in that particular field. Courts sometimes cite to the restatement; if they adopt the restatement, then that becomes the law.

Respondent: The respondent is the party against whom a petition is filed, especially one on appeal—the person who must respond to the filing. The respondent can be either the plaintiff or the defendant from the court below, as either party can appeal the decision, thereby making themselves the petitioner and their adversary the respondent.

Tort: A generic term encompassing many different causes of action in which a plaintiff alleges some injury caused by the defendant. Torts include such actionable wrongs as assault, invasion of privacy, product liability (injury caused by defective goods) and many others. The most common tort is an action for negligence. A person injured by the negligent conduct of another (such as in an automobile accident) may sue to recover monetary damages for those injuries.

Daily Reflections: Entry #1

Timing: Complete before Day One

Purpose: The following questions are intended to help you focus your expectations for the first day of Lawyering Fundamentals so that you can make the most out of the class. Please upload your responses to the Matrix course page.

Reflection:

Socrates said that the unexamined life is not worth living. Indeed, most successful people attribute their success to periods of regular reflection.

What do we mean by reflection? Self-reflection, in its simplest form, is asking thought-provoking questions. Appropriate self-reflection helps you develop a deeper understanding of why you do what you do, how you do what you do, and whether or not you are succeeding; it's a way to get to know yourself better and to evaluate your actions. You can do it (i) when you are unsure about something; (ii) when you feel like you could have (or should have) done something differently; and (iii) when you want to take stock of your accomplishments. In learning theory, this is referred to as metacognition, or "thinking about thinking." Self-reflection is a critical part of your law school success.

While you will have guides and mentors who will show you different pathways to learning, you will soon learn that no one is going to spoon-feed you the law. Although law school is so expensive, you are ultimately responsible for your own learning. Because a lawyer is a problem solver, a critical part of her training from day one is to learn how to recognize problems and to craft solutions for those problems, sometimes in consultation with more seasoned lawyers. Therefore, take time to assess how your training is progressing early and often. This will allow you to determine when to stay on track to reach your goals, when to make changes, or when to seek help. Your reflection period can also be a time to evaluate your emotions to better manage anxiety and stress. There will be many people to help you along the way, but it's on you to really make it happen.

Because Lawyering Fundamentals is such a fast-paced course, one way to ensure you assimilate what you are learning is to set aside time to process your thoughts. You will be completing one of these reflection exercises every day. Below are several questions to gather your thoughts in anticipation of the first day of classes. Use these questions to aid your preparation and set your expectations.

Questions (upload your responses to Matrix course page):

1. My initial thoughts about attending Lawyering Fundamentals are:

___

___

2. I anticipate law school will be different from undergrad in the following ways:

___

___

3. Based on the assigned reading and homework, I anticipate the first class will cover:

___

___

4. In Lawyering Fundamentals, I hope to learn:

___

___

5. I anticipate the most challenging part of the first day of Lawyering Fundamentals will be:

___

___

6. Currently, I feel… (circle all that apply)
   Excited Stressed Tired Anxious Optimistic Prepared Confident Worried

7. If I am feeling stressed or anxious, to reduce or eliminate these feelings I will:

___

___

8. To build my future professional relationships and friendships I plan to:

___

___

9. Other reflections:

___

___

Lawyering Fundamentals Writing Sample:
The Fruit Problem

30 minutes

Name: ________________________________
School: ________________________________ Section: __________

Timing: Complete before Day One

Purpose: This assignment requires you to use the IRAC paradigm to organize your answer and serves as a very basic introduction to analyzing and writing like a lawyer. (In this context a paradigm is simply a framework. See below for more on the IRAC paradigm.) Be sure to call on your logical reasoning abilities to analyze and communicate your answer. Use this exercise as a starting point to track your progress as you learn how to problem-solve and communicate like a lawyer.

Instructions:

- Read the fact pattern (the question)
- Take a few minutes to get familiar with the IRAC paradigm (structure) in which your answer should fit. (We have included an example at the end of this document. Do not write your answer until you review the example.)
- Note: You will need to formulate a rule or multiple rules to guide your analysis of the Fruit Problem. Try to fully explain your reasoning
- Upload a copy of your answer to the Matrix course page by 5:00 PM forty-eight hours before the start of the first day of class
- Bring a copy of your answer to class
- Try to keep your answer brief
- This assignment should take you about 45 minutes to complete.

barbri

Fact Pattern:

Lindsey walked through the grocery store to buy some fruit. She first put two apples in her basket, and then she added three oranges. Later, she realized that she did not have enough apples, so she added four more, along with six bananas. She then dropped one orange on the floor, so she had to add one more orange to her basket. Lindsey finally decided that she had enough fruit.

How many apples and oranges does Lindsey have in her basket? Explain fully.

(Use the template below to assist you to construct a fully explained answer.)

Issue:____

Rule(s):____

Analysis:____

Conclusion:

A Basic Example of Structured Writing

To help you understand the IRAC paradigm/writing structure, here is an example.

Hypothetical Scenario: You really like music; everyone knows that. One day a friend asks you: What makes a good song? You are able to outline the criteria you use to judge if a song is a good song without breaking a sweat. So you tell your friend: Rhymes (lyrics, words), rhythm (beat), and resonation (how well you connect with the song, how it makes you feel, it resonates with you). Your friend seems to agree with your criteria for what makes a good song. But then with a wry smile your friend asks you to name a good song. You drop the name of one of Adele's hit songs: Someone Like You, but your friend shakes her head and says: Why is that a good song? You answer: Because I feel that it's a good song; everybody knows that; look how many copies it has sold! That might work with your friend, but if you were asked to provide a logically sound, structured written response to the question "what makes a song a good song," you would need to connect your explanation to a defined rule or framework that will help your friend understand not only what criteria you are using to form such a conclusion, but also how you reached that conclusion. See the below excerpt for a good example of the kind of structured logical response that would be more appropriate to your friend's question.

After carefully reading the below answer, paying close attention to how the answer is structured, return to the Fruit Problem.

Question: What makes a song a good song? Is Adele's Someone Like You a Good Song?

Issue: The issue is to determine whether or not Adele's "Someone Like You" is a good song"

Rules: There are three factors that should be considered when determining whether a song is a good song. First, the song should have a good rhythm or beat. Second, the song should have good rhymes, that is good lyrics, good words. Third, the song's message should resonate with something in the listener's life that makes it enjoyable or meaningful; it should reverberate and be memorable.

Analysis: The song, "Someone Like You" by Adele is a good song. First, the song has a soulful rhythm that makes the song fluid and powerful. Many times I catch myself moving to the beat of the song. Second, the song has beautiful and truthful lyrics such as "Sometimes it lasts in love, sometimes it hurts instead." Everyone listening to those words can readily understand the meaning; they know what Adele is talking about; her rhymes make sense. Third, the song resonates with me as a listener and is meaningful because I have lost a relationship and had to find a way to deal with the emotional aftermath in order to move forward with my life. In particular, the line "I will find someone like you" is very meaningful because it moves me and captures the healing process of a broken heart. The song is one that I think about a lot and will always remember.

Conclusion: Therefore, because of its rhymes, rhythm and the fact that I can so easily relate to it, the song, "Someone Like You" is a good song.

Pre-Course Law School Survey

Name: ______________________________
School: ______________________________ Section: _________________________

Timing: Before Day One

Purpose: This short survey asks you to record your awareness of some of the important issues that are pertinent to succeeding in law school, including your plans after law school.

Introduction:

We invite you to complete this short pre-course survey before the start of Lawyering Fundamentals. This survey will help us (and you) gain better insight into your knowledge, experience, skills, and goals. It will also serve as a baseline to measure your understanding as your legal training progresses throughout this course.

Directions:

- Complete this survey on the Matrix course page. Answer each question by selecting the answer when appropriate or providing a brief explanation when requested.

Section I. Experience with the Work of Lawyers

Have you worked in a law firm before?	Yes	No
Have you ever prepared or help to prepare a legal document such as a brief, complaint, answer, discovery item, contract, or will?	Yes	No
Have you ever attended or participated in a trial or legal proceeding in any capacity?	Yes	No
Have you ever used the services of a lawyer?	Yes	No
If you answered yes, was your experience with the lawyer positive?	Yes	No
Do you have any family members that are lawyers?	Yes	No
Do you have any friends that are lawyers?	Yes	No
Did you do any research on the work of lawyers before or after applying to law school?	Yes	No
How would you rank your familiarity with the workings of the legal system, especially the work of lawyers and judges? (1 is little or no familiarity and 5 is extremely familiar)	1 2 3 4 5

Section II. Law School Skills

Could you write out a basic description/definition of a legal opinion?	Yes	No
Have you read a legal opinion prior to this class?	Yes	No
Do you know what a case brief is?	Yes	No
If yes, how comfortable do you feel creating a case brief? (1 is the least comfortable and 5 is extremely comfortable)	1 2 3 4 5
Do you know what the Socratic Method is?	Yes	No
If yes, how comfortable do you feel participating in Socratic dialog? (1 is the least comfortable and 5 is extremely comfortable)	1 2 3 4 5
How comfortable do you feel about speaking in class? (1 is the least comfortable and 5 is extremely comfortable)	1 2 3 4 5

Question	Response
How comfortable do you feel about completing your reading for class? (1 is the least comfortable and 5 is the most comfortable)	1 2 3 4 5
How comfortable do you feel about taking notes in a law school class? (1 is the least comfortable and 5 is the most comfortable)	1 2 3 4 5
Do you know what a law school exam outline is?	Yes No
If yes, how comfortable do you feel about creating an outline? (1 is the least comfortable and 5 is the most comfortable)	1 2 3 4 5
Have you ever answered a law school style multiple-choice question?	Yes No
How comfortable are you with multiple-choice tests in general? (1 is the least comfortable and 5 is the most comfortable)	1 2 3 4 5
Have you ever answered a law school style essay question?	Yes No
How comfortable are you with answering essay questions in general? (1 is the least comfortable and 5 is the most comfortable)	1 2 3 4 5
Have you done any kind of legal research and writing before?	Yes No
Are you aware of the distinctions between legal writing and other forms of writing? (1 is unaware and 5 is well versed)	1 2 3 4 5
How comfortable are you with research and writing in general? (1 is the least comfortable and 5 is the most comfortable)	1 2 3 4 5

Section III. Law School Success and Career Goals

Question	Response
How interested are you in practicing law? (1 is the least interested and 5 is the most interested)	1 2 3 4 5
In what area of law would you like to practice? For example, family law, criminal law, environmental, etc. Write your answer in the box to the right.
Do you understand how your law school's grading curve (if it has one) works?	Yes No

Where do you want to graduate: top 10%, top 25%, top 50%, etc.? Write the percentage in the box to the right.	%
Do you feel confident that you can reach your class rank percentage goal? (1 is the least confident and 5 is the most confident)	1 2 3 4 5
Do you know what Law Review is?	Yes No
Do you want to participate in the Law Review or other Journal?	Yes No
Do you know what Moot Court is?	Yes No
Do you want to participate in Moot Court?	Yes No
Do you know what Mock trial is?	Yes No
Do you want to participate in Mock Trial?	Yes No
How strong are your time management skills? (1 is the weakest and 5 is the strongest)	1 2 3 4 5
How strong are your stress management skills? (1 is the weakest and 5 is the strongest)	1 2 3 4 5
Do you think it is important to make friends in law school?	Yes No
How supportive is your family about you attending law school? (1 is the least supportive and 5 is the most supportive)	1 2 3 4 5
After completing the above questions, do you feel more aware of some of the issues pertinent to your training to become a lawyer? (1 is no increase in awareness and 5 is major increase)	1 2 3 4 5

Is there anything else you would like to share before you start Lawyering Fundamentals?

____

____

____

____

____

Lawyering Fundamentals
Torts Cases

Reprinted with Permission from Thomson Reuters

TABLE OF CONTENTS

INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH PERSON OR PROPERTY 17

INTENT 17
Garratt v. Dailey 17
Spivey v. Battaglia...20
Ranson v. Kitner..24
McGuire v. Almy..25
Talmage v. Smith 28
BATTERY...30
Cole v. Turner..30
Wallace v. Rosen 31
Restatement (Second) of Torts (Battery)..34
Fisher v. Carrousel Motor Hotel, Inc. 36
ASSAULT 37
I de S et. ux. v. W de S 37
Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Hill 38
FALSE IMPRISONMENT 41
Big Town Nursing Home, Inc. v. Newman...41
Parvi v. City of Kingston 43
Hardy v. LaBelle's Distributing Co...45
Enright v. Groves..47
Whittaker v. Sandford..49
INTENTIONAL INFLICTION OF EMOTIONAL DISTRESS 51
State Rubbish Collectors Ass'n v. Siliznoff...51
Slocum v. Food Fair Stores of Florida...55
Harris v. Jones..58
Taylor v. Vallelunga. 65

PRIVILEGES 92

CONSENT 92
O'Brien v. Cunard S.S. Co. 92
Hackbart v. Cincinnati Bengals, Inc...93
Mohr v. Williams 95
De May v. Roberts. 100

CASES AND MATERIALS

PROSSER, WADE AND SCHWARTZ'S

TORTS

TWELFTH EDITION

by

VICTOR E. SCHWARTZ
Adjunct Professor of Law, University of Cincinnati College of Law
Chairman, Public Policy Group, Shook, Hardy & Bacon L.L.P
Washington, D.C.

KATHRYN KELLY
Professor of Law,
The Catholic University of America

DAVID F. PARTLETT
Dean and Asa Griggs Candler Professor of Law, Emory University School of Law

FOUNDATION PRESS
2010

This publication was created to provide you with accurate and authoritative information concerning the subject matter covered; however, this publication was not necessarily prepared by persons licensed to practice law in a particular jurisdiction. The publisher is not engaged in rendering legal or other professional advice and this publication is not a substitute for the advice of an attorney. If you require legal or other expert advice, you should seek the services of a competent attorney or other professional.

Nothing contained herein is intended or written to be used for the purposes of 1) avoiding penalties imposed under the federal Internal Revenue Code, or 2) promoting, marketing or recommending to another party any transaction or matter addressed herein.

© 1951, 1952, 1957, 1962, 1967, 1971, 1976, 1982, 1988, 1994, 2000 FOUNDATION PRESS

© 2005 THOMSON REUTERS/FOUNDATION PRESS

© 2010 By THOMSON REUTERS/FOUNDATION PRESS

1 New York Plaza, 34th Floor

New York, NY 10004

Phone Toll Free 1–877–888–1330

Fax (646) 424–5201

foundation–press.com

Printed in the United States of America

ISBN 978–1–59941–704–2

Mat #40856301

CHAPTER II

Intentional Interference With Person or Property

1. Intent

Garratt v. Dailey

Supreme Court of Washington, 1955.
46 Wash.2d 197, 279 P.2d 1091.

Hill, Justice. The liability of an infant for an alleged battery is presented to this court for the first time. Brian Dailey (age five years, nine months) was visiting with Naomi Garratt, an adult and a sister of the plaintiff, Ruth Garratt, likewise an adult, in the back yard of the plaintiff's home, on July 16, 1951. It is plaintiff's contention that she came out into the back yard to talk with Naomi and that, as she started to sit down in a wood and canvas lawn chair, Brian deliberately pulled it out from under her. The only one of the three present so testifying was Naomi Garratt. (Ruth Garratt, the plaintiff did not testify as to how or why she fell.) The trial court, unwilling to accept this testimony, adopted instead Brian Dailey's version of what happened, and made the following findings:

"III. * * * that while Naomi Garratt and Brian Dailey were in the back yard the plaintiff, Ruth Garratt, came out of her house into the back yard. Some time subsequent thereto defendant, Brian Dailey, picked up a lightly built wood and canvas lawn chair which was then and there located in the back yard of the above described premises, moved it sideways a few feet and seated himself therein, at which time he discovered the plaintiff, Ruth Garratt, about to sit down at the place where the lawn chair had formerly been, at which time he hurriedly got up from the chair and attempted to move it toward Ruth Garratt to aid her in sitting down in the chair; that due to the defendant's small size and lack of dexterity he was unable to get the lawn chair under the plaintiff in time to prevent her from falling to the ground. That plaintiff fell to the ground and sustained a fracture of her hip, and other injuries and damages as hereinafter set forth.

"IV. That the preponderance of the evidence in this case establishes that when the defendant, Brian Dailey moved the chair in question he did not have any wilful or unlawful purpose in doing so; that he did not have any intent to injure the plaintiff, or any intent to bring about any unauthorized or offensive contact with her person or any objects appurtenant thereto; that the circumstances which immediately preceded the fall of the plaintiff established that the defendant, Brian Dailey, did not have purpose, intent or design to perform a prank or to effect an assault and battery upon the person of the plaintiff.'' (Italics ours, for a purpose hereinafter indicated.)

It is conceded that Ruth Garratt's fall resulted in a fractured hip and other painful and serious injuries. To obviate the necessity of a retrial in the event this court determines that she was entitled to a judgment against Brian Dailey, the amount of her damage was found to be $11,000. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment dismissing the action and asks for the entry of a judgment in that amount or a new trial.

The authorities generally, but with certain notable exceptions, [c] state that when a minor has committed a tort with force he is liable to be proceeded against as any other person would be. * * *

In our analysis of the applicable law, we start with the basic premise that Brian, whether five or fifty-five, must have committed some wrongful act before he could be liable for appellant's injuries. * * *

It is urged that Brian's action in moving the chair constituted a battery. A definition (not all-inclusive but sufficient for our purpose) of a battery is the intentional infliction of a harmful bodily contact upon another. * * *

We have in this case no question of consent or privilege. We therefore proceed to an immediate consideration of intent and its place in the law of battery. In the comment on clause (a) of § 13, the Restatement says:

''Character of Actor's Intention. In order that an act may be done with the intention of bringing about a harmful or offensive contact or an apprehension thereof to a particular person, either the other or a third person, the act must be done for the purpose of causing the contact or apprehension or with knowledge on the part of the actor that such contact or apprehension is substantially certain to be produced.'' [C]

We have here the conceded volitional act of Brian, i.e., the moving of a chair. Had the plaintiff proved to the satisfaction of the trial court that Brian moved the chair while she was in the act of sitting down, Brian's action would patently have been for the purpose or with the intent of causing the plaintiff's bodily contact with the ground, and she would be entitled to a judgment against him for the resulting damages. [Cc]

The plaintiff based her case on that theory, and the trial court held that she failed in her proof and accepted Brian's version of the facts rather than that given by the eyewitness who testified for the plaintiff. After the trial court determined that the plaintiff had not established her theory of a battery (i.e., that Brian had pulled the chair out from under the plaintiff while she was in the act of sitting down), it then became concerned with whether a battery was established under the facts as it found them to be.

In this connection, we quote another portion of the comment on the ''Character of actor's intention,'' relating to clause (a) of the rule from [Restatement, (First) Torts, 29, § 13]:

"It is not enough that the act itself is intentionally done and this, even though the actor realizes or should realize that it contains a very grave risk of bringing about the contact or apprehension. Such realization may make the actor's conduct negligent or even reckless but unless he realizes that to a substantial certainty, the contact or apprehension will result, the actor has not that intention which is necessary to make him liable under the rule stated in this section."

A battery would be established if, in addition to plaintiff's fall, it was proved that, when Brian moved the chair, he knew with substantial certainty that the plaintiff would attempt to sit down where the chair had been. If Brian had any of the intents which the trial court found, in the italicized portions of the findings of fact quoted above, that he did not have, he would of course have had the knowledge to which we have referred. The mere absence of any intent to injure the plaintiff or to play a prank on her or to embarrass her, or to commit an assault and battery on her would not absolve him from liability if in fact he had such knowledge. [C] Without such knowledge, there would be nothing wrongful about Brian's act in moving the chair and, there being no wrongful act, there would be no liability.

While a finding that Brian had no such knowledge can be inferred from the findings made, we believe that before the plaintiff's action in such a case should be dismissed there should be no question but that the trial court had passed upon that issue; hence, the case should be remanded for clarification of the findings to specifically cover the question of Brian's knowledge, because intent could be inferred therefrom. If the court finds that he had such knowledge the necessary intent will be established and the plaintiff will be entitled to recover, even though there was no purpose to injure or embarrass the plaintiff. [C] If Brian did not have such knowledge, there was no wrongful act by him and the basic premise of liability on the theory of a battery was not established.

It will be noted that the law of battery as we have discussed it is the law applicable to adults, and no significance has been attached to the fact that Brian was a child less than six years of age when the alleged battery occurred. The only circumstance where Brian's age is of any consequence is in determining what he knew, and there his experience, capacity, and understanding are of course material.

From what has been said, it is clear that we find no merit in plaintiff's contention that we can direct the entry of a judgment for $11,000 in her favor on the record now before us.

Nor do we find any error in the record that warrants a new trial. * * *

The cause is remanded for clarification, with instructions to make definite findings on the issue of whether Brian Dailey knew with substantial certainty that the plaintiff would attempt to sit down where the chair which he moved had been, and to change the judgment if the findings warrant it. * * *

Remanded for clarification.

[On remand, the trial judge concluded that it was necessary for him to consider carefully the time sequence, as he had not done before; and this resulted in his finding "that the arthritic woman had begun the slow process of being seated when the defendant quickly removed the chair and seated himself upon it, and that he knew, with substantial certainty, at that time that she would attempt to sit in the place where the chair had been." He entered judgment for the plaintiff in the amount of $11,000, which was affirmed on a second appeal in Garratt v. Dailey, 49 Wash.2d 499, 304 P.2d 681 (1956).]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The trial court judge found that plaintiff suffered damages in the amount of $11,000. For most intentional torts, the court will award nominal damages even if no actual damages were proved. Of course, if the plaintiff does prove actual damages, as she did in this case, defendant is liable for those actual damages. How would Ms. Garratt's lawyer prove actual damages? See Chapter 10, Damages.

2. Note that the trial judge was the finder of fact at both trials. Why do you think his findings of fact were different the second time? Might he have been influenced by the appellate court's view of the facts as well as its pronouncement of the law?

3. Can a child five years and nine months old have an intent to do harm to another? And if so, how can that intent be "fault"? Suppose that a boy of seven, playing with a bow and arrow, aims at the feet of a girl of five but the arrow hits her in the eye. Is he liable? Weisbart v. Flohr, 260 Cal.App.2d 281, 67 Cal.Rptr. 114 (1968) (yes).

4. Can a four-year-old child who strikes his babysitter in the throat, crushing her larynx, be held liable for an intentional tort? Bailey v. C.S., 12 S.W.3d 159 (Tex. App. 2000) (rejecting argument that four-year-old was incapable of intent). What about a two-year-old child who bites an infant? See Fromenthal v. Clark, 442 So.2d 608 (La.App.1983), cert. denied, 444 So.2d 1242 (1984) (affirming trial court ruling that two-year-old was too young to form intent).

5. Some states have parental responsibility statutes that make parents liable for their child's malicious torts. Can a young child commit a tort requiring a "malicious" state of mind? Ortega v. Montoya, 97 N.M. 159, 637 P.2d 841 (1981) (eight-year-old boy could be capable of willful and malicious conduct and it was for jury to determine whether he had acted in such a manner).

Spivey v. Battaglia

Supreme Court of Florida, 1972.
258 So.2d 815.

DEKLE, JUSTICE. * * * Petitioner (plaintiff in the trial court) and respondent (defendant) were employees of Battaglia Fruit Co. on January 21, 1965. During the lunch hour several employees of Battaglia Fruit Co., including petitioner and respondent, were seated on a work table in the plant of the company. Respondent, in an effort to tease petitioner, whom he knew to be shy, intentionally put his arm around petitioner and pulled her head toward him. Immediately after this "friendly unsolicited hug," petitioner suffered a sharp pain in the back of her neck and ear, and sharp pains into the base of her skull. As a result, petitioner was paralyzed on the left side of her face and mouth.

An action was commenced in the Circuit Court of Orange County, Florida, wherein the petitioners, Mr. and Mrs. Spivey, brought suit against respondent for, (1) negligence, and (2) assault and battery. Respondent, Mr. Battaglia, filed his answer raising as a defense the claim that his ''friendly unsolicited hug'' was an assault and battery as a matter of law and was barred by the running of the two-year statute of limitations on assault and battery. Respondent's motion for summary judgment was granted by the trial court on this basis. The district court affirmed on the authority of McDonald v. Ford, [223 So.2d 553 (Fla.App.1969)].

The question presented for our determination is whether petitioner's action could be maintained on the negligence count, or whether respondent's conduct amounted to an assault and battery as a matter of law, which would bar the suit under the two-year statute (which had run).

In McDonald the incident complained of occurred in the early morning hours in a home owned by the defendant. While the plaintiff was looking through some records, the defendant came up behind her, laughingly embraced her and, though she resisted, kissed her hard. As the defendant was hurting the plaintiff physically by his embrace, the plaintiff continued to struggle violently and the defendant continued to laugh and pursue his love-making attempts. In the process, plaintiff struck her face hard upon an object that she was unable to identify specifically. With those facts before it, the district court held that what actually occurred was an assault and battery, and not negligence. The court quoted with approval from the Court of Appeals of Ohio in Williams v. Pressman, 113 N.E.2d 395, at 396 (Ohio App.1953):

''* * * an assault and battery is not negligence, for such action is intentional, while negligence connotes an unintentional act.''

The intent with which such a tort liability as assault is concerned is not necessarily a hostile intent, or a desire to do harm. Where a reasonable man would believe that a particular result was substantially certain to follow, he will be held in the eyes of the law as though he had intended it. It would thus be an assault (intentional). However, the knowledge and appreciation of a risk, short of substantial certainty, is not the equivalent of intent. Thus, the distinction between intent and negligence boils down to a matter of degree. ''Apparently the line has been drawn by the courts at the point where the known danger ceases to be only a foreseeable risk which a reasonable man would avoid (negligence), and becomes a substantial certainty.'' In the latter case, the intent is legally implied and becomes an assault rather than unintentional negligence.

The distinction between the unsolicited kisses in McDonald, supra, and the unsolicited hug in the present case turns upon this question of intent. In McDonald, the court, finding an assault and battery, necessarily had to find initially that the results of the defendant's acts were ''intentional.''

This is a rational conclusion in view of the struggling involved there. In the instant case, the DCA must have found the same intent. But we cannot agree with that finding in these circumstances. It cannot be said that a reasonable man in this defendant's position would believe that the bizarre results herein were ''substantially certain'' to follow. This is an unreasonable conclusion and is a misapplication of the rule in McDonald. This does not mean that he does not become liable for such unanticipated results, however. The settled law is that a defendant becomes liable for reasonably foreseeable consequences, though the exact results and damages were not contemplated.

Acts that might be considered prudent in one case might be negligent in another. Negligence is a relative term and its existence must depend in each case upon the particular circumstances which surrounded the parties at the time and place of the events upon which the controversy is based.

The trial judge committed error when he granted summary final judgment in favor of the defendant. The cause should have been submitted to the jury with appropriate instructions regarding the elements of negligence. Accordingly, certiorari is granted; the decision of the district court is hereby quashed and the cause is remanded with directions to reverse the summary final judgment.

It is so ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Distinguish:

A. The intent to do an act. The defendant throws a rock.

B. The intent to bring about the consequences of the act. The rock hits someone. Liability for intentional torts is premised on the intent to bring about the consequences (e.g., for battery, a touching that is harmful or offensive).

C. The intent to bring about a specific harm (e.g., broken leg). This is sufficient to establish intent, but not necessary.

D. The intent to do an act with actual knowledge on the part of the actor that the consequences (e.g., touching that is harmful or offensive) are substantially certain to follow. This is sufficient to establish intent.

E. The intent to do an act with knowledge on the part of the actor that he is risking particular consequences. This is not sufficient to establish intent—although it may be negligence if the risk is an unreasonable one under the circumstances.

2. Distinguish:

A. The defendant does not act. He is carried onto plaintiff's land against his will. Smith v. Stone, Style 65, 82 Eng.Rep. 533 (1647) (no liability).

B. He acts intentionally, but under fear or threats. Twelve armed men compel him to enter plaintiff's land and steal a horse. Gilbert v. Stone, Style 72, 82 Eng.Rep. 539 (1648) (liability).

C. He acts intentionally, but without any desire to affect the plaintiff, or any certainty that he will do so. He rides a horse, which runs away with him and runs the plaintiff down. Gibbons v. Pepper, 1 Ld.Raym. 38, 91 Eng.Rep. 922 (1695) (no liability if someone else struck the horse; liability if defendant's spurring caused runaway).

D. He acts with the desire to affect the plaintiff, but for an entirely permissible or laudable purpose. He shoots the plaintiff in self-defense or while a soldier defending his country. See Chapter 3 (satisfies intent requirement but may result in no liability if conduct is privileged).

3. While standing in line to pay for her purchases, plaintiff was attacked from behind by a mentally handicapped man who grabbed her hair and head and threw her to the ground. In an attempt to fit her claim within negligence, she argued that he was mentally incapable of forming intent to cause harm and thus did not commit a battery. The court rejected her argument, noting that the intentional tort of battery required only acting with intent to cause contact that was harmful or offensive, not acting with intent to cause harm. Wagner v. State, 2005 UT 54, 122 P.3d 599 (2005).

4. It may not seem important to distinguish between negligent and intentionally wrongful conduct: the defendant usually will be held liable to the plaintiff in either situation. Nevertheless, the distinction may be legally significant. Consider the following:

A. Will defendant be liable for punitive damages? See Chapter 10, Section 3.

B. Will the defense of contributory negligence be available to defendant? See page 613, note 7.

C. Will defendant's employer be liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior? See page 614, note 3.

D. How far will the law trace the consequences of defendant's wrongful act? See Tate v. Canonica, 180 Cal.App.2d 898, 5 Cal.Rptr. 28 (1960) (more inclined to find defendant's conduct was legal cause of harm if tort was intentional) and R.D. v. W.H., 875 P.2d 26 (Wyo.1994) (court imposes higher degree of responsibility on those who commit intentional act).

E. Will the defendant be reimbursed through a liability insurance policy? See Allstate Ins. Co. v. Hiseley, 465 F.2d 1243 (10th Cir.1972) (applying Oklahoma law) (following an incident outside a bar, one car pursued another at speeds over 100 miles an hour and then bumped it, causing its driver to lose control and crash) and Automobile Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Cook, 7 N.Y.3d 131, 850 N.E.2d 1152, 818 N.Y.S.2d 176 (2006) (insured shot an acquaintance in self defense inside insured's home). Pryor, The Stories We Tell: Intentional Harm and the Quest for Insurance Funding, 75 Tex.L.Rev. 1721 (1997).

F. Has the state statute of limitations run? See the principal case and Baska v. Scherzer, 283 Kan. 750, 156 P.3d 617 (2007) (statute of limitations for intentional tort applies to cause of action brought against two teenagers who hit the mother of one of their friends when the mother stepped between them to stop a fight).

G. Will an employer be subject to liability to an employee in spite of a general worker compensation immunity shield? Some state worker compensation statutes provide an exception to the immunity for intentional wrongdoing. Does an employer's intentional failure to train an employee to perform a dangerous task supply the requisite intent to injure under the worker compensation intentional injury exception? See Reed Tool Co. v. Copelin, 689 S.W.2d 404 (Tex.1985). What about an employer's deliberate exposure of employees to dangerous products? See Millison v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 101 N.J. 161, 501 A.2d 505 (1985) and Bardere v. Zafir, 102 A.D.2d 422, 477 N.Y.S.2d 131, aff'd, 63 N.Y.2d 850, 472 N.E.2d 37, 482

N.Y.S.2d 261 (1984) (plaintiff must show "specific acts [by the employer] directed at causing harm to particular employees").

H. Will the plaintiff be able to bring a cause of action against the United States, which may be liable for the negligent acts of its employees, but not for their intentional acts? See pages 683–684.

5. Do you think that a court's characterization of a defendant's conduct as "negligent" or "intentional" sometimes might be influenced by the legal effect of its finding? Since the court is not bound by either party's characterization of the events, such influence could occur, but only in close cases. At the receiving dock of a meatpacking plant, plaintiff was unloading a truck when a government meat inspector leapt out at him, screamed "boo," pulled his wool stocking cap over his eyes, and jumped on his back. Plaintiff fell forward and struck his face on some meat hooks, severely injuring his mouth and teeth. Plaintiff's complaint was for negligent conduct, apparently because the defendant's employer, the United States, would not be liable for its employee's battery. Cf. Lambertson v. United States, 528 F.2d 441 (2d Cir.1976), cert. denied, 426 U.S. 921 (1976) (court did not permit plaintiff to recover by "dressing up the substance" of battery in the "garments" of negligence).

6. For a discussion of the treatment of intent in English and American tort law, see Finnis, "Intention in Tort Law" in Owen, Philosophical Foundations of Tort Law 229 (Clarenden Press 1995).

Ranson v. Kitner

Appellate Court of Illinois, 1889.
31 Ill.App. 241.

CONGER, J. This was an action brought by appellee against appellants to recover the value of a dog killed by appellants, and a judgment rendered for $50.

The defense was that appellants were hunting for wolves, that appellee's dog had a striking resemblance to a wolf, that they in good faith believed it to be one, and killed it as such.

Many points are made, and a lengthy argument failed to show that error in the trial below was committed, but we are inclined to think that no material error occurred to the prejudice of appellants.

The jury held them liable for the value of the dog, and we do not see how they could have done otherwise under the evidence. Appellants are clearly liable for the damages caused by their mistake, notwithstanding they were acting in good faith.

We see no reason for interfering with the conclusion reached by the jury, and the judgment will be affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Did the defendant intend to kill the dog? The court calls it "mistake." Why not accident?

2. Defendant fuel oil distributor had a contract to deliver oil to a residence. One day, during the delivery, the oil overflowed and damaged surrounding lawn and shrubberies. The tank overflowed because it already had been filled by another company, hired by the new owner. The previous owner apparently had not canceled his contract when he moved. Is the fuel oil distributor liable for trespass? Serota v. M. & M. Utilities, Inc., 55 Misc.2d 286, 285 N.Y.S.2d 121 (1967) (reasonable mistake no defense to trespass).

3. Defendant, seeking to confront the driver who frightened his horses the previous day, pushed back the hat of the wrong man. Does he intend to touch him? Seigel v. Long, 169 Ala. 79, 53 So. 753 (1910). What if a surgeon operates on the wrong patient? Gill v. Selling, 125 Or. 587, 267 P. 812 (1928). Generally, mistake as to the identity of the person or animal does not negate intent. Will the mistake protect the defendant against liability for the result he intended to cause? There is general agreement that it does not where the defendant by mistake appropriates property of the plaintiff. If he is not held liable for his mistake, he would be unjustly enriched. Perry v. Jefferies, 61 S.C. 292, 39 S.E. 515 (1901) (cutting and removing timber from plaintiff's land under a reasonable belief that defendant owned it); Dexter v. Cole, 6 Wis. 319, 70 Am.Dec. 465 (1857) (driving off plaintiff's sheep, believed to be defendant's).

4. On the other hand, some of the defendant's privileges depend, not upon the existence of a fact, but upon the reasonable belief that the fact exists. Defendant, seeing the plaintiff reach for a handkerchief in his pocket, reasonably believes that he is reaching for a gun, and strikes plaintiff to defend himself. See page 105. Mistakes as to the existence of a privilege are dealt with in Chapter 3 in connection with the privilege itself.

McGuire v. Almy

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1937.
297 Mass. 323, 8 N.E.2d 760.

QUA, JUSTICE. This is an action of tort for assault and battery. The only question of law reported is whether the judge should have directed a verdict for the defendant.

The following facts are established by the plaintiff's own evidence: In August, 1930, the plaintiff was employed to take care of the defendant. The plaintiff was a registered nurse and was a graduate of a training school for nurses. The defendant was an insane person. Before the plaintiff was hired she learned that the defendant was a "mental case and was in good physical condition," and that for some time two nurses had been taking care of her. The plaintiff was on "24 hour duty." The plaintiff slept in the room next to the defendant's room. Except when the plaintiff was with the defendant, the plaintiff kept the defendant locked in the defendant's room. * * *

On April 19, 1932, the defendant, while locked in her room, had a violent attack. The plaintiff heard a crashing of furniture and then knew that the defendant was ugly, violent and dangerous. The defendant told the plaintiff and a Miss Maroney, "the maid," who was with the plaintiff in the adjoining room, that if they came into the defendant's room, she would kill them. The plaintiff and Miss Maroney looked into the defendant's room, "saw what the defendant had done," and "thought it best to take the broken stuff away before she did any harm to herself with it.'' They sent for a Mr. Emerton, the defendant's brother-in-law. When he arrived the defendant was in the middle of her room about ten feet from the door, holding upraised the leg of a low-boy as if she were going to strike. The plaintiff stepped into the room and walked toward the defendant, while Mr. Emerton and Miss Maroney remained in the doorway. As the plaintiff approached the defendant and tried to take hold of the defendant's hand which held the leg, the defendant struck the plaintiff's head with it, causing the injuries for which the action was brought.

The extent to which an insane person is liable for torts has not been fully defined in this Commonwealth. * * *

Turning to authorities elsewhere, we find that courts in this country almost invariably say in the broadest terms that an insane person is liable for his torts. As a rule no distinction is made between those torts which would ordinarily be classed as intentional and those which would ordinarily be classed as negligent, nor do the courts discuss the effect of different kinds of insanity or of varying degrees of capacity as bearing upon the ability of the defendant to understand the particular act in question or to make a reasoned decision with respect to it, although it is sometimes said that an insane person is not liable for torts requiring malice of which he is incapable. Defamation and malicious prosecution are the torts more commonly mentioned in this connection. * * * These decisions are rested more upon grounds of public policy and upon what might be called a popular view of the requirements of essential justice than upon any attempt to apply logically the underlying principles of civil liability to the special instance of the mentally deranged. Thus it is said that a rule imposing liability tends to make more watchful those persons who have charge of the defendant and who may be supposed to have some interest in preserving his property; that as an insane person must pay for his support, if he is financially able, so he ought also to pay for the damage which he does; that an insane person with abundant wealth ought not to continue in unimpaired enjoyment of the comfort which it brings while his victim bears the burden unaided; and there is also a suggestion that courts are loath to introduce into the great body of civil litigation the difficulties in determining mental capacity which it has been found impossible to avoid in the criminal field.

The rule established in these cases has been criticized severely by certain eminent text writers both in this country and in England, principally on the ground that it is an archaic survival of the rigid and formal mediaeval conception of liability for acts done, without regard to fault, as opposed to what is said to be the general modern theory that liability in tort should rest upon fault. Notwithstanding these criticisms, we think, that as a practical matter, there is strong force in the reasons underlying these decisions. They are consistent with the general statements found in the cases dealing with the liability of infants for torts, [cc] including a few cases in which the child was so young as to render his capacity for fault comparable to that of many insane persons, [cc]. Fault is by no means at the present day a universal prerequisite to liability, and the theory that it should be such has been obliged very recently to yield at several points to what have been thought to be paramount considerations of public good. Finally, it would be difficult not to recognize the persuasive weight of so much authority so widely extended.

But the present occasion does not require us either to accept or to reject the prevailing doctrine in its entirety. For this case it is enough to say that where an insane person by his act does intentional damage to the person or property of another he is liable for that damage in the same circumstances in which a normal person would be liable. This means that in so far as a particular intent would be necessary in order to render a normal person liable, the insane person, in order to be liable, must have been capable of entertaining that same intent and must have entertained it in fact. But the law will not inquire further into his peculiar mental condition with a view to excusing him if it should appear that delusion or other consequence of his affliction has caused him to entertain that intent or that a normal person would not have entertained it. * * *

Coming now to the application of the rule to the facts of this case, it is apparent that the jury could find that the defendant was capable of entertaining and that she did entertain an intent to strike and to injure the plaintiff and that she acted upon that intent. See American Law Institute Restatement, Torts, §§ 13, 14. We think this was enough. * * *

[The rest of the opinion holds that whether the plaintiff consented to the attack or assumed the risk of it is an issue to be left to the jury. There was no evidence that the defendant had previously attacked any one or made any serious threat to do so. The plaintiff had taken care of the defendant for fourteen months without being attacked. When the plaintiff entered the room the defendant was breaking up the furniture, and it could be found that the plaintiff reasonably feared that the defendant would do harm to herself. Under such circumstances it cannot be ruled as a matter of law that the plaintiff assumed the risk.]

Judgment for the plaintiff on the verdict.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Can someone who is mentally ill have an intent to do harm to another? And if so, how can such an intent be "fault"? How does the insane person differ from the automobile driver who suffers a heart attack, in Cohen v. Petty, page 10?

2. Note that the tort law standards differ from the criminal law standards for holding the mentally ill responsible for their actions. Polmatier v. Russ, 206 Conn. 229, 537 A.2d 468 (1988) (defendant liable for battery of plaintiff's decedent even though he was found not guilty by reason of insanity in criminal case arising out of same incident); Delahanty v. Hinckley, 799 F.Supp. 184 (D.D.C. 1992) (rejecting defendant's argument that he should not be liable to plaintiff police officer who was injured when defendant shot at President Reagan because he was in a "deluded and psychotic state of mind" and found not guilty by reason of insanity in criminal case).

3. Despite criticism, the American decisions are unanimous in their agreement with the principal case. Mentally disabled persons may be held responsible for their intentional torts as long as plaintiff can prove that they formed the requisite intent. Restatement (Second) § 895J (1979). See also White v. Muniz, 999 P.2d 814 (Colo. 2000) (in battery claim against defendant with Alzheimer's, plaintiff must prove defendant desired to cause contact that was offensive or harmful).

4. Mental illness may prevent the specific kind of intent necessary for certain torts, such as deceit, that require the plaintiff to prove that the defendant knew that he was not speaking the truth. See Irvine v. Gibson, 117 Ky. 306, 77 S.W. 1106 (1904); Chaddock v. Chaddock, 130 Misc. 900, 226 N.Y.S. 152 (1927); Beaubeauf v. Reed, 4 La.App. 344 (1926).

5. An action also may lie against persons responsible for caring for the mentally ill person, based on negligent supervision, but only if a caretaking responsibility has been assumed. Familial relationship only is not enough. Rausch v. McVeigh, 105 Misc.2d 163, 431 N.Y.S.2d 887 (1980) (cause of action for negligent supervision against parents of 22–year–old autistic son who attacked his therapist); Shirdon v. Houston, 2006 WL 2522394 (Ohio App.) (no duty to supervise adult son even though father knew his son could be aggressive and combative); and Kaminski v. Town of Fairfield, 216 Conn. 29, 578 A.2d 1048 (1990) (accord).

6. Several jurisdictions have carved out a narrow exception to this general rule, holding that an institutionalized mentally disabled patient who cannot control or appreciate the consequences of his conduct cannot be held liable for injuries caused to those employed to care for the patient. The jurisdictions that have addressed this issue have done so both in the context of intentional torts and negligence. Gould v. American Family Mutual Ins. Co., 198 Wis.2d 450, 543 N.W.2d 282 (1996) (negligence action brought against patient with Alzheimer's); Creasy v. Rusk, 730 N.E.2d 659 (Ind. 2000) (same); Anicet v. Gant, 580 So.2d 273 (Fla.App. 1991) (assault and battery against twenty-three-year-old man suffering from "irremediable mental difficulties" who was unable to control himself from acts of violence).

7. Intoxication. What if the defendant is intoxicated? Does intoxication preclude a showing of intent? Bar patron passed out or fell asleep at bar and other patrons agreed to drive him home. Bar employee helped him from bar and was putting him into the back seat of a car when he began shouting obscenities and kicked the employee in the face, seriously injuring him. Sufficient intent for battery? Janelsins v. Button, 102 Md.App. 30, 648 A.2d 1039 (1994) (voluntary intoxication does not vitiate intent).

Talmage v. Smith

Supreme Court of Michigan, 1894.
101 Mich. 370, 59 N.W. 656.

MONTGOMERY, J. The plaintiff recovered in an action of trespass. The case made by plaintiff's proofs was substantially as follows: * * * Defendant had on his premises certain sheds. He came up to the vicinity of the sheds, and saw six or eight boys on the roof of one of them. He claims that he ordered the boys to get down, and they at once did so. He then passed around to where he had a view of the roof of another shed, and saw two boys on the roof. The defendant claims that he did not see the plaintiff, and the proof is not very clear that he did, although there was some testimony from which it might have been found that he was within his view. Defendant ordered the boys in sight to get down, and there was testimony tending to show that the two boys in defendant's view started to get down at once. Before they succeeded in doing so, however, defendant took a stick, which is described as being two inches in width, and of about the same thickness, and about 16 inches long, and threw it in the direction of the boys; and there was testimony tending to show that it was thrown at one of the boys in view of the defendant. The stick missed him, and hit the plaintiff just above the eye with such force as to inflict an injury which resulted in the total loss of the sight of the eye. * * * George Talmage, the plaintiff's father, testifies that defendant said to him that he threw the stick, intending it for Byron Smith,—one of the boys on the roof,—and this is fully supported by the circumstances of the case. * * *

The circuit judge charged the jury as follows: ''If you conclude that Smith did not know the Talmage boy was on the shed, and that he did not intend to hit Smith, or the young man that was with him, but simply, by throwing the stick, intended to frighten Smith, or the other young man that was there, and the club hit Talmage, and injured him, as claimed, then the plaintiff could not recover. If you conclude that Smith threw the stick or club at Smith, or the young man that was with Smith,—intended to hit one or the other of them,—and you also conclude that the throwing of the stick or club was, under the circumstances, reasonable, and not excessive, force to use towards Smith and the other young man, then there would be no recovery by this plaintiff. But if you conclude from the evidence in this case that he threw the stick, intending to hit Smith, or the young man with him,—to hit one of them,—and that that force was unreasonable force, under all the circumstances, then [the defendant] would be doing an unlawful act, if the force was unreasonable, because he had no right to use it. He would be liable then for the injury done to this boy with the stick. * * * ''[The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff.]

We think the charge is a very fair statement of the law of the case. * * * The right of the plaintiff to recover was made to depend upon an intention on the part of the defendant to hit somebody, and to inflict an unwarranted injury upon some one. Under these circumstances, the fact that the injury resulted to another than was intended does not relieve the defendant from responsibility. * * *

The judgment will be affirmed, with costs.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. This doctrine of ''transferred intent'' was derived originally from the criminal law and dates back to the time when tort damages were awarded as a side issue in criminal prosecutions. It is familiar enough in the criminal law, and has been applied in many tort cases where the defendant has shot at A, struck at him, or thrown a punch or rock at him, and unintentionally hit B instead. See, for example, Lopez v. Surchia, 112 Cal.App.2d 314, 246 P.2d 111 (1952) (shooting); Carnes v. Thompson, 48 S.W.2d 903 (Mo.1932) (striking with pliers); Baska v. Scherzer, 283 Kan. 750, 156 P.3d 617 (2007) (while throwing punches at each other, teenagers hit a woman who stepped between them to stop the fight); Singer v. Marx, 144 Cal.App.2d 637, 301 P.2d 440 (1956) (throwing a rock).

2. The doctrine is discussed in Prosser, Transferred Intent, 45 Tex.L.Rev. 650 (1967). The conclusion there is that it applies whenever both the tort intended and the resulting harm fall within the scope of the old action of trespass—that is, where both involve direct and immediate application of force to the person or to tangible property. There are five torts that fell within the trespass writ: battery, assault, false imprisonment, trespass to land, and trespass to chattels. When the defendant intends any one of the five, and accomplishes any one of the five, the doctrine applies and the defendant is liable, even if the plaintiff was not the intended target.

3. Thus he is liable when he shoots to frighten A (assault) and the bullet unforeseeably hits a stranger (battery). Brown v. Martinez, 68 N.M. 271, 361 P.2d 152 (1961); Hall v. McBryde, 919 P.2d 910 (Colo.App.1996) (firing at passing car and hitting neighbor). Or when he shoots at a dog (trespass to chattels) and hits a boy scout (battery). Corn v. Sheppard, 179 Minn. 490, 229 N.W. 869 (1930). What if defendant, believing a house to be empty, intends arson (trespass to chattels) and accomplishes battery (sleeping man killed by smoke inhalation)? Cf. Lewis v. Allstate Ins. Co., 730 So.2d 65 (Miss. 1998).

4. On the other hand, when either the tort intended or the one accomplished does not fall within the trespass action, the doctrine does not apply. Clark v. Gay, 112 Ga. 777, 38 S.E. 81 (1901) (defendant committed murder in plaintiff's house and plaintiff sought value of house because his family refused to live there after the murder); McGee v. Vanover, 148 Ky. 737, 147 S.W. 742 (1912) (defendant inflicted beating on A, causing mental distress to plaintiff bystander).

2. BATTERY

Cole v. Turner

Nisi Prius, 1704.
6 Modern Rep. 149, 90 Eng.Rep. 958.

At Nisi Prius, upon evidence in trespass for assault and battery, Holt, C.J., declared:

1. That the least touching of another in anger is a battery.

2. If two or more meet in a narrow passage, and without any violence or design of harm, the one touches the other gently it will be no battery.

3. If any of them use violence against the other, to force his way in a rude inordinate manner, it is a battery; or any struggle about the passage, to that degree as may do hurt, is a battery.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In United States v. Ortega, 4 Wash.C.C. 531, 27 Fed.Cas. 359 (E.D.Pa. 1825), defendant approached the plaintiff in an offensive manner, took hold of the breast of his coat, and said that he demanded satisfaction. Is this a battery?

2. What about spitting in the plaintiff's face? Alcorn v. Mitchell, 63 Ill. 553 (1872). Or forcibly removing his hat? Seigel v. Long, 169 Ala. 79, 53 So. 753 (1910). Or an attempted search of his pockets? Piggly–Wiggly Alabama Co. v. Rickles, 212 Ala. 585, 103 So. 860 (1925). Or touching her private parts? Skousen v. Nidy, 90

Ariz. 215, 367 P.2d 248 (1961). Cf. Gates v. State, 110 Ga.App. 303, 138 S.E.2d 473 (1964) (stranger touching woman on the buttocks).

3. What about tapping plaintiff on the shoulder to attract his attention? "Pardon me, sir, could you direct me, etc."? Coward v. Baddeley, 4 H. & N. 478, 157 Eng.Rep. 927 (1859).

Wallace v. Rosen

Court of Appeals of Indiana, 2002.
765 N.E.2d 192.

KIRSCH, J. Mable Wallace appeals the jury verdict in favor of Indianapolis Public Schools (IPS) and Harriet Rosen, a teacher for IPS. On appeal, Wallace raises the following issues:

I. Whether the trial court erred in refusing to give her tendered jury instruction regarding battery. * * *

We affirm.

FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

[Rosen was a teacher at Northwest High School in Indianapolis. On April 22, 1994, the high school had a fire drill while classes were in session. The drill was not previously announced to the teachers and occurred just one week after a fire was extinguished in a bathroom near Rosen's classroom. On the day the alarm sounded, Wallace, who was recovering from foot surgery, was at the high school delivering homework to her daughter Lalaya. Wallace saw Lalaya just as Wallace neared the top of a staircase and stopped to speak to her. Two of Lalaya's friends also stopped to talk. Just then, the alarm sounded and students began filing down the stairs while Wallace took a step or two up the stairs to the second floor landing. As Rosen escorted her class to the designated stairway she noticed three or four people talking together at the top of the stairway and blocking the students' exit. Rosen did not recognize any of the individuals but approached "telling everybody to move it." Wallace, with her back to Rosen, was unable to hear Rosen over the noise of the alarm and Rosen had to touch her on the back to get her attention. Rosen then told Wallace, "you've got to get moving because this is a fire drill." At trial, Wallace testified that Rosen pushed her and she slipped and fell down the stairs. Rosen denied pushing Wallace, but admitted touching her back. At the close of the trial, the trial court judge refused to give the jury an instruction concerning civil battery that was requested by plaintiff. The jury found in favor of IPS and Rosen on the negligence count, and Wallace appealed.]

DISCUSSION AND DECISION

* * *

I. Battery Instruction

Wallace first argues that it was error for the trial court to refuse to give the jury the following tendered instruction pertaining to battery:

> A battery is the knowing or intentional touching of one person by another in a rude, insolent, or angry manner.
>
> Any touching, however slight, may constitute an assault and battery.
>
> Also, a battery may be recklessly committed where one acts in reckless disregard of the consequences, and the fact the person does not intend that the act shall result in an injury is immaterial. * * *

The Indiana Pattern Jury Instruction for the intentional tort of civil battery is as follows: ''A battery is the knowing or intentional touching of a person against [his] [her] will in a rude, insolent, or angry manner.'' 2 Indiana Pattern Jury Instructions (Civil) 31.03 (2d ed. Revised 2001).[2] Battery is an intentional tort.[C] In discussing intent, Professors Prosser and Keeton made the following comments:

In a loose and general sense, the meaning of ''intent'' is easy to grasp. As Holmes observed, even a dog knows the difference between being tripped over and being kicked. This is also the key distinction between two major divisions of legal liability—negligence and intentional torts. . . .

It is correct to tell the jury that, relying on circumstantial evidence, they may infer that the actor's state of mind was the same as a reasonable person's state of mind would have been. Thus, . . . the defendant on a bicycle who rides down a person in full view on a sidewalk where there is ample room to pass may learn that the factfinder (judge or jury) is unwilling to credit the statement, ''I didn't mean to do it.''

On the other hand, the mere knowledge and appreciation of a risk—something short of substantial certainty—is not intent. The defendant who acts in the belief or consciousness that the act is causing an appreciable risk of harm to another may be negligent, and if the risk is great the conduct may be characterized as reckless or wanton, but it is not an intentional wrong. In such cases the distinction between intent and negligence obviously is a matter of degree. The line has to be drawn by the courts at the point where the known danger ceases to be only a foreseeable risk which a reasonable person would avoid, and becomes in the mind of the actor a substantial certainty.

The intent with which tort liability is concerned is not necessarily a hostile intent, or a desire to do any harm. Rather it is an intent to bring about a result which will invade the interests of another in a way that the law forbids. The defendant may be liable although intending nothing more than a good-natured practical joke, or honestly believing that the act would not injure the plaintiff, or even though seeking the plaintiff's own good. W. PAGE KEETON et al., PROSSER AND KEETON ON THE LAW OF TORTS, § 8, at 33, 36–37 (5th ed.1984) (footnotes omitted).

---

2. The Indiana Pattern Jury Instructions are prepared under the auspices of the Indiana Judges Association and the Indiana Judicial Conference Criminal and Civil Instruction Committees. Although not formally approved for use, they are tacitly recognized by Indiana Trial Rule 51(E). [C]

[Witnesses] testified that Rosen touched Wallace on the back causing her to fall down the stairs and injure herself. For battery to be an appropriate instruction, the evidence had to support an inference not only that Rosen intentionally touched Wallace, but that she did so in a rude, insolent, or angry manner, i.e., that she intended to invade Wallace's interests in a way that the law forbids.

Professors Prosser and Keeton also made the following observations about the intentional tort of battery and the character of the defendant's action: ''In a crowded world, a certain amount of personal contact is inevitable and must be accepted. Absent expression to the contrary, consent is assumed to all those ordinary contacts which are customary and reasonably necessary to the common intercourse of life, such as a tap on the shoulder to attract attention, a friendly grasp of the arm, or a casual jostling to make a passage. . . .''

The time and place, and the circumstances under which the act is done, will necessarily affect its unpermitted character, and so will the relations between the parties. A stranger is not to be expected to tolerate liberties which would be allowed by an intimate friend. But unless the defendant has special reason to believe that more or less will be permitted by the individual plaintiff, the test is what would be offensive to an ordinary person not unduly sensitive as to personal dignity. KEETON et al., § 9, at 42 (emphasis added). * * *

[The court quoted from the trial transcript concerning the nature of the touching.]

Viewed most favorably to the trial court's decision refusing the tendered instruction, the foregoing evidence indicates that Rosen placed her fingertips on Wallace's shoulder and turned her 90 degrees toward the exit in the midst of a fire drill. The conditions on the stairway of Northwest High School during the fire drill were an example of Professors Prosser and Keeton's ''crowded world.'' Individuals standing in the middle of a stairway during the fire drill could expect that a certain amount of personal contact would be inevitable. Rosen had a responsibility to her students to keep them moving in an orderly fashion down the stairs and out the door. Under these circumstances, Rosen's touching of Wallace's shoulder or back with her fingertips to get her attention over the noise of the alarm cannot be said to be a rude, insolent, or angry touching. Wallace has failed to show that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing the battery instruction. * * *

[Other issues raised by the appeal were then discussed.]

Affirmed. [The concurring opinions are omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Has the law of battery undergone any substantial changes since Cole v. Turner in 1704?

2. Do you agree that there was not enough evidence to let the jury decide whether the touching was offensive? The concurring opinion notes that there was testimony that the teacher had grabbed plaintiff's arm or shoulder to turn her around and that when plaintiff told her she was a parent, the teacher responded, ''I don't care who you are, move it.''

3. Note that the court refers to Indiana's pattern jury instruction on battery. Many jurisdictions have pattern or sample instructions that are available to the parties to use in requesting the instructions for their particular cases.

4. In the principal case, in a section omitted from this excerpt, the court noted that the third paragraph of the proposed instruction—that battery may be recklessly committed—was not an accurate statement of Indiana law and could have misled or confused the jury under the facts of the case. The court's discussion of the intent requirement makes it clear that it is an essential element. With the modern shift of emphasis to intent and negligence, as distinguished from trespass and case, ''battery'' has become exclusively an intentional tort. Thus there is no battery when defendant negligently, or even recklessly, drives his car into plaintiff and injures him, without intending to hit him. Cook v. Kinzua Pine Mills Co., 207 Or. 34, 293 P.2d 717 (1956). The same shift of emphasis accounts for the modern cases allowing recovery when the contact inflicted is not direct and immediate, but indirect.

RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS (1965)

''§ 13. Battery: Harmful Contact

''An actor is subject to liability to another for battery if

''(a) he acts intending to cause a harmful or offensive contact with the person of the other or a third person, or an imminent apprehension of such a contact, and

''(b) a harmful contact with the person of the other directly or indirectly results.''

''§ 18. Battery: Offensive Contact

''(1) An actor is subject to liability to another for battery if

''(a) he acts intending to cause a harmful or offensive contact with the person of the other or a third person, or an imminent apprehension of such a contact, and

''(b) an offensive contact with the person of the other directly or indirectly results.

''(2) An act which is not done with the intention stated in Subsection (1, a) does not make the actor liable to the other for a mere offensive contact with the other's person although the act involves an unreasonable risk of inflicting it and, therefore, would be negligent or reckless if the risk threatened bodily harm.''

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. When defendant intentionally causes plaintiff to undergo an offensive contact and the resulting injuries are more extensive than a reasonable person might have anticipated, the defendant will still be liable for those injuries. See Baldinger v. Banks, 26 Misc.2d 1086, 201 N.Y.S.2d 629 (1960) (six-year-old boy shoves four-year-old girl) (broken elbow); Harrigan v. Rosich, 173 So.2d 880 (La.App.1965) (defendant, wishing to get rid of the plaintiff, pushed him with his finger, and said, ''Go home, old man.'') (detached retina).

2. In Vosburg v. Putney, 80 Wis. 523, 50 N.W. 403 (1891), one schoolboy, during a class hour, playfully kicked another on the shin. He intended no harm, and the touch was so slight that the plaintiff did not actually feel it. It had, however, the effect of ''lighting up'' an infection in the leg from a previous injury, and as a result the plaintiff suffered damages found by the jury to be $2,500. The court found liability for battery even though the injury could not have been foreseen. The case is entertainingly and exhaustively discussed in Zile, Vosburg v. Putney: A Centennial Story, [1992] Wis.L.Rev. 877 (1992).

3. Does it make any difference if the defendant is trying to help the plaintiff? In Clayton v. New Dreamland Roller Skating Rink, Inc., 14 N.J.Super. 390, 82 A.2d 458 (1951), cert. denied, 13 N.J. 527, 100 A.2d 567 (1953), plaintiff fell at a skating rink and broke her arm. Over the protests of plaintiff and her husband, defendant's employees, one of whom was a prize fight manager who had first aid experience, proceeded to manipulate the arm in an attempt to set it. Is this battery?

4. While her husband was helping her get dressed in her hospital room the day after her back surgery, patient found a washable tattoo of a rose on her lower abdomen. Surgeon says he had placed it there to improve her spirits and help her heal and that none of his other patients had complained. Patient is very upset. Does she have a cause of action for battery? If so, what would her damages be? See Don Sapatkin, ''Surgeon Sued for Giving Anesthetized Patient Temporary Tattoo,'' The Philadelphia Inquirer, July 16, 2008, at B1, available at 2008 WLNR 13274435.

5. Can the plaintiff make the defendant liable for contact that would not be offensive to a reasonable person, such as a tap on the shoulder to attract attention, by specifically forbidding that conduct? The Restatement (Second) of Torts § 19, leaves the question open. See Richmond v. Fiske, 160 Mass. 34, 35 N.E. 103 (1893), where defendant, against orders, entered plaintiff's bedroom and woke him up to present a milk bill. This was held to be battery, but no doubt it would be offensive to a reasonable person.

6. Can there be liability for battery for a contact of which plaintiff is unaware at the time? Did Sleeping Beauty have a cause of action against Prince Charming? What if an unauthorized surgical operation is performed while plaintiff is under an anaesthetic? Does it make any difference whether the operation is harmful or beneficial? See Mohr v. Williams, page 95.

7. Does the exposure to a virus, such as herpes, through sexual activity constitute a battery? Does consent to the sexual activity operate as a defense? See Doe v. Johnson, 817 F.Supp. 1382 (W.D.Mich.1993) (battery action alleged in transmission of HIV; consent to intercourse does not bar action). Liability in Tort for the Sexual Transmission of Disease: Genital Herpes and the Law, 70 Cornell L.Rev. 101 (1984).

8. Does a mortician who embalms a body unaware that it was infected with the AIDS virus have a cause of action for battery? Cf., Funeral Services by Gregory v. Bluefield Community Hospital, 186 W.Va. 424, 413 S.E.2d 79 (1991). What about the patients of a dentist who does not disclose he has AIDS? What if the dentist always wore gloves during treatment procedures? Would the reasonable person find such touching offensive? See Brzoska v. Olson, 668 A.2d 1355 (Dela. 1995).

Fisher v. Carrousel Motor Hotel, Inc.

Supreme Court of Texas, 1967.
424 S.W.2d 627.

[Action for assault and battery. Plaintiff, a mathematician employed by NASA, was attending a professional conference on telemetry equipment at defendant's hotel. The meeting included a buffet luncheon. As plaintiff was standing in line with others, he was approached by one of defendant's employees, who snatched the plate from his hand, and shouted that a "Negro could not be served in the club." Plaintiff was not actually touched, and was in no apprehension of physical injury; but he was highly embarrassed and hurt by the conduct in the presence of his associates. The jury returned a verdict for $400 actual damages for his humiliation and indignity, and $500 exemplary (punitive) damages in addition. The trial court set aside the verdict and gave judgment for the defendants notwithstanding the verdict. This was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals. Plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court.]

GREENHILL, JUSTICE * * * Under the facts of this case, we have no difficulty in holding that the intentional grabbing of plaintiff's plate constituted a battery. The intentional snatching of an object from one's hand is as clearly an offensive invasion of his person as would be an actual contact with the body. "To constitute an assault and battery, it is not necessary to touch the plaintiff's body or even his clothing; knocking or snatching anything from plaintiff's hand or touching anything connected with his person, when done in an offensive manner, is sufficient." Morgan v. Loyacomo, 190 Miss. 656, 1 So.2d 510 (1941).

Such holding is not unique to the jurisprudence of this State. In S.H. Kress & Co. v. Brashier, 50 S.W.2d 922 (Tex.Civ.App.1932, no writ), the defendant was held to have committed "an assault or trespass upon the person" by snatching a book from the plaintiff's hand. The jury findings in that case were that the defendant "dispossessed plaintiff of the book" and caused her to suffer "humiliation and indignity."

The rationale for holding an offensive contact with such an object to be a battery is explained in 1 Restatement (Second) of Torts § 18 (Comment p. 31) as follows:

> "Since the essence of the plaintiff's grievance consists in the offense to the dignity involved in the unpermitted and intentional invasion of the inviolability of his person and not in any physical harm done to his body, it is not necessary that the plaintiff's actual body be disturbed. Unpermitted and intentional contacts with anything so connected with the body as to be customarily regarded as part of the other's person and therefore as partaking of its inviolability is actionable as an offensive contact with his person. There are some things such as clothing or a cane or, indeed, anything directly grasped by the hand which are so intimately connected with one's body as to be universally regarded as part of the person."

We hold, therefore, that the forceful dispossession of plaintiff Fisher's plate in an offensive manner was sufficient to constitute a battery, and the trial court erred in granting judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the issue of actual damages. * * *

Damages for mental suffering are recoverable without the necessity for showing actual physical injury in a case of willful battery because the basis of that action is the unpermitted and intentional invasion of the plaintiff's person and not the actual harm done to the plaintiff's body. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 18. Personal indignity is the essence of an action for battery; and consequently the defendant is liable not only for contacts which do actual physical harm, but also for those which are offensive and insulting. [Cc]. We hold, therefore, that plaintiff was entitled to actual damages for mental suffering due to the willful battery, even in the absence of any physical injury. [The court then held that the defendant corporation was liable for the tort of its employee.]

The judgments of the courts below are reversed, and judgment is here rendered for the plaintiff for $900 with interest from the date of the trial court's judgment, and for costs of this suit.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What if the plate had been snatched without a racial epithet? Or, suppose the waiter had not touched plaintiff's plate, but said in a loud voice, "Get out, we don't serve Negroes here!"? What if the doorman at the hotel shouted a racial epithet and kicked plaintiff's car when he was about to leave. Battery? Cf. Van Eaton v. Thon, 764 S.W.2d 674 (Mo.App.1988) (defendant struck horse plaintiff was riding).

2. Does the utilization of the tort of battery confuse things? Why not characterize what happened as "intentional infliction of emotional harm"? Might the case be regarded as one of imaginative lawyering, assuming the state was not ready to recognize intentional infliction of emotional harm as a tort? What other remedies might have been available to plaintiff? Compare this with the State Rubbish Collectors case, page 51.

3. Defendant, unreasonably suspecting the plaintiff of shoplifting, forcibly seized a package from under her arm and opened it. Morgan v. Loyacomo, 190 Miss. 656, 1 So.2d 510 (1941). Defendant deliberately blew pipe smoke in plaintiff's face, knowing she was allergic to it. Richardson v. Hennly, 209 Ga.App. 868, 434 S.E.2d 772 (1993), rev'd on other grounds, 264 Ga. 355, 444 S.E.2d 317 (1994).

4. A is standing with his arm around B's shoulder and leaning on him. C, passing by, violently jerks B's arm, as a result of which A falls down. To whom is C liable for battery? Reynolds v. Pierson, 29 Ind.App. 273, 64 N.E. 484 (1902).

3. ASSAULT

I de S et ux. v. W de S

At the Assizes, 1348.
Y.B.Lib.Ass. folio 99, placitum 60.

I de S and M, his wife, complain of W de S concerning this, that the said W, in the year, etc., with force and arms did make an assault upon the said M de S and beat her. And W pleaded not guilty. And it was found by the verdict of the inquest that the said W came at night to the house of the said I and sought to buy of his wine, but the door of the tavern was shut and he beat upon the door with a hatchet which he had in his hand, and the wife of the plaintiff put her head out of the window and commanded him to stop, and he saw and he struck with the hatchet but did not hit the woman. Whereupon the inquest said that it seemed to them that there was no trespass since no harm was done.

THORPE, C.J. There is harm done and a trespass for which he shall recover damages since he made an assault upon the woman, as has been found, although he did no other harm. Wherefore tax the damages, etc. And they taxed the damages at half a mark. Thorpe awarded that they should recover their damages, etc., and that the other should be taken. And so note that for an assault a man shall recover damages, etc.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. This is the great-grandparent of all assault cases. Why allow the action if "no harm was done"?

Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Hill

Court of Appeals of Alabama, 1933.
25 Ala.App. 540, 150 So. 709.

Action for damages for assault by J.B. Hill against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

SAMFORD, JUDGE. The action in this case is based upon an alleged assault on the person of plaintiff's wife by one Sapp, an agent of defendant in charge of its office in Huntsville, Ala. The assault complained of consisted of an attempt on the part of Sapp to put his hand on the person of plaintiff's wife coupled with a request that she come behind the counter in defendant's office, and that, if she would come and allow Sapp to love and pet her, he "would fix her clock."

The first question that addresses itself to us is, Was there such an assault as will justify an action for damages? * * *

While every battery includes an assault, an assault does not necessarily require a battery to complete it. What it does take to constitute an assault is an unlawful attempt to commit a battery, incomplete by reason of some intervening cause; or, to state it differently, to constitute an actionable assault there must be an intentional, unlawful, offer to touch the person of another in a rude or angry manner under such circumstances as to create in the mind of the party alleging the assault a well-founded fear of an imminent battery, coupled with the apparent present ability to effectuate the attempt, if not prevented. * * *

What are the facts here? Sapp was the agent of defendant and the manager of its telegraph office in Huntsville. Defendant was under contract with plaintiff to keep in repair and regulated an electric clock in plaintiff's place of business. When the clock needed attention, that fact was to be reported to Sapp, and he in turn would report to a special man, whose duty it was to do the fixing. At 8:13 o'clock p.m. plaintiff's wife reported to Sapp over the phone that the clock needed attention, and, no one coming to attend the clock, plaintiff's wife went to the office of defendant about 8:30 p.m. There she found Sapp in charge and behind a desk or counter, separating the public from the part of the room in which defendant's operator worked. The counter is four feet and two inches high, and so wide that, Sapp standing on the floor, leaning against the counter and stretching his arm and hand to the full length, the end of his fingers reaches just to the outer edge of the counter. The photographs in evidence show that the counter was as high as Sapp's armpits. Sapp had had two or three drinks and was ''still slightly feeling the effects of whisky; I felt all right; I felt good and amiable.'' When plaintiff's wife came into the office, Sapp came from towards the rear of the room and asked what he could do for her. She replied: ''I asked him if he understood over the phone that my clock was out of order and when he was going to fix it. He stood there and looked at me a few minutes and said: 'If you will come back here and let me love and pet you, I will fix your clock.' This he repeated and reached for me with his hand, he extended his hand toward me, he did not put it on me; I jumped back. I was in his reach as I stood there. He reached for me right along here (indicating her left shoulder and arm).'' The foregoing is the evidence offered by plaintiff tending to prove assault. Per contra, aside from the positive denial by Sapp of any effort to touch Mrs. Hill, the physical surroundings as evidenced by the photographs of the locus tend to rebut any evidence going to prove that Sapp could have touched plaintiff's wife across that counter even if he had reached his hand in her direction unless she was leaning against the counter or Sapp should have stood upon something so as to elevate him and allow him to reach beyond the counter. However, there is testimony tending to prove that, notwithstanding the width of the counter and the height of Sapp, Sapp could have reached from six to eighteen inches beyond the desk in an effort to place his hand on Mrs. Hill. The evidence as a whole presents a question for the jury. This was the view taken by the trial judge, and in the several rulings bearing on this question there is no error. * * *

[Reversed on the ground that Sapp had not acted within the scope of his employment.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Defendant, standing three or four feet from plaintiff, made a ''kissing sign'' at her by puckering his lips and smacking them. He did not touch her and made no effort to kiss her or to use any force. Is this an assault? Fuller v. State, 44 Tex.Crim. 463, 72 S.W. 184 (1903). Defendant Ku Klux Klan members dressed in KKK robes and carrying guns rode around in a shrimp boat on Galveston Bay from dock to dock frightening Vietnamese fishermen and their families. What would the family members have to prove to recover for assault? See, Vietnamese Fishermen's Ass'n v. Knights of the K.K.K., 518 F.Supp. 993 (S.D.Tex.1981) (applying Texas law).

2. Defendant, a hundred yards from plaintiff, starts running toward him, throwing rocks as he runs. At what point does this become an assault? Cf. State v. Davis, 23 N.C. (1 Ired.) 125, 35 Am.Dec. 735 (1840); Grimes v. State, 99 Miss. 232, 54 So. 839 (1911).

3. What about mere preparation, such as bringing a gun along for an interview? Penny v. State, 114 Ga. 77, 39 S.E. 871 (1901).

4. Although the court uses the term "fear" of an imminent battery, assault requires only apprehension or anticipation. Suppose Hill had a black belt in karate and was contemptuous of Sapp? Assault? Cf. Brady v. Schatzel, [1911] Q.St.R. 206, 208 (police officer testified he was not afraid when defendant pulled a gun on him because he did not believe he would fire it). Why might a lawyer plead and try to prove fear if it is not a necessary element of the tort?

5. Is there an assault if defendant threatens the plaintiff with an unloaded gun? See Allen v. Hannaford, 138 Wash. 423, 244 P. 700 (1926). Suppose the gun remains lying in defendant's lap? See Castiglione v. Galpin, 325 So.2d 725 (La.App. 1976).

6. In State v. Barry, 45 Mont. 598, 124 P. 775 (1912), it was held that there was no assault where the plaintiff did not learn that a gun was aimed at him with intent to shoot him until it was all over. The Restatement (Second) of Torts § 22, has agreed.

7. A major distinction between a criminal assault and an assault in tort is that for criminal assault, a victim need not have an apprehension of contact. A criminal assault occurs if the defendant intends to injure the victim and has the ability to do so. Commonwealth v. Slaney, 345 Mass. 135, 185 N.E.2d 919 (1962). For the tort of assault, the victim must have an apprehension of contact, and it is not necessary that the defendant have the actual ability to carry out the threatened contact. Depending upon the jurisdiction, a defendant could be subject to either criminal prosecution or civil damages, or both.

8. What if the threat is not imminent? Brower v. Ackerley, 88 Wash.App. 87, 943 P.2d 1141, 1145 (1997) (threats of future action—"I'm going to find out where you live and kick your ass" and "you're finished; cut you in your sleep"—not imminent enough to state cause of action for assault.) Does a complaint state a cause of action for assault if one paragraph of the complaint asserts that the defendants threatened to strike the plaintiffs with blackjacks and that the threats placed the plaintiffs in fear that a battery will be committed against them and a subsequent paragraph asserts that the defendants showed the plaintiffs that the defendants were carrying blackjacks? Cucinotti v. Ortmann, 399 Pa. 26, 159 A.2d 216 (1960) ("words in themselves, no matter how threatening, do not constitute an assault").

9. What if these words are accompanied by a threatening gesture? Assault?

A. With his hand upon his sword, "If it were not assize-time, I would not take such language from you." Tuberville v. Savage, 1 Modern Rep. 3 (1699).

B. "Were you not an old man, I would knock you down." State v. Crow, 23 N.C. (1 Ired.) 375 (1841).

C. "If it were not for your gray hairs, I would tear your heart out." Commonwealth v. Eyre, 1 Serg. & Rawle 347 (Pa.1815).

D. "I have a great mind to hit you." State v. Hampton, 63 N.C. 13 (1868).

E. "If you do not pay me my money, I will have your life"? Keefe v. State, 19 Ark. 190 (1857).

10. Can words make an assault out of conduct that would otherwise not be sufficient for the tort? Suppose that while defendant and plaintiff are engaged in a violent quarrel, defendant reaches for his hip pocket. Does it make any difference whether he says, "I'll blow your brains out," or "Pardon me, I need a handkerchief"?

11. What about words that threaten harm from an independent source? "Look out! There is a rattlesnake behind you!"

4. FALSE IMPRISONMENT

Big Town Nursing Home, Inc. v. Newman

Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, 1970.
461 S.W.2d 195.

MCDONALD, CHIEF JUSTICE. This is an appeal by defendant Nursing Home from a judgment for plaintiff Newman for actual and exemplary damages in a false imprisonment case.

Plaintiff Newman sued defendant Nursing Home for actual and exemplary damages for falsely and wrongfully imprisoning him against his will from September 22, 1968 to November 11, 1968. * * *

Plaintiff is a retired printer 67 years of age, and lives on his social security and a retirement pension from his brother's printing company. He has not worked since 1959, is single, has Parkinson's disease, arthritis, heart trouble, a voice impediment, and a hiatal hernia. He has served in the army attaining the rank of Sergeant. He has never been in a mental hospital or treated by a psychiatrist. Plaintiff was taken to defendant nursing home on September 19, 1968, by his nephew who signed the admission papers and paid one month's care in advance. Plaintiff had been arrested for drunkenness and drunken driving in times past (the last time in 1966) and had been treated twice for alcoholism. Plaintiff testified he was not intoxicated and had nothing to drink during the week prior to admission to the nursing home. The admission papers provided that patient "will not be forced to remain in the nursing home against his will for any length of time." Plaintiff was not advised he would be kept at the nursing home against his will. On September 22, 1968, plaintiff decided he wanted to leave and tried to telephone for a taxi. Defendant's employees advised plaintiff he could not use the phone, or have any visitors unless the manager knew them, and locked plaintiff's grip and clothes up. Plaintiff walked out of the home, but was caught by employees of defendant and brought back forceably, and thereafter, placed in Wing 3 and locked up. Defendant's Administrator testified Wing 3 contained senile patients, drug addicts, alcoholics, mentally disturbed, incorrigibles and uncontrollables, and that "they were all in the same kettle of fish." Plaintiff tried to escape from the nursing home five or six times but was caught and brought back each time against his will. He was carried back to Wing 3 and locked and taped in a "restraint chair", for more than five hours. He was put back in the chair on subsequent occasions. He was not seen by the home doctor for some 10 days after he was admitted, and for 7 days after being placed in Wing 3. The doctor wrote the social security office to change payment of plaintiff's social security checks without plaintiff's authorization. Plaintiff made every effort to leave and repeatedly asked the manager and assistant manager to be permitted to leave. The home doctor is actually a resident studying pathology and has no patients other than those in two nursing homes. Finally, on November 11, 1968, plaintiff escaped and caught a ride into Dallas, where he called a taxi and was taken to the home of a friend. During plaintiff's ordeal he lost 30 pounds. There was never any court proceeding to confine plaintiff. * * *

False imprisonment is the direct restraint of one person of the physical liberty of another without adequate legal justification. There is ample evidence to sustain [the jury's finding that plaintiff was falsely imprisoned]. * * *

Defendant placed plaintiff in Wing 3 with insane persons, alcoholics and drug addicts knowing he was not in such category; punished plaintiff by locking and taping him in the restraint chair; prevented him from using the telephone for 51 days; locked up his clothes; told him he could not be released from Wing 3 until he began to obey the rules of the home; and detained him for 51 days during which period he was demanding to be released and attempting to escape. * * *

Defendant may be compelled to respond in exemplary damages if the act causing actual damages is a wrongful act done intentionally in violation of the rights of plaintiff. [Cc]

Defendant acted in the utter disregard of plaintiff's legal rights, knowing there was no court order for commitment, and that the admission agreement provided he was not to be kept against his will. * * *

[The court of appeals found that the amount of damages was excessive and offered plaintiff a remittitur. Plaintiff subsequently agreed to the remittitur and the judgment below, so reformed, was affirmed.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Plaintiff has a ticket to enter defendant's race track, but defendant refuses to admit him because the stewards have banned him from the track. False imprisonment? Marrone v. Washington Jockey Club, 35 App.D.C. 82 (1910) (mere refusal to admit not false imprisonment). Plaintiff attempts to enter a dance hall during a public dance, but is prevented by defendant who is under the mistaken belief that she is under eighteen. False imprisonment? Cullen v. Dickenson, 33 S.D. 27, 144 N.W. 656 (1913) (no). Suppose the exclusion is based on race or religion? There may be a civil rights action, but not false imprisonment. See 42 U.S.C. § 2000a, page 74, note 3.

2. Can there be false imprisonment in a moving automobile? Cieplinski v. Severn, 269 Mass. 261, 168 N.E. 722 (1929) (yes). In a city? Allen v. Fromme, 141 App.Div. 362, 126 N.Y.S. 520 (1910) (yes). In the state of Rhode Island? Texas? Cf. Albright v. Oliver, 975 F.2d 343 (7th Cir.1992) (in dicta, court notes that actionable confinement could be "as large as an entire state"). When plaintiff is not permitted to leave the country? Cf. Shen v. Leo A. Daly Co., 222 F.3d 472 (8th Cir. 2000) (applying Nebraska law) (although difficult to define exactly how close the restraint must be, the country of Taiwan is clearly too great an area within which to be falsely imprisoned).

3. If one exit of a room or a building is locked with plaintiff inside, but another reasonable means of exit is left open, there is no imprisonment. Davis & Allcott Co. v. Boozer, 215 Ala. 116, 110 So. 28 (1926) (door through which plaintiff had entered was locked but other door was not); Furlong v. German–American Press Ass'n, 189 S.W. 385, 389 (Mo.1916) ("If a way of escape is left open which is available without peril of life or limb, no imprisonment"). See also the classic case of Bird v. Jones, 7 A. & E., N.S., 742, 115 Eng.Rep. 668 (1845) (the portion of Hammersmith Bridge across the Thames River ordinarily used as a footpath was obstructed by seats that defendant had erected for viewing a regatta on the river and defendant's agents refused to let plaintiff pass along the footpath; no false imprisonment because plaintiff could have returned the way he had come or crossed the bridge in the carriage way).

4. What if it's just a joke? Employees of airline that prides itself on being a "fun-loving, spirited company" arranged for local police officers to perform a mock arrest of a new employee, complete with handcuffs and a suggestion that she find someone to post bail, as a prank to celebrate the end of her probation. Fuerschbach v. Southwest Airlines Co., 439 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2006) (applying New Mexico law) (neither brevity of seizure not its characterization as a prank enabled officers to avoid liability).

5. The Restatement (Second) of Torts § 36, comment a, treats the means of escape as unreasonable if it involves exposure of the person (plaintiff in the water and defendant steals his clothes), material harm to the clothing, or danger of substantial harm to another. Plaintiff would not be required to make his escape by crawling through a sewer.

6. A means of escape is not a reasonable one if the plaintiff does not know of its existence, and it is not apparent. Talcott v. National Exhibition Co., 144 App.Div. 337, 128 N.Y.S. 1059 (1911).

7. If the only means of escape could cause physical danger to plaintiff, and he could remain "imprisoned" without any risk of harm, he may not recover for injuries he suffers in making his escape. See Sindle v. New York City Transit Authority, 33 N.Y.2d 293, 307 N.E.2d 245, 352 N.Y.S.2d 183 (1973) (plaintiff jumped from window of moving bus on way to police station).

8. Along with battery and assault, false imprisonment has now become exclusively an intentional tort. The Restatement (Second) of Torts § 35, comment h, points out, however, that for negligence resulting in the confinement of another a negligence action will lie, but only if some actual damage results. Cf. Mouse v. Central Sav. & Trust Co., 120 Ohio St. 599, 7 Ohio L.Abs. 334, 167 N.E. 868 (1929). What would be the result if defendant double-parks his automobile and thus prevents plaintiff from driving to an important business meeting? False imprisonment is also like battery and assault in that no actual damages need be proved. Nominal damages may be awarded. Banks v. Fritsch, 39 S.W.3d 474 (Ky. App. 2001) (teacher who chained student to tree because of repeated absenteeism liable for nominal damages if student could not prove actual damages).

Parvi v. City of Kingston

Court of Appeals of New York, 1977.
41 N.Y.2d 553, 362 N.E.2d 960, 394 N.Y.S.2d 161.

[Police, responding to a complaint, found two brothers engaged in a noisy quarrel in an alley behind a commercial building. Plaintiff was with them, apparently trying to calm them. According to police testimony, all three were showing "the effects of alcohol." Plaintiff told the police he had no place to go, so rather than arrest him, they took him outside the city limits to an abandoned golf course to "dry out." There was conflicting testimony as to whether he went willingly. Within an hour, plaintiff had wandered 350 feet and onto the New York State Thruway, where he was struck by a car and severely injured. On cross-examination, he admitted he had no recollection of what happened that night.

Action for false imprisonment. The trial court dismissed the case and the Appellate Division affirmed.]

FUCHSBERG, JUSTICE. * * * [The element of] consciousness of confinement is a more subtle and more interesting subissue in this case. On that subject, we note that, while respected authorities have divided on whether awareness of confinement by one who has been falsely imprisoned should be a sine qua non for making out a case, [cc] Broughton [v. State of New York], 37 N.Y.2d p. 456, 373 N.Y.S.2d p. 92, 335 N.E.2d p. 313 has laid that question to rest in this State. Its holding gives recognition to the fact that false imprisonment, as a dignitary tort, is not suffered unless its victim knows of the dignitary invasion. Interestingly, the Restatement (Second) of Torts § 42 too has taken the position that there is no liability for intentionally confining another unless the person physically restrained knows of the confinement or is harmed by it.

However, though correctly proceeding on that premise, the Appellate Division, in affirming the dismissal of the cause of action for false imprisonment, erroneously relied on the fact that Parvi, after having provided additional testimony in his own behalf on direct examination, had agreed on cross that he no longer had any recollection of his confinement. In so doing, that court failed to distinguish between a later recollection of consciousness and the existence of that consciousness at the time when the imprisonment itself took place. The latter, of course, is capable of being proved though one who suffers the consciousness can no longer personally describe it, whether by reason of lapse of memory, incompetency, death or other cause. Specifically, in this case, while it may well be that the alcohol Parvi had imbibed or the injuries he sustained, or both, had had the effect of wiping out his recollection of being in the police car against his will, that is a far cry from saying that he was not conscious of his confinement at the time when it was actually taking place. And, even if plaintiff's sentient state at the time of his imprisonment was something less than total sobriety, that does not mean that he had no conscious sense of what was then happening to him. To the contrary, there is much in the record to support a finding that the plaintiff indeed was aware of his arrest at the time it took place. By way of illustration, the officers described Parvi's responsiveness to their command that he get into the car, his colloquy while being driven to Coleman Hill and his request to be let off elsewhere. At the very least, then, it was for the jury, in the first instance, to weigh credibility, evaluate inconsistencies and determine whether the burden of proof had been met. * * *

Reversed.

BREITEL, CHIEF JUDGE (dissenting). * * * [P]laintiff has failed even to make out a prima facie case that he was conscious of his purported confinement, and that he failed to consent to it. His memory of the entire incident had disappeared; at trial, Parvi admitted that he no longer had any independent recollection of what happened on the day of his accident, and that as to the circumstances surrounding his entrance into the police car, he only knew what had been suggested to him by subsequent conversations. In light of this testimony, Parvi's conclusory statement that he was ordered into the car against his will is insufficient, as a matter of law, to establish a prima facie case. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In addition to the false imprisonment claim, could plaintiff have filed a negligence claim based on the police officers' conduct? For a more recent case with eerily similar facts, see Deuser v. Vecera, 139 F.3d 1190 (8th Cir.1998) (plaintiff's decedent who had been briefly detained by park rangers for public drunkenness, but not arrested, was released in a parking lot and wandered onto interstate where he was killed by motorist).

2. The mother of an ill and disoriented 16–year–old boy instructed a police officer to take her son to a particular hospital. Is there false imprisonment if the officer intentionally takes the boy to a different hospital? Cf. Haisenleder v. Reeder, 114 Mich.App. 258, 318 N.W.2d 634 (1982). Or what if the plaintiff, a sufferer from diabetes who is unconscious from insulin shock, is wrongfully arrested and confined in jail overnight in the belief that he is drunk, but is released before he regains consciousness. Is there a tort? See Prosser, False Imprisonment: Consciousness of Confinement, 55 Colum.L.Rev. 847 (1955); Restatement (Second) of Torts § 42.

3. Called upon to make an emergency evaluation, a doctor diagnoses a person as mentally ill and has her detained in a mental institution. Is this false imprisonment? See Williams v. Smith, 179 Ga.App. 712, 348 S.E.2d 50 (1986) (no false imprisonment if statutory commitment procedures were followed even if doctor was negligent in diagnosis); Foshee v. Health Mgt. Assocs., 675 So.2d 957 (Fla.App.1996) (false imprisonment if statutory commitment procedures were not followed by nurse who physically prevented patient from leaving a psychiatric facility and coerced her into signing voluntary admission papers). What if a hospital detains a woman for two hours while its staff initiates involuntary commitment proceedings because she is agitated and threatened suicide? Riffe v. Armstrong, 197 W.Va. 626, 477 S.E.2d 535 (1996) (hospital's action justified in light of plaintiff's condition upon arrival).

Hardy v. LaBelle's Distributing Co.

Supreme Court of Montana, 1983.
203 Mont. 263, 661 P.2d 35.

GULBRANDSON, JUSTICE. * * * Defendant, LaBelle's Distributing Company (LaBelle's) hired Hardy as a temporary employee on December 1, 1978. She was assigned duty as a sales clerk in the jewelry department.

On December 9, 1978, another employee for LaBelle's, Jackie Renner, thought she saw Hardy steal one of the watches that LaBelle's had in stock.

Jackie Renner reported her belief to LaBelle's showroom manager that evening.

On the morning of December 10, Hardy was approached by the assistant manager of LaBelle's jewelry department and told that all new employees were given a tour of the store. He showed her into the showroom manager's office and then left, closing the door behind him.

There is conflicting testimony concerning who was present in the showroom manager's office when Hardy arrived. Hardy testified that David Kotke, the showroom manager, Steve Newsom, the store's loss prevention manager, and a uniformed policeman were present. Newsom and one of the policemen in the room testified that another policeman, instead of Kotke, was present.

Hardy was told that she had been accused of stealing a watch. Hardy denied taking the watch and agreed to take a lie detector test. According to conflicting testimony, the meeting lasted approximately from twenty to forty-five minutes.

Hardy took the lie detector test, which supported her statement that she had not taken the watch. The showroom manager apologized to Hardy the next morning and told her that she was still welcome to work at LaBelle's. The employee who reported seeing Hardy take the watch also apologized. The two employees then argued briefly, and Hardy left the store.

Hardy brought this action claiming that defendants had wrongfully detained her against her will when she was questioned about the watch.

On appeal Hardy raises basically two issues: (1) Whether the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict and judgment and (2) Whether the District Court erred in the issuance of its instructions.

The two key elements of false imprisonment are the restraint of an individual against his will and the unlawfulness of such restraint. [Cc] The individual may be restrained by acts or merely by words which he fears to disregard. [Cc]

Here, there is ample evidence to support the jury's finding that Hardy was not unlawfully restrained against her will. While Hardy stated that she felt compelled to remain in the showroom manager's office, she also admitted that she wanted to stay and clarify the situation. She did not ask to leave. She was not told she could not leave. No threat of force or otherwise was made to compel her to stay. Although she followed the assistant manager into the office under pretense of a tour, she testified at trial that she would have followed him voluntarily if she had known the true purpose of the meeting and that two policemen were in the room. Under these circumstances, the jury could easily find that Hardy was not detained against her will. [Cc] See also, Meinecke v. Skaggs (1949), 123 Mont. 308, 213 P.2d 237, and Roberts v. Coleman (1961), 228 Or. 286, 365 P.2d 79. * * *

[The court also found that the District Court did not err in issuance of jury instructions on the law of false imprisonment, and affirmed the District Court's judgment in favor of defendants.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. An employee is suspected of stealing property from her employer and is told a trip to her home is necessary to recover the property. If the employee feels mentally compelled for fear of losing her job to go in an automobile with her supervisor to her home, has she been confined involuntarily? See Faniel v. Chesapeake & Potomac Tel. Co., 404 A.2d 147 (D.C.App.1979) (fear of losing one's job is a powerful incentive, but it does not render behavior involuntary).

2. Retention of plaintiff's property sometimes may provide the "restraint" necessary to constitute false imprisonment. See Fischer v. Famous–Barr Co., 646 S.W.2d 819 (Mo.App.1982), where plaintiff set off the security alarm when exiting a store because the salesperson forgot to remove the sensor tag from an article of clothing she had purchased. Because an employee of the store took possession of the bag containing her purchases, plaintiff felt she had to follow the employee back to the fourth floor where she had made her purchase. Compare Marcano v. Northwestern Chrysler–Plymouth Sales, Inc., 550 F.Supp. 595 (N.D.Ill.1982), where plaintiff went to a car dealership to discuss a dispute over payments on her loan and voluntarily gave her keys to the dealer so he could inspect the car. The dealer locked the car and kept the keys. Plaintiff stayed at the dealership for five hours. The court held that there was no false imprisonment because she could have left and because the intention of defendant was not to confine her personally, but only to keep the car.

3. False imprisonment has not been extended beyond such direct duress to person or to property. If the plaintiff submits merely to persuasion, and accompanies the defendant to clear himself of suspicion, without any implied threat of force, the action does not lie. Hunter v. Laurent, 158 La. 874, 104 So. 747 (1925); James v. MacDougall & Southwick Co., 134 Wash. 314, 235 P. 812 (1925). Suppose the defendant says to the plaintiff, "You must remain in this room, or I will never speak to you again"? Compare Fitscher v. Rollman & Sons Co., 31 Ohio App. 340, 167 N.E. 469 (1929), where defendant threatened to make a scene on the street unless plaintiff remained.

4. It is generally agreed that false imprisonment resembles assault, in that threats of future action are not enough. Thus the action does not lie where the defendant merely threatens to call the police and have the plaintiff arrested unless he remains. Sweeney v. F.W. Woolworth Co., 247 Mass. 277, 142 N.E. 50 (1924); Priddy v. Bunton, 177 S.W.2d 805 (Tex.Civ.App.1943).

5. On the shopkeeper's privilege to detain a suspected thief, see Bonkowski v. Arlan's Department Store, page 116.

Enright v. Groves

Colorado Court of Appeals, 1977.
39 Colo.App. 39, 560 P.2d 851.

SMITH, JUDGE. Defendants Groves and City of Ft. Collins appeal from judgments entered against them upon jury verdicts awarding plaintiff $500 actual damages and $1,000 exemplary damages on her claim of false imprisonment * * *.

The evidence at trial disclosed that on August 25, 1974, Officer Groves, while on duty as a uniformed police officer of the City of Fort Collins, observed a dog running loose in violation of the city's "dog leash" ordinance. He observed the animal approaching what was later identified as the residence of Mrs. Enright, the plaintiff. As Groves approached the house, he encountered Mrs. Enright's eleven-year-old son, and asked him if the dog belonged to him. The boy replied that it was his dog, and told Groves that his mother was sitting in the car parked at the curb by the house. Groves then ordered the boy to put the dog inside the house, and turned and started walking toward the Enright vehicle.

Groves testified that he was met by Mrs. Enright with whom he was not acquainted. She asked if she could help him. Groves responded by demanding her driver's license. She replied by giving him her name and address. He again demanded her driver's license, which she declined to produce. Groves thereupon advised her that she could either produce her driver's license or go to jail. Mrs. Enright responded by asking, "Isn't this ridiculous?" Groves thereupon grabbed one of her arms, stating, "Let's go!" * * *

She was taken to the police station where a complaint was signed charging her with violation of the "dog leash" ordinance and bail was set. Mrs. Enright was released only after a friend posted bail. She was later convicted of the ordinance violation. * * *

Appellants contend that Groves had probable cause to arrest Mrs. Enright, and that she was in fact arrested for and convicted of violation of the dog-at-large ordinance. They assert, therefore, that her claim for false imprisonment or false arrest cannot lie, and that Groves' use of force in arresting Mrs. Enright was permissible. We disagree.

False arrest arises when one is taken into custody by a person who claims but does not have proper legal authority. W. Prosser, Torts § 11 (4th ed.). Accordingly, a claim for false arrest will not lie if an officer has a valid warrant or probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the person who was arrested committed it. Conviction of the crime for which one is specifically arrested is a complete defense to a subsequent claim of false arrest. [Cc]

Here, however, the evidence is clear that Groves arrested Mrs. Enright, not for violation of the dog leash ordinance, but rather for refusing to produce her driver's license. This basis for the arrest is exemplified by the fact that he specifically advised her that she would either produce the license or go to jail. We find no statute or case law in this jurisdiction which requires a citizen to show her driver's license upon demand, unless, for example, she is a driver of an automobile and such demand is made in that connection. * * *

Here, there was no testimony that Groves ever even attempted to explain why he was demanding plaintiff's driver's license, and it is clear that she had already volunteered her name and address. Groves admitted that he did not ask Mrs. Enright if she had any means of identification on her person, instead he simply demanded that she give him her driver's license.

We conclude that Groves' demand for Mrs. Enright's driver's license was not a lawful order and that refusal to comply therewith was not therefore an offense in and of itself. Groves was not therefore entitled to use force in arresting Mrs. Enright. Thus Groves' defense based upon an arrest for and conviction of a specific offense must, as a matter of law, fail. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Is it necessary that the defendant be an officer? Suppose a filling station attendant asserts legal authority to detain the plaintiff, believing he had stolen cash from the station? Daniel v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 229 Mo.App. 150, 73 S.W.2d 355 (1934). (upholding jury verdict for plaintiff). Plaintiff, alighting from defendant's train, fell and broke his leg. Defendant's conductor told plaintiff that the law required him to remain and fill out a statement about the accident. Plaintiff did so, and his cab was held for fifteen or twenty minutes, during which plaintiff was in considerable pain, while the statement was filled out and signed. This was held to be false imprisonment. Whitman v. Atchison, T. & S.F.R. Co., 85 Kan. 150, 116 P. 234 (1911).

2. A private citizen who aids a police officer in making a false arrest can be held liable to plaintiff for false imprisonment. If, however, the police officer requests assistance, the private citizen will not be liable unless he knows the arrest is an unlawful one. See Restatement (Second) of Torts §§ 45A and 139.

3. Merely providing information to the police, even if it turns out to be incorrect information, is not enough to support a claim of false imprisonment. Holcomb v. Walter's Dimmick Petroleum, Inc., 858 N.E.2d 103, 107 (Ind. 2006) (''Liability will not be imposed when the defendant does nothing more than detail his version of the facts to a policeman and ask for his assistance, leaving it to the officer to determine what is the appropriate response, at least where his representation of the facts does not prevent the intelligent exercise of the officer's discretion.'') See also Highfill v. Hale, 186 S.W.3d 277 (Mo. 2006) (because deputy's decision to arrest neighbors for stalking was based at least partly on deputy's own investigation, complainant was not liable).

Whittaker v. Sandford

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1912.
110 Me. 77, 85 A. 399.

[Plaintiff was a member and her husband was a minister of a religious sect, of which defendant was the leader. The sect had a colony in Maine and at Jaffa (now Tel Aviv), the latter of which plaintiff had joined. Plaintiff decided to abandon the sect and to return to America. While she and her four children were in Jaffa awaiting passage on a steamer, defendant offered her passage back to America on his yacht. When plaintiff told defendant that she was afraid that he would not let her off the yacht until she was ''won to the movement again,'' defendant assured her repeatedly that under no circumstances would she be detained on board. Plaintiff accepted this assurance and sailed for America on the yacht. On arrival in port, defendant refused to furnish her with a boat so that she could leave the yacht, saying it was up to her husband whether she could leave. When plaintiff raised the issue with her husband, he said it was up to defendant, the leader of the sect and the owner of the yacht. She remained on board for nearly a month, during which time defendant and plaintiff's husband attempted to persuade her to rejoin the sect. On several occasions, plaintiff, always in the company of her husband, was allowed to go ashore to the mainland and to various islands. She was not allowed to leave the yacht unaccompanied. She finally obtained her release and that of her four children with the assistance of the sheriff and a writ of habeas corpus. She then brought this action for false imprisonment. The jury returned a verdict in her favor for $1100. Defendant excepted to the court's instructions, and appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial.]

SAVAGE, J. * * * The court instructed the jury that the plaintiff to recover must show that the restraint was physical, and not merely a moral influence; that it must have been actual physical restraint, in the sense that one intentionally locked into a room would be physically restrained but not necessarily involving physical force upon the person; that it was not necessary that the defendant, or any person by his direction, should lay his hand upon the plaintiff; that if the plaintiff was restrained so that she could not leave the yacht Kingdom by the intentional refusal to furnish transportation as agreed, she not having it in her power to escape otherwise, it would be a physical restraint and unlawful imprisonment. We think the instructions were apt and sufficient. If one should, without right, turn the key in a door, and thereby prevent a person in the room from leaving, it would be the simplest form of unlawful imprisonment. The restraint is physical. The four walls and the locked door are physical impediments to escape. Now is it different when one who is in control of a vessel at anchor, within practical rowing distance from the shore, who has agreed that a guest on board shall be free to leave, there being no means to leave except by rowboats, wrongfully refuses the guest the use of a boat? The boat is the key. By refusing the boat he turns the key. The guest is as effectually locked up as if there were walls along the sides of the vessel. The restraint is physical. The impassable sea is the physical barrier. * * *

A careful study of the evidence leads us to conclude that the jury were warranted in finding that the defendant was guilty of unlawful imprisonment. This, to be sure, is not an action based upon the defendant's failure to keep his agreement to permit the plaintiff to leave the yacht as soon as it should reach shore. But his duty under the circumstances is an important consideration. It cannot be believed that either party to the agreement understood that it was his duty merely to bring her to an American harbor. The agreement implied that she was to go ashore. There was no practical way for her to go ashore except in the yacht's boats. The agreement must be understood to mean that he would bring her to land, or to allow her to get to land, by the only available means. The evidence is that he refused her a boat. His refusal was wrongful. The case leaves not the slightest doubt that he had the power to control the boats, if he chose to exercise it. It was not enough for him to leave it to the husband to say whether she might go ashore or not. She had a personal right to go on shore. If the defendant personally denied her the privilege, as the jury might find he did, it was a wrongful denial.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. A woman tells her boyfriend she does not want to see him anymore, but agrees to ride with him just to the store and back. When they return to her parents' house and she opens the car door, the boyfriend suddenly starts the car off, making it dangerous for her to exit the moving vehicle. False imprisonment? See Noguchi v. Nakamura, 2 Haw.App. 655, 638 P.2d 1383 (1982).

2. In Talcott v. National Exhibition Co., 144 App.Div. 337, 128 N.Y.S. 1059 (1911), plaintiff was one of a crowd seeking admission to the baseball game between the Chicago Cubs and the New York Giants that played off the tie for the 1908 National League pennant. This was necessary because of a one-to-one tie in an earlier game between the same teams, produced when Fred Merkle of the Giants pulled his famous ''bonehead play'' in failing to touch second base. For two fascinating accounts of that game told by other players in it, see L. Ritter, The Glory of Their Times 98–100 and 124–218 (1966); the book has a picture of the after-game crowd in the Polo Grounds at page 126. The Giants, who would have won the pennant except for the Merkle error, lost the playoff game. Plaintiff succeeded in entering an enclosure where tickets were sold, but found that he could not get in to the stands. Defendant closed the entrance gates behind him to prevent injuries from the crush. There was another exit, but because defendant failed to inform plaintiff of its existence, he remained within the enclosure for more than an hour. In his action for false imprisonment, a verdict and judgment in his favor were affirmed. It was held that while the defendant might have been justified in closing the gates, it was then under a duty to inform plaintiff of the other exit.

3. Members of a religious cult are abducted by their relatives and subjected to deprogramming. Is this false imprisonment? Eilers v. Coy, 582 F.Supp. 1093 (D.Minn.1984).

4. Plaintiff boarded a plane in Washington, D.C., for a flight to New York where he was to attend a reception at the United Nations. After sitting on the tarmac for over an hour waiting for his flight to take off, plaintiff realized he would miss the reception and demanded to be returned to the terminal. Is the airline liable for failing to allow him to leave the airplane after it had pulled away from the gate? After it had sat on the tarmac for an hour? Somewhere above New Jersey? See Abourezk v. New York Airlines, 895 F.2d 1456 (D.C.Cir.1990) (no duty to release passenger until plane reached New York absent exigent circumstances not present in the case).

5. INTENTIONAL INFLICTION OF EMOTIONAL DISTRESS

State Rubbish Collectors Ass'n v. Siliznoff

Supreme Court of California, 1952.
38 Cal.2d 330, 240 P.2d 282.

[The State Rubbish Collectors Association sued Siliznoff to collect on certain notes. Siliznoff sought cancellation of the notes because of duress and want of consideration. In addition, he sought general and punitive damages because of alleged ''assaults'' made on him. The evidence was that Siliznoff had collected the trash from the Acme Brewing Company, which the Association regarded as within the territory of another member of the Association named Abramoff. The defendant was called before the Association and ordered to pay over the collected money to Abramoff, as a result of which he signed the notes in question. Further facts appear in the opinion.

The jury returned a verdict for Siliznoff on the original complaint and on the counterclaim. Siliznoff obtained a judgment against the Association for $1,250 general and special damages and $4,000 punitive damages. The Association appealed the judgment.]

TRAYNOR, J. * * * Plaintiff's primary contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment. Defendant testified that: * * *

Andikian [an inspector of the Association] told defendant that '' 'We will give you up till tonight to get down to the board meeting and make some kind of arrangements or agreements about the Acme Brewery, or otherwise we are going to beat you up.' * * * He says he either would hire somebody or do it himself. And I says, 'Well, what would they do to me?' He says, well, they would physically beat me up first, cut up the truck tires or burn the truck, or otherwise put me out of business completely. He said if I didn't appear at that meeting and make some kind of an agreement that they would do that, but he says up to then they would let me alone, but if I walked out of that meeting that night they would beat me up for sure.'' Defendant attended the meeting and protested that he owed nothing for the Acme account and in any event could not pay the amount demanded. He was again told by the president of the association that ''that table right there [the board of directors] ran all the rubbish collecting in Los Angeles and if there was any routes to be gotten that they would get them and distribute them among their members * * *.'' After two hours of further discussion defendant agreed to join the association and pay for the Acme account. He promised to return the next day and sign the necessary papers. He testified that the only reason ''they let me go home, is that I promised that I would sign the notes the very next morning.'' The president ''made me promise on my honor and everything else, and I was scared, and I knew I had to come back, so I believe he knew I was scared and that I would come back. That's the only reason they let me go home.'' Defendant also testified that because of the fright he suffered during his dispute with the association he became ill and vomited several times and had to remain away from work for a period of several days.

Plaintiff contends that the evidence does not establish an assault against defendant because the threats made all related to action that might take place in the future; that neither Andikian nor members of the board of directors threatened immediate physical harm to defendant. [C] We have concluded, however, that a cause of action is established when it is shown that one, in the absence of any privilege, intentionally subjects another to the mental suffering incident to serious threats to his physical well-being, whether or not the threats are made under such circumstances as to constitute a technical assault.

In the past it has been frequently stated that the interest in emotional and mental tranquillity is not one that the law will protect from invasion in its own right. [Cc] As late as 1934 the Restatement of Torts took the position that "The interest in mental and emotional tranquillity and, therefore, in freedom from mental and emotional disturbance is not, as a thing in itself, regarded as of sufficient importance to require others to refrain from conduct intended or recognizably likely to cause such a disturbance." Restatement, Torts, § 46, comment c. The Restatement explained the rule allowing recovery for the mere apprehension of bodily harm in traditional assault cases as an historical anomaly (§ 24, comment c), and the rule allowing recovery for insulting conduct by an employee of a common carrier as justified by the necessity of securing for the public comfortable as well as safe service (§ 48, comment c).

The Restatement recognized, however, that in many cases mental distress could be so intense that it could reasonably be foreseen that illness or other bodily harm might result. If the defendant intentionally subjected the plaintiff to such distress and bodily harm resulted, the defendant would be liable for negligently causing the plaintiff bodily harm. Restatement, Torts, §§ 306, 312. Under this theory the cause of action was not founded on a right to be free from intentional interference with mental tranquillity, but on the right to be free from negligent interference with physical well-being. A defendant who intentionally subjected another to mental distress without intending to cause bodily harm would nevertheless be liable for resulting bodily harm if he should have foreseen that the mental distress might cause such harm.

The California cases have been in accord with the Restatement in allowing recovery where physical injury resulted from intentionally subjecting the plaintiff to serious mental distress. [Cc]

The view has been forcefully advocated that the law should protect emotional and mental tranquillity as such against serious and intentional invasions, [cc] and there is a growing body of case law supporting this position. [Cc] In recognition of this development the American Law Institute amended section 46 of the Restatement of Torts in 1947 to provide:

"One who, without a privilege to do so, intentionally causes severe emotional distress to another is liable (a) for such emotional distress, and (b) for bodily harm resulting from it."

In explanation it is stated that "The interest in freedom from severe emotional distress is regarded as of sufficient importance to require others to refrain from conduct intended to invade it. Such conduct is tortious. The injury suffered by the one whose interest is invaded is frequently far more serious to him than certain tortious invasions of the interest in bodily integrity and other legally protected interests. In the absence of a privilege, the actor's conduct has no social utility; indeed it is anti-social. No reason or policy requires such an actor to be protected from the liability which usually attaches to the wilful wrongdoer whose efforts are successful.'' (Restatement of the Law, 1948 Supplement, Torts, § 46, comment d.)

There are persuasive arguments and analogies that support the recognition of a right to be free from serious, intentional and unprivileged invasions of mental and emotional tranquillity. If a cause of action is otherwise established, it is settled that damages may be given for mental suffering naturally ensuing from the acts complained of [cc], and in the case of many torts, such as assault, battery, false imprisonment and defamation, mental suffering will frequently constitute the principal element of damages. [C] In cases where mental suffering constitutes a major element of damages it is anomalous to deny recovery because the defendant's intentional misconduct fell short of producing some physical injury.

It may be contended that to allow recovery in the absence of physical injury will open the door to unfounded claims and a flood of litigation, and that the requirement that there be physical injury is necessary to insure that serious mental suffering actually occurred. The jury is ordinarily in a better position, however, to determine whether outrageous conduct results in mental distress than whether that distress in turn results in physical injury. From their own experience jurors are aware of the extent and character of the disagreeable emotions that may result from the defendant's conduct, but a difficult medical question is presented when it must be determined if emotional distress resulted in physical injury. [C] Greater proof that mental suffering occurred is found in the defendant's conduct designed to bring it about than in physical injury that may or may not have resulted therefrom. * * *

In the present case plaintiff caused defendant to suffer extreme fright. By intentionally producing such fright it endeavored to compel him either to give up the Acme account or pay for it, and it had no right or privilege to adopt such coercive methods in competing for business. In these circumstances liability is clear. * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why not assault? Why not false imprisonment? Assuming neither tort occurred, how many attorneys in 1952 would have thought of bringing a cross-complaint in this case for ''intentional infliction of emotional harm''? How many judges would have adopted it?

2. But what form of tort has been unleashed? Is it as definite in character as those that arose out of the writ of trespass? What would the result have been in the main case if the Association had only threatened to close down Siliznoff's business, but had not made threats to his physical well-being? Do you agree that the jury can more easily determine whether conduct is outrageous than whether physical injury resulted from emotional harm? If so, does this fact suggest that a claim should be allowed?

3. The seminal case to allow recovery for the intentional infliction of mental distress as a distinct tort was Wilkinson v. Downton, [1897] 2 Q.B. 57, in which a practical joker amused himself by telling the plaintiff that her husband had been smashed up in an accident, was lying at The Elms in Leytonstone with both legs broken, and that she was to go to him at once in a cab with two pillows to fetch him home. The shock to her nervous system caused serious physical illness with permanent consequences, and at one time threatened her reason. The cause of action through which defendant was held liable is unclear to the reader of the opinion and apparently to the court as well.

4. Interference with Human Bodies. Before the recognition of a separate tort for intentional infliction of emotional distress, a number of courts had allowed recovery for mental distress at the intentional mutilation or disinterment of a dead body or for interference with proper burial. See, for example, Alderman v. Ford, 146 Kan. 698, 72 P.2d 981 (1937); Gostkowski v. Roman Catholic Church, 262 N.Y. 320, 186 N.E. 798 (1933); Papieves v. Lawrence, 437 Pa. 373, 263 A.2d 118 (1970). In these and later cases, the courts have talked of a property right in the body, said to be in the next of kin or a group of close relatives, which serves as a foundation for the action for mental disturbance. See, for example, Whaley v. County of Tuscola, 58 F.3d 1111 (6th Cir.1995) (discussing Ohio and Michigan law) (unauthorized removal of corneas and eyeballs by coroner). In Gadbury v. Bleitz, 133 Wash. 134, 233 P. 299 (1925), where the body was held without burial with demand for payment of another debt, the court avoided difficulties surrounding right of ownership by recognizing that the tort was in reality the intentional infliction of mental distress upon the survivors by extreme outrage. In accord, Gray Brown–Service Mortuary, Inc. v. Lloyd, 729 So.2d 280, 285 (Ala. 1999) (''It has long been the law of Alabama that mistreatment of burial places and human remains will support the recovery of damages for mental suffering.'')

5. Common Carriers and Innkeepers have been held to a higher standard of conduct and sometimes held liable for using insulting language to their passengers and patrons. See, e.g., Lipman v. Atlantic Coast Line R.R. Co., 108 S.C. 151, 93 S.E. 714 (1917) (carrier); Emmke v. De Silva, 293 F. 17 (8th Cir. 1923) (hotel). But cf. Wallace v. Shoreham Hotel Corp., 49 A.2d 81 (D.C. Mun. App. 1946) (restaurant patron did not state cause of action based on waiter's insult) and Bethel v. N.Y.C. Transit Authority, 92 N.Y.2d 348, 681 N.Y.S.2d 201, 703 N.E.2d 1214 (1998) (abolishing higher standard of care for common carriers).

6. As the principal case indicates, § 46 of the Restatement of Torts was changed in the 1948 Supplement to recognize the cause of action for the intentional infliction of severe emotional distress, called ''outrage'' in some jurisdictions. As with any newly recognized cause of action, the courts in each jurisdiction must struggle with what its contours will be. What sorts of conduct constitutes ''extreme and outrageous'' conduct? Are words alone enough? Should the plaintiff's individual vulnerabilities be taken into account? How does the jury determine whether the emotional distress is ''severe''? Is it necessary that the defendant intended to cause the mental disturbance, or that it be substantially certain to follow, within the rule stated in Garratt v. Dailey, page 17?

Slocum v. Food Fair Stores of Florida

Supreme Court of Florida, 1958.
100 So.2d 396.

DREW, JUSTICE. This appeal is from an order dismissing a complaint for failure to state a cause of action. Simply stated, the plaintiff sought money damages for mental suffering or emotional distress, and an ensuing heart attack and aggravation of pre-existing heart disease, allegedly caused by insulting language of the defendant's employee directed toward her while she was a customer in its store. Specifically, in reply to her inquiry as to the price of an item he was marking, he replied: ''If you want to know the price, you'll have to find out the best way you can * * * you stink to me.'' She asserts, in the alternative, that the language was used in a malicious or grossly reckless manner, ''or with intent to inflict great mental and emotional disturbance to said plaintiff.''

No great difficulty is involved in the preliminary point raised as to the sufficiency of damages alleged, the only direct injury being mental or emotional with physical symptoms merely derivative therefrom. [C] While that decision would apparently allow recovery for mental suffering, even absent physical consequences, inflicted in the course of other intentional or malicious torts, it does not resolve the central problem in this case, i.e. whether the conduct here claimed to have caused the injury, the use of insulting language under the circumstances described, constituted an actionable invasion of a legally protected right. Query: does such an assertion of a deliberate disturbance of emotional equanimity state an independent cause of action in tort?

Appellant's fundamental argument is addressed to that proposition. The case is one of first impression in this jurisdiction, and she contends that this Court should recognize the existence of a new tort, an independent cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress.

A study of the numerous references on the subject indicates a strong current of opinion in support of such recognition, in lieu of the strained reasoning so often apparent when liability for such injury is predicated upon one or another of several traditional tort theories. * * *

A most cogent statement of the doctrine covering tort liability for insult has been incorporated in the Restatement of the Law of Torts, 1948 supplement, sec. 46, entitled ''Conduct intended to cause emotional distress only.'' It makes a blanket provision for liability on the part of ''one, who, without a privilege to do so, intentionally causes severe emotional distress to another,'' indicating that the requisite intention exists ''when the act is done for the purpose of causing the distress or with knowledge * * * that severe emotional distress is substantially certain to be produced by [such] conduct.'' Comment (a), Sec. 46, supra. Abusive language is, of course, only one of the many means by which the tort could be committed.

However, even if we assume, without deciding, the legal propriety of that doctrine, a study of its factual applications shows that a line of demarcation should be drawn between conduct likely to cause mere ''emotional distress'' and that causing ''severe emotional distress,'' so as to exclude the situation at bar. [C] ''So far as it is possible to generalize from the cases, the rule which seems to be emerging is that there is liability only for conduct exceeding all bounds which could be tolerated by society, of a nature especially calculated to cause mental damage of a very serious kind.'' [C] And the most practicable view is that the functions of court and jury are no different than in other tort actions where there is at the outset a question as to whether the conduct alleged is so legally innocuous as to present no issue for a jury. [C]

This tendency to hinge the cause of action upon the degree of the insult has led some courts to reject the doctrine in toto. [C] Whether or not this is desirable, it is uniformly agreed that the determination of whether words or conduct are actionable in character is to be made on an objective rather than subjective standard, from common acceptation. The unwarranted intrusion must be calculated to cause ''severe emotional distress'' to a person of ordinary sensibilities, in the absence of special knowledge or notice. There is no inclination to include all instances of mere vulgarities, obviously intended as meaningless abusive expressions. While the manner in which language is used may no doubt determine its actionable character, appellant's assertion that the statement involved in this case was made to her with gross recklessness, etc., cannot take the place of allegations showing that the words were intended to have real meaning or serious effect.

A broader rule has been developed in a particular class of cases, usually treated as a distinct and separate area of liability originally applied to common carriers. Rest.Torts, per. ed., sec. 48. The courts have from an early date granted relief for offense reasonably suffered by a patron from insult by a servant or employee of a carrier, hotel, theater, and most recently, a telegraph office. The existence of a special relationship, arising either from contract or from the inherent nature of a non-competitive public utility, supports a right and correlative duty of courtesy beyond that legally required in general mercantile or personal relationships. [Cc]

In view of the concurrent development of the cause of action first above described, there is no impelling reason to extend the rule of the latter cases. Their rationale does not of necessity cover the area of business invitees generally, where the theory of respondeat superior underlying most liabilities of the employer would dictate some degree of conformity to standards of individual liability. This factor, together with the stringent standards of care imposed in a number of the carrier cases [c], may have influenced the treatment of the subject by editors of the Restatement, where the statement of the carrier doctrine is quite limited in scope and classified separately from the section covering the more general area of liability under consideration. But whether or not these rules are ultimately adopted in this jurisdiction, the facts of the present case cannot be brought within their reasonable intendment.

Affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why is the intentional infliction of mental disturbance by the insult not a tort in itself?

2. ''Against a large part of the frictions and irritations and clashing of temperaments incident to participation in a community life, a certain toughening of the mental hide is a better protection than the law could ever be. * * * Of course there is danger of getting into the realm of the trivial in this matter of insulting language. No pressing social need requires that every abusive outburst be converted into a tort; upon the contrary, it would be unfortunate if the law closed all the safety valves through which irascible tempers might legally blow off steam.'' Magruder, Mental and Emotional Disturbance in the Law of Torts, 49 Harv.L.Rev. 1033, 1035, 1053 (1936).

3. A South Carolina gentleman, incensed at his inability to get a telephone number, so far forgets his chivalry as to call the operator a God damned woman, and to say that if he were there he would break her God damned neck. The unprecedented experience, according to her allegations, causes her extreme mental disturbance and leaves her a nervous wreck. Does this state a cause of action? Brooker v. Silverthorne, 111 S.C. 553, 99 S.E. 350, 352 (1919) (language attributed to defendant ''merits severest condemnation and subjects user to the scorn and contempt of his fellow men. But it is not civilly actionable.'')

4. None of these was found actionable: Halliday v. Cienkowski, 333 Pa. 123, 3 A.2d 372 (1939) (''Scotch bitch,'' ''bastard,'' and ''bum''); Atkinson v. Bibb Mfg. Co., 50 Ga.App. 434, 178 S.E. 537 (1935) (foreman cursing discharged woman, with open knife in his hand); Kramer v. Ricksmeier, 159 Iowa 48, 139 N.W. 1091 (1913) (profanity and abuse over the telephone, with threats of future violence); Barry v. Baugh, 111 Ga.App. 813, 143 S.E.2d 489 (1965) (''crazy'').

5. What if the slurs or insults focus on racial, ethnic, or sexual characteristics? Most courts have found them not so outrageous as to be intolerable in a civilized society. See, for example, Harville v. Lowville Central School Dist., 245 A.D.2d 1106, 667 N.Y.S.2d 175 (App. Div. 1997) (student called ''Polish Nazi'' by teacher); Ugalde v. W.A. McKenzie Asphalt Co., 990 F.2d 239 (5th Cir. 1993) (applying Texas law) (worker called ''wetback'' by supervisor); Taggart v. Drake Univ., 549 N.W.2d 796 (Iowa 1996) (in fit of temper, dean addresses faculty member as ''young woman'' and refers to her in a ''sexist and condescending manner''). Such words may be considered along with other conduct, however, in making a claim. Contreras v. Crown Zellerbach Corp., 88 Wash.2d 735, 736, 565 P.2d 1173, 1174 (1977) (''continuous humiliation and embarrassment by reason of racial jokes, slurs and comments made in his presence'' by coworkers and supervisors held to state a claim).

6. Note the last sentence of the opinion in the principal case. The Supreme Court of Florida did not adopt intentional infliction of emotional distress until almost thirty years later. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. McCarson, 467 So.2d 277 (Fla. 1985).

Harris v. Jones

Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1977.
281 Md. 560, 380 A.2d 611.

MURPHY, CHIEF JUDGE. * * * The plaintiff, William R. Harris, a 26–year–old, 8–year employee of General Motors Corporation (GM), sued GM and one of its supervisory employees, H. Robert Jones, in the Superior Court of Baltimore City. The declaration alleged that Jones, aware that Harris suffered from a speech impediment which caused him to stutter, and also aware of Harris' sensitivity to his disability, and his insecurity because of it, nevertheless ''maliciously and cruelly ridiculed * * * [him] thus causing tremendous nervousness, increasing the physical defect itself and further injuring the mental attitude fostered by the Plaintiff toward his problem and otherwise intentionally inflicting emotional distress.'' It was also alleged in the declaration that Jones' actions occurred within the course of his employment with GM and that GM ratified Jones' conduct.

The evidence at trial showed that Harris stuttered throughout his entire life. While he had little trouble with one syllable words, he had great difficulty with longer words or sentences, causing him at times to shake his head up and down when attempting to speak.

During part of 1975, Harris worked under Jones' supervision at a GM automobile assembly plant. Over a five-month period, between March and August of 1975, Jones approached Harris over 30 times at work and verbally and physically mimicked his stuttering disability. In addition, two or three times a week during this period, Jones approached Harris and told him, in a ''smart manner,'' not to get nervous. As a result of Jones' conduct, Harris was ''shaken up'' and felt ''like going into a hole and hide.''

On June 2, 1975, Harris asked Jones for a transfer to another department; Jones refused, called Harris a ''troublemaker'' and chastised him for repeatedly seeking the assistance of his committeeman, a representative who handles employee grievances. On this occasion, Jones, ''shaking his head up and down'' to imitate Harris, mimicked his pronunciation of the word ''committeeman,'' which Harris pronounced ''mmitteeman.'' * * *

Harris had been under the care of a physician for a nervous condition for six years prior to the commencement of Jones' harassment. He admitted that many things made him nervous, including ''bosses.'' Harris testified that Jones' conduct heightened his nervousness and his speech impediment worsened. He saw his physician on one occasion during the five-month period that Jones was mistreating him; the physician prescribed pills for his nerves.

Harris admitted that other employees at work mimicked his stuttering. Approximately 3,000 persons were employed on each of two shifts, and Harris acknowledged the presence at the plant of a lot of ''tough guys,'' as well as profanity, name-calling and roughhousing among the employees. He said that a bad day at work caused him to become more nervous than usual. He admitted that he had problems with supervisors other than Jones, that he had been suspended or relieved from work 10 or 12 times, and that after one such dispute, he followed a supervisor home on his motorcycle, for which he was later disciplined.

On this evidence, * * * the jury awarded Harris $3,500 compensatory damages and $15,000 punitive damages against both Jones and GM. [This was reversed by the Court of Special Appeals.]

In concluding that the intentional infliction of emotional distress, standing alone, may constitute a valid tort action, the Court of Special Appeals relied upon Restatement (Second) of Torts, ch. 2, Emotional Distress, § 46 (1965), which provides, in pertinent part:

''§ 46. Outrageous Conduct Causing Severe Emotional Distress

''(1) One who by extreme and outrageous conduct intentionally or recklessly causes severe emotional distress to another is subject to liability for such emotional distress, and if bodily harm to the other results from it, for such bodily harm.''

The court noted that the tort was recognized, and its boundaries defined, in W. Prosser, Law of Torts § 12, at 56 (4th ed. 1971), as follows:

''So far as it is possible to generalize from the cases, the rule which seems to have emerged is that there is liability for conduct exceeding all bounds usually tolerated by decent society, of a nature which is especially calculated to cause, and does cause, mental distress of a very serious kind.''

The trend in other jurisdictions toward recognition of a right to recover for severe emotional distress brought on by the intentional act of another is manifest. Indeed, 37 jurisdictions appear now to recognize the tort as a valid cause of action. * * *

[F]our elements * * * must coalesce to impose liability for intentional infliction of emotional distress:

(1) The conduct must be intentional or reckless;

(2) The conduct must be extreme and outrageous;

(3) There must be a causal connection between the wrongful conduct and the emotional distress;

(4) The emotional distress must be severe. * * *

[The intermediate Court of Special Appeals had found that the first two elements were established but reversed on the ground that the last two elements were not.]

Whether the conduct of a defendant has been ''extreme and outrageous,'' so as to satisfy that element of the tort, has been a particularly troublesome question. Section 46 of the Restatement, comment d, states that ''Liability has been found only where the conduct has been so outrageous in character, and so extreme in degree, as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community.'' The comment goes on to state that liability does not extend, however: ''to mere insults, indignities, threats, annoyances, petty oppressions, or other trivialities. The rough edges of our society are still in need of a good deal of filing down, and in the meantime plaintiffs must necessarily be expected and required to be hardened to a certain amount of rough language, and to occasional acts that are definitely inconsiderate and unkind. * * * ''

In determining whether conduct is extreme and outrageous, it should not be considered in a sterile setting, detached from the surroundings in which it occurred. [C] The personality of the individual to whom the misconduct is directed is also a factor. ''There is a difference between violent and vile profanity addressed to a lady, and the same language to a Butte miner and a United States marine.'' Prosser, Intentional Infliction of Mental Suffering: A New Tort, 37 Mich.L.Rev. 874, 887 (1939). * * *

It is for the court to determine, in the first instance, whether the defendant's conduct may reasonably be regarded as extreme and outrageous; where reasonable men may differ, it is for the jury to determine whether, in the particular case, the conduct has been sufficiently extreme and outrageous to result in liability. * * *

While it is crystal clear that Jones' conduct was intentional, we need not decide whether it was extreme or outrageous, or causally related to the emotional distress which Harris allegedly suffered.[2] The fourth element of the tort—that the emotional distress must be severe—was not established by legally sufficient evidence justifying submission of the case to the jury. That element of the tort requires the plaintiff to show that he suffered a severely disabling emotional response to the defendant's conduct. The severity of the emotional distress is not only relevant to the amount of recovery, but is a necessary element to any recovery. * * *

Assuming that a causal relationship was shown between Jones' wrongful conduct and Harris' emotional distress, we find no evidence, legally sufficient for submission to the jury, that the distress was "severe" within the contemplation of the rule requiring establishment of that element of the tort. The evidence that Jones' reprehensible conduct humiliated Harris and caused him emotional distress, which was manifested by an aggravation of Harris' pre-existing nervous condition and a worsening of his speech impediment, was vague and weak at best. * * * While Harris' nervous condition may have been exacerbated somewhat by Jones' conduct, his family problems antedated his encounter with Jones and were not shown to be attributable to Jones' actions. Just how, or to what degree, Harris' speech impediment worsened is not revealed by the evidence. Granting the cruel and insensitive nature of Jones' conduct toward Harris, and considering the position of authority which Jones held over Harris, we conclude that the humiliation suffered was not, as a matter of law, so intense as to constitute the "severe" emotional distress required to recover for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress.

Judgment affirmed; costs to be paid by appellant.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Conduct Exceeding All Bounds Usually Tolerated by Decent Society. How culpable must defendant's conduct be before it reaches the level of being extreme enough to be deemed tortious? Some guidelines can be found in decided cases. For example, it is generally held that the mere solicitation of a woman to illicit intercourse is not only not an assault but does not give rise to any other cause of action. Reed v. Maley, 115 Ky. 816, 74 S.W. 1079 (1903). "The view being, apparently, that there is no harm in asking." Magruder, Mental and Emotional Disturbance in the Law of Torts, 49 Harv.L.Rev. 1033, 1055 (1936). Jones v. Clinton, 990 F.Supp. 657, 677 (E.D.Ark.1998) (applying Arkansas law) ("While the Court will certainly agree that plaintiff's allegations describe offensive conduct, the Court, as previously noted, has found that the Governor's alleged conduct does not constitute sexual assault. Rather, the conduct as alleged by plaintiff describes a

---

2. The fact that Harris may have had some pre-existing susceptibility to emotional distress does not necessarily preclude liability if it can be shown that the conduct intensified the pre-existing condition of psychological stress. [Cc] mere sexual proposition or encounter, albeit an odious one.... The Court is not aware of any authority holding that such a sexual encounter or proposition of the type alleged in this case, without more, gives rise to a claim of outrage.'')

In Samms v. Eccles, 11 Utah 2d 289, 358 P.2d 344 (1961), a married woman was hounded by continued telephone calls from May to December, some of them late at night; and on one occasion defendant came to her home and made an indecent exposure of his person. The court stated that under usual circumstances solicitation would not be actionable (''It seems to be a custom of long standing and one which in all likelihood will continue''), but found the ''aggravated circumstances'' in this case sufficient to make the defendant liable.

Plaintiff alleged that her rabbi had induced her to enter into a sexual relationship with him in the guise of therapy to assist her in finding a husband. Marmelstein v. Kehillat New Hempstead: The Rav Aron Jofen Community Synagogue, 11 N.Y.3d 15, 22, 892 N.E.2d 375, 862 N.Y.S.2d 311 (2008) (even if plaintiff could prove that her acquiescence was obtained through lies, manipulation, or other morally opprobrious conduct, the rabbi's conduct was not so outrageous in character and extreme in degree so as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency and be utterly intolerable in a civilized community).

2. Courts are reluctant to subject either internal family disputes or petty but strongly felt antagonisms to the sanctions of tort law. However, when conduct exceeds all reasonable bounds of behavior tolerated by society, courts are likely to find that a claim has been stated. Cf. Miller v. Currie, 50 F.3d 373 (6th Cir.1995) (applying Ohio law) (plaintiff's brother and sister-in-law and the employees of a nursing home prevented her from seeing her ninety-eight-year old mother); Halio v. Lurie, 15 A.D.2d 62, 222 N.Y.S.2d 759 (1961) (man who had jilted a woman wrote her jeering verses and taunting letters); Jackson v. Brown, 904 P.2d 685 (Utah 1995) (last minute cancellation of wedding not enough for outrage, but courting woman, proposing, and making arrangements for wedding including applying for license while married to someone else may be); Smith v. Malouf, 722 So.2d 490 (Miss. 1998) (teenager and her parents hid her location from the father of her baby so that baby could be secretly placed with strangers for adoption); Flamm v. Van Nierop, 56 Misc.2d 1059, 291 N.Y.S.2d 189 (1968) (defendant constantly drove behind plaintiff at a ''dangerously close distance,'' phoned him unnecessarily at his home and business and either hung up or remained on the line in silence, and ''dashed'' at him in public places).

3. Is filing a frivolous lawsuit against someone conduct that is sufficiently outrageous to permit recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress? After being injured in a fight in a parking lot that was poorly lit, crowded, and chaotic, plaintiff identified a man as her assailant even though she only had a vague impression of the physical characteristics of the person responsible for breaking her leg and someone else had apologized for causing her injury. After the man she identified was found not guilty on the criminal charges arising out of her identification, plaintiff filed a civil suit against the man. He counterclaimed for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Davis v. Currier, 704 A.2d 1207 (Maine 1997) (no cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress); Swerdlick v. Koch, 721 A.2d 849 (R.I. 1998) (no cause of action against neighbor who repeatedly photographed and maintained a log of activity in attempt to prove plaintiffs were illegally operating a mail-order business out of their home). What if a juror, found in contempt for failing to show up one day two weeks into the trial of someone accused of torturing and killing six people, was placed alone in a jail cell with the alleged murderer, was questioned and berated by the alleged murderer, and was laughed at by the jailors who placed her there? Johnson v. Wayne County, 213 Mich.App. 143, 540 N.W.2d 66 (1995) (states a cause of action).

4. What if a hospital had a policy of placing patients infected with the HIV virus in the same rooms as patients who were not, without disclosing that fact? Patient accidentally used his roommate's razor to shave and was then informed by the roommate that roommate was infected with HIV. Patient alleges that the hospital's conduct is outrageous and that he suffered severe emotional distress as a result. Liability? What other information would you like to have before deciding this issue? Bain v. Wells, 936 S.W.2d 618 (Tenn.1997).

5. Is there any common theme or set of similar factors running through the following cases?

A. State Rubbish Collectors Association v. Siliznoff, page 51.

B. Defendant, a private detective representing that he was a police officer, threatened to charge the plaintiff, a resident alien, with espionage unless she turned over to him certain private letters in her possession. She suffered severe mental disturbance and was made seriously ill. The defendant was held liable. Janvier v. Sweeney, [1919] 2 K.B. 316.

C. Defendants, school authorities, called a high school girl to the school office and bullied and badgered her for a considerable length of time, threatening her with prison and with public disgrace for herself and her family, unless she confessed to immoral conduct with various men. They succeeded in extorting from her a confession of misconduct, of which she was innocent. She suffered severe mental disturbance and resulting illness. Defendants were held liable. Johnson v. Sampson, 167 Minn. 203, 208 N.W. 814 (1926).

D. Collecting Agencies. While reasonable attempts to collect a debt lead to no liability, even though they may be expected to, and do, cause serious mental distress, more extreme conduct may produce a different result. Defendant, a creditor, had plaintiff called to the telephone of her neighbor, with the message that it was an emergency call. Defendant began the conversation by telling plaintiff that "this is going to be a shock; it is as much of a shock to me to have to tell you as it will be to you." When plaintiff said that she was prepared for the message, the defendant let her have it: "This is the Federal Outfitting Company—why don't you pay your bill?" Plaintiff suffered severe nervous shock and resulting serious illness. A complaint alleging these facts was held to state a cause of action. Bowden v. Spiegel, Inc., 96 Cal.App.2d 793, 216 P.2d 571 (1950). A veterinarian and an animal hospital threaten to "do away with" plaintiffs' dog unless plaintiffs paid in cash a bill for treating the dog for injuries suffered when struck by an automobile. See Lawrence v. Stanford and Ashland Terrace Animal Hospital, 655 S.W.2d 927 (Tenn.1983). See also Cadle Co. v. Hobbs, 673 So.2d 1363 (La. App. 1996) (implying that because plaintiff was African–American, no one would take her word against debt collector's).

E. There are similar cases involving the outrageous tactics of insurance adjusters seeking to force a settlement. Continental Cas. Co. v. Garrett, 173 Miss. 676, 161 So. 753 (1935). See also, as to refusal of a liability insurer to settle a claim, Fletcher v. Western Nat. Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.App.3d 376, 89 Cal.Rptr. 78 (1970). When the insurance company is reasonable in its refusal to settle a claim, it will not be held liable simply because its client happened to be an excessive worrier about fiscal problems. See Rossignol v. Noel, 289 A.2d 691 (Me.1972).

F. Other cases have involved evicting landlords, Kaufman v. Abramson, 363 F.2d 865 (4th Cir.1966), and even high pressure salesmen. See Turner v. ABC Jalousie Co., 251 S.C. 92, 160 S.E.2d 528 (1968).

6. Many cases, like the principal case, arise out of workplace behavior. Anderson v. Oklahoma Temp. Svcs., Inc., 925 P.2d 574 (Okla. App. 1996) (supervisor's use of profanity, smoking around employee after being asked to stop, and vulgar behavior not enough to state a cause of action for extreme and outrageous conduct) and Ford v. Revlon, Inc., 153 Ariz. 38, 734 P.2d 580 (1987) (employer liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress of plaintiff due to co-employee's actions in repeatedly subjecting plaintiff to physical assaults and vulgar remarks). In the employment context, some courts have held that a plaintiff's status as an employee should entitle him to a greater degree of protection from insult and outrage by a supervisor with authority over him than if he were a stranger while others do not. Compare Alcorn v. Anbro Eng'g, Inc., 2 Cal.3d 493, 468 P.2d 216, 86 Cal.Rptr. 88 (1970) with Texas Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Cos. v. Sears, 84 S.W.3d 604, 611 (Tex. 2002) (while an employer's conduct might in some instances be unpleasant, the employer must have some discretion to "supervise, review, criticize, demote, transfer, and discipline" its workers; thus, only very unusual employment disputes will give rise to cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress).

7. Vulnerability of Plaintiff. The plaintiff's sensitivities may be a factor in deeming defendant's conduct extreme and outrageous. Cf. Korbin v. Berlin, 177 So.2d 551 (Fla.App.1965), where defendant approached a six-year-old girl and said to her: "Do you know that your mother took a man away from his wife? Do you know that God is going to punish them? Do you know that a man is sleeping in your mother's room? God will punish them." It was alleged that the child suffered serious mental distress and resulting physical injury. Should a demurrer to a complaint pleading these facts be overruled? Cf. Delta Fin. Co. v. Ganakas, 93 Ga.App. 297, 91 S.E.2d 383 (1956) (eleven-year-old child home alone frightened by threats she would be taken to jail if she did not open door for defendant seeking to repossess television set). Drejza v. Vaccaro, 650 A.2d 1308 (D.C.App.1994) (outrageousness of police officer's conduct while interviewing rape victim must be evaluated in light of the fact that it occurred only an hour after the rape, when she would be expected to be more susceptible to emotional distress). Brandon v. County of Richardson, 261 Neb. 636, 624 N.W.2d 604 (2001) (same). After fourteen years, Plaintiff's illness made her no longer able to care for her two beloved Appaloosa horses, so she made arrangements for them to be pastured on defendants' property. Although defendants assured her they would take good care of the horses and return them to her if they could no longer keep them, they in fact sold them to a buyer for slaughter within a week of when they arrived. When plaintiff came to visit them and discovered them gone, defendants lied about their whereabouts and covered up the sale until it was too late for plaintiff to save the horses from the slaughter house. Burgess v. Taylor, 44 S.W.3d 806 (Ky. App. 2001) (in upholding jury verdict for plaintiff, court notes it appropriate to take into account defendants' knowledge of plaintiff's vulnerability to emotional distress based on her attachment to the horses).

8. Should special protection be accorded to pregnant women? When a creditor came to the house of a woman seven months pregnant and screamed profanity, abuse, and accusations of dishonesty in the presence of others and she suffered severe emotional disturbance which resulted in a miscarriage, she was allowed to recover in Kirby v. Jules Chain Stores Corp., 210 N.C. 808, 188 S.E. 625 (1936). See Bartow v. Smith, 149 Ohio St. 301, 78 N.E.2d 735 (1948), a holding that otherwise was overruled by Yeager v. Local Union 20, 6 Ohio St.3d 369, 453 N.E.2d 666 (1983).

9. Should protection also be given to the hypersensitive or idiosyncratic plaintiff? In one early landmark case, protection was allowed. Plaintiff, an eccentric woman who had in the past been treated for mental illness, believed that her ancestors had concealed a pot of gold by burying it. After a fortune teller gave her a map that purportedly showed the land upon which the pot was buried, she spent months digging for it. Defendants filled a pot with rocks and dirt and buried it where plaintiff would find it, placing a note on it that directed the finder to gather all the heirs and wait three days before opening it. A large number of townspeople, including the practical jokers, the heirs, a judge, and other town officials, gathered at the local bank to observe plaintiff open the pot in circumstances of extreme public humiliation. She suffered acute mental distress, with resulting serious illness, which apparently further unsettled her reason and contributed to her early death. The "pot of gold" came in the form of a judgment to her heirs. Nickerson v. Hodges, 146 La. 735, 84 So. 37 (1920).

10. Severe Emotional Distress. All jurisdictions require that the plaintiff prove severe not just mere emotional distress. This is frequently characterized as distress so severe that no reasonable person could be expected to endure it. Note that unlike most torts, the severity of the damage affects not just how much the plaintiff will recover, but whether the plaintiff recovers at all.

11. Proof of Severe Emotional Distress. Testimony that the plaintiff was upset and cried will not be enough. Hatch v. State Farm Fire and Cas. Co., 930 P.2d 382, 397 (Wyo. 1997) ("evidence of crying, being upset and uncomfortable is insufficient to demonstrate severe emotional distress that attains a level no reasonable person could be expected to endure"). Some jurisdictions require that the severe emotional distress be proved by expert witness testimony. Vallinoto v. DiSandro, 688 A.2d 830, 838 (R.I. 1997) (plaintiff must produce "competent medical evidence showing objective physical manifestation of her alleged psychic injuries"). Most, however, do not generally require expert proof to establish severe emotional distress caused by defendant's conduct, preferring to rely on such factors as the flagrant and serious nature of the defendant's conduct, subjective testimony from plaintiff and others, and physical symptoms, if present. Miller v. Willbanks, 8 S.W.3d 607 (Tenn. 1999) (collecting cases from other jurisdictions); Kloepfel v. Bokor, 149 Wash.2d 192, 66 P.3d 630 (2003) (rejecting argument that objective symptomatology is required to prove severe emotional distress); Brandon v. County of Richardson, 261 Neb. 636, 624 N.W.2d 604 (2001) (noting connection between outrageousness of conduct and proof of severe emotional distress); Sacco v. High Country Independent Press, Inc., 271 Mont. 209, 896 P.2d 411 (1995) (evidence of physical injury not necessary to determine whether plaintiff suffered severe emotional distress). Suppose a surgeon, angry at an operating-room nurse, throws a surgical drape into her face, covering her with the patient's blood and tissue. Both the nurse and the patient underwent a series of tests for HIV, hepatitis, and other communicable diseases. All were negative. Is her testimony that she feared for her life and suffered severe emotional distress at the thought of the risk sufficient? Grantham v. Vanderzyl, 802 So.2d 1077 (Ala. 2001) (court finds as a matter of law that the mere fear of contracting a disease, without actual exposure to it, cannot be sufficient to cause the level of distress necessary for tort of outrage).

Taylor v. Vallelunga

District Court of Appeal of California, 1959.
171 Cal.App.2d 107, 339 P.2d 910.

O'DONNELL, JUSTICE pro tem. * * * In the first count, plaintiff Clifford Gerlach alleges that on December 25, 1956, defendants struck and beat him causing him bodily injury for which he seeks damages. In the second count, plaintiff and appellant Gail E. Taylor incorporates by reference the charging allegations of the first count and proceeds to allege that she is the daughter of plaintiff Clifford Gerlach, that she was present at and witnessed the beating inflicted upon her father by defendants, and that as a result thereof, she suffered severe fright and emotional distress. She seeks damages for the distress so suffered. It is not alleged that any physical disability or injury resulted from the mental distress. A general demurrer to the second count of the complaint was interposed by defendants. The demurrer was sustained and appellant was granted ten days leave to amend. Appellant failed to amend and judgment of dismissal of the second count was entered. The appeal is from the judgment of dismissal.

The California cases have for some time past allowed recovery of damages where physical injury resulted from intentionally subjecting the plaintiff to serious mental distress. [C] In the Siliznoff case [page 51] the Supreme Court extended the right of recovery to situations where no physical injury follows the suffering of mental distress, saying that "a cause of action is established when it is shown that one, in the absence of any privilege, intentionally subjects another to the mental suffering incident to serious threats to his physical well-being, whether or not the threats are made under such circumstances as to constitute a technical assault." [C] In arriving at this result the court relied in substantial part upon the development of the law in this field of torts as traced by the American Law Institute, and it quotes with approval [c] section 46, as amended, of the Restatement of Torts, (Restatement of the Law, 1948 Supplement, Torts, § 46) which reads: "One who, without a privilege to do so, intentionally causes severe emotional distress to another is liable (a) for such emotional distress, and (b) for bodily harm resulting from it." In explanation of the meaning of the term "intentionally" as it is employed in said section 46, the Reporter says in subdivision (a) of that section: "An intention to cause severe emotional distress exists when the act is done for the purpose of causing the distress or with knowledge on the part of the actor that severe emotional distress is substantially certain to be produced by his conduct. See Illustration 3." Illustration 3 referred to reads as follows: "A is sitting on her front porch watching her husband B, who is standing on the sidewalk, C, who hates B and is friendly to A, whose presence is known to him, stabs B, killing him. C is liable to A for the mental anguish, grief and horror he causes." [Emphasis added.]

The failure of the second count of the complaint in the case at bar to meet the requirements of section 46 of the Restatement of Torts is at once apparent. There is no allegation that defendants knew that appellant was present and witnessed the beating that was administered to her father; nor is there any allegation that the beating was administered for the purpose of causing her to suffer emotional distress, or, in the alternative, that defendants knew that severe emotional distress was substantially certain to be produced by their conduct. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Plaintiff's proof of intent is relatively straight forward if the conduct is aimed at the plaintiff or if plaintiff can show that defendant knew that extreme emotional distress was substantially certain to follow from the conduct. Blakeley v. Shortal's Estate, 236 Iowa 787, 20 N.W.2d 28 (1945) (Shortal committed suicide by slitting his own throat in Blakely's kitchen). Generally, committing a murder or a suicide is not a tort against an eyewitness; however, it may be if the act is directed at the plaintiff or if defendant knew that extreme emotional distress was substantially certain to follow. Lourcey v. Scarlett, 146 S.W.3d 48 (Tenn. 2004) (plaintiff, while delivering mail, encountered Scarlett and his wife, who was nude from the waist up, in the middle of the road. Scarlett asked for help and then, while plaintiff was calling 911, Scarlett shot his wife, turned toward the plaintiff, and shot himself); Mahnke v. Moore, 197 Md. 61, 77 A.2d 923, 927 (1951) (overturning demurrer where child's father killed her mother with a shotgun in her presence, kept child in cottage with her mother's body for a week, then killed himself with shotgun, spattering child with his blood). Why not use "transferred intent"? See note 2, page 30.

2. As California did in the principal case, many jurisdictions continue to require that the conduct not only be intentional and outrageous, but also directed at the plaintiff or take place in the presence of the plaintiff, with the defendant's awareness. Christensen v. Superior Court of Los Angeles Cty., 54 Cal.3d 868, 2 Cal.Rptr.2d 79, 820 P.2d 181 (1991) (claim of family members for intentional infliction of emotional distress arising out of mishandling of remains of family members did not state cause of action because it did not allege that conduct was directed at family members or done in their presence); Koontz v. Keller, 52 Ohio App. 265, 3 N.E.2d 694 (1936) (recovery denied where defendant murdered plaintiff's sister and plaintiff later discovered body); Ellsworth v. Massacar, 215 Mich. 511, 184 N.W. 408 (1921) (plaintiff later discovered attack on her husband). But see Doe v. Roman Catholic Diocese of Nashville, 154 S.W.3d 22 (Tenn. 2005) (conduct need not be directed at a specific person or occur in the presence of the plaintiff).

3. The Restatement (§ 46(2)) would allow recovery if defendant knows of bystander's presence and (1) the conduct was directed at a member of bystander's immediate family or (2) bystander suffers bodily harm as a result of her distress. Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210, 13 S.W. 59 (1890) (defendant inflicted a bloody battery upon two people in the presence of a pregnant woman who suffered a miscarriage as the result of her mental disturbance). What does it mean to be "present"? Bevan v. Fix, 42 P.3d 1013 (Wyo. 2002) (claim on behalf of young children who could hear their mother being attacked in adjacent hallway) ("sensory and contemporaneous observance of defendant's acts," does not necessarily require being able to see what is happening).

4. Some courts, however, have permitted recovery even though plaintiff was not present. Knierim v. Izzo, 22 Ill.2d 73, 174 N.E.2d 157 (1961) (defendant threatened a woman that he would murder her husband and then carried out the threat outside of her presence); Schurk v. Christensen, 80 Wash.2d 652, 497 P.2d 937 (1972) (mother of five-year-old permitted to recover against teenage babysitter who molested child). In R.D. v. W.H., 875 P.2d 26 (Wyo. 1994), the husband and minor child of decedent sued her stepfather for events leading to her death by suicide. Plaintiffs alleged that the stepfather had sexually abused the decedent, provided her with a firearm with which she attempted suicide, and then provided her with prescription narcotics with which she killed herself. Although emphasizing that the generally better practice is to limit recovery to plaintiffs who were present during the outrageous conduct, the court recognized a narrow exception for this case.

5. How far should these narrow exceptions go? Should there be a cause of action on behalf of those who witness the assassination of the president? For those who saw it live on television? For those who saw it replayed a few minutes later? The next day? On the first anniversary?

6. The classic articles on the infliction of mental distress are Magruder, Mental and Emotional Distress in the Law of Torts, 49 Harv.L.Rev. 1033 (1936); Prosser, Insult and Outrage, 44 Cal.L.Rev. 40 (1956); Wade, Tort Liability for Abusive and Insulting Language, 4 Vand.L.Rev. 63 (1950); Partlett, Tort Liability and the American Way: Reflections on Liability for Emotional Distress, Am.J. Comp.L. 601 (1997); and Kircher, The Four Faces of Tort Law: Liability for Emotional Harm, 90 Marq. L. Rev. 789 (2007) (including an appendix with case law from all fifty-one jurisdictions).

6. TRESPASS TO LAND

Dougherty v. Stepp

Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1835.
18 N.C. 371.

This was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, tried at Buncombe on the last Circuit, before his Honor Judge Martin. The only proof introduced by the plaintiff to establish an act of trespass, was, that the defendant had entered on the unenclosed land of the plaintiff, with a surveyor and chain carriers, and actually surveyed a part of it, claiming it as his own, but without marking trees or cutting bushes. This, his Honor held not to be a trespass, and the jury under his instructions, found a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed. * * *

RUFFIN, CHIEF JUSTICE. In the opinion of the Court, there is error in the instructions given to the jury. The amount of damages may depend on the acts done on the land, and the extent of injury to it therefrom. But it is an elementary principle, that every unauthorized, and therefore unlawful entry, into the close of another, is a trespass. From every such entry against the will of the possessor, the law infers some damage; if nothing more, the treading down the grass or herbage, or as here, the shrubbery.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. We are here concerned only with intentional trespass to land. There may be negligent entry onto land, but it is governed by the ordinary rules applicable to negligence actions. One of these is that when the entry upon the land is merely negligent, proof of some actual damage is essential to the cause of action. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 165. Thus, the word "trespass" may be used to describe the kind of interest that defendant has invaded but usually is reserved for an intentional invasion of that interest—the right to exclusive possession of land.

2. The trespass is intentional even when the defendant enters the land in the honest and reasonable belief that it is his own. See Glade v. Dietert, 156 Tex. 382,

CHAPTER III

PRIVILEGES

1. CONSENT

O'Brien v. Cunard S.S. Co.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1891.
154 Mass. 272, 28 N.E. 266.

Tort, for an assault, and for negligently vaccinating the plaintiff, who was a steerage passenger on the defendant's steamship. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff brings exceptions. [Plaintiff alleged that she suffered ulceration at the site and blistering all over her body due either to contamination of the vaccine or of the vaccination site. There was conflicting medical expert testimony as to the cause of her injuries.]

KNOWLTON, J. * * * To sustain the first count, which was for an alleged assault, the plaintiff relied on the fact that the surgeon who was employed by the defendant vaccinated her on ship-board, while she was on her passage from Queenstown to Boston. On this branch of the case the question is whether there was any evidence that the surgeon used force upon the plaintiff against her will. In determining whether the act was lawful or unlawful, the surgeon's conduct must be considered in connection with the surrounding circumstances. If the plaintiff's behavior was such as to indicate consent on her part, he was justified in his act, whatever her unexpressed feelings may have been. In determining whether she consented, he could be guided only by her overt acts and the manifestations of her feelings. [Cc] It is undisputed that at Boston there are strict quarantine regulations in regard to the examination of emigrants, to see that they are protected from small-pox by vaccination, and that only those persons who hold a certificate from the medical officer of the steam-ship, stating that they are so protected, are permitted to land without detention in quarantine, or vaccination by the port physician. It appears that the defendant is accustomed to have its surgeons vaccinate all emigrants who desire it, and who are not protected by previous vaccination, and give them a certificate which is accepted at quarantine as evidence of their protection. Notices of the regulations at quarantine, and of the willingness of the ship's medical officer to vaccinate such as needed vaccination, were posted about the ship in various languages, and on the day when the operation was performed the surgeon had a right to presume that she and the other women who were vaccinated understood the importance and purpose of vaccination for those who bore no marks to show that they were protected. By the plaintiff's testimony, which, in this particular, is undisputed, it appears that about 200 women passengers were assembled below, and she understood from conversation with them that they were to be vaccinated; that she stood about 15 feet from the surgeon, and saw them form in a line, and pass in turn before him; that he "examined their arms, and, passing some of them by, proceeded to vaccinate those that had no mark;" that she did not hear him say anything to any of them; that upon being passed by they each received a card, and went on deck; that when her turn came she showed him her arm; he looked at it, and said there was no mark, and that she should be vaccinated; that she told him she had been vaccinated before, and it left no mark; "that he then said nothing; that he should vaccinate her again;" that she held up her arm to be vaccinated; that no one touched her; that she did not tell him she did not want to be vaccinated; and that she took the ticket which he gave her, certifying that he had vaccinated her, and used it at quarantine. She was one of a large number of women who were vaccinated on that occasion, without, so far as appears, a word of objection from any of them. They all indicated by their conduct that they desired to avail themselves of the provisions made for their benefit. There was nothing in the conduct of the plaintiff to indicate to the surgeon that she did not wish to obtain a card which would save her from detention at quarantine, and to be vaccinated, if necessary, for that purpose. Viewing his conduct in the light of the surrounding circumstances, it was lawful; and there was no evidence tending to show that it was not. The ruling of the court on this part of the case was correct. * * *

Exceptions overruled.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. With the principal case, contrast Mulloy v. Hop Sang, 1 W.W.R. 714 (Alberta C.A.) (1935) (appellate court does not accept that consent was given to medical procedure when patient with limited English did not reply or make objections to surgeon's statement that he would do what was necessary after administering anesthesia).

2. Suppose that in the course of an argument defendant announces that he is going to punch plaintiff in the nose. Plaintiff stands his ground but says and does nothing, and defendant punches him. Is there consent?

3. On a park bench in the moonlight, a young man informs his fiancée that he is going to kiss her. She says and does nothing, and he kisses her. Is he liable for battery? What if it's their first date? What if he is a stranger who has just sat down next to her when he makes his announcement?

Hackbart v. Cincinnati Bengals, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit, 1979.
601 F.2d 516, cert. denied, 444 U.S. 931, 100 S.Ct. 275, 62 L.Ed.2d 188 (1979).

WILLIAM E. DOYLE, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The question in this case is whether in a regular season professional football game an injury which is inflicted by one professional football player on an opposing player can give rise to liability in tort where the injury was inflicted by the intentional striking of a blow during the game.

The injury occurred in the course of a game between the Denver Broncos and the Cincinnati Bengals, which game was being played in Denver in 1973. The Broncos' defensive back, Dale Hackbart, was the recipient of the injury and the Bengals' offensive back, Charles ''Booby'' Clark, inflicted the blow which produced it. * * *

The trial court's finding was that Charles Clark, ''acting out of anger and frustration, but without a specific intent to injure * * * stepped forward and struck a blow with his right forearm to the back of the kneeling plaintiff's head and neck with sufficient force to cause both players to fall forward to the ground.'' Both players, without complaining to the officials or to one another, returned to their respective sidelines since the ball had changed hands and the offensive and defensive teams of each had been substituted. Clark testified at trial that his frustration was brought about by the fact that his team was losing the game. * * *

Despite the fact that the defendant Charles Clark admitted that the blow which had been struck was not accidental, that it was intentionally administered, the trial court ruled as a matter of law that the game of professional football is basically a business which is violent in nature, and that the available sanctions are imposition of penalties and expulsion from the game. Notice was taken of the fact that many fouls are overlooked; that the game is played in an emotional and noisy environment; and that incidents such as that here complained of are not unusual. * * *

Indeed, the evidence shows that there are rules of the game which prohibit the intentional striking of blows. Thus, Article 1, Item 1, Subsection C, provides that: ''All players are prohibited from striking on the head, face or neck with the heel, back or side of the hand, wrist, forearm, elbow or clasped hands.'' Thus the very conduct which was present here is expressly prohibited by the rule which is quoted above.

The general customs of football do not approve the intentional punching or striking of others. That this is prohibited was supported by the testimony of all of the witnesses. They testified that the intentional striking of a player in the face or from the rear is prohibited by the playing rules as well as the general customs of the game. Punching or hitting with the arms is prohibited. Undoubtedly these restraints are intended to establish reasonable boundaries so that one football player cannot intentionally inflict a serious injury on another. Therefore, the notion is not correct that all reason has been abandoned, whereby the only possible remedy for the person who has been the victim of an unlawful blow is retaliation. * * *

In sum, having concluded that the trial court did not limit the case to a trial of the evidence bearing on defendant's liability but rather determined that as a matter of social policy the game was so violent and unlawful that valid lines could not be drawn, we take the view that this was not a proper issue for determination and that plaintiff was entitled to have the case tried on an assessment of his rights and whether they had been violated. * * *

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What about one player clipping another in a football game? In order to recover, plaintiff must show that the act was intentional, not just that it violated the game's safety rules. See Gauvin v. Clark, 404 Mass. 450, 537 N.E.2d 94 (1989) (jury found college hockey player did not act willfully in striking other player in abdomen). Greer v. Davis, 921 S.W.2d 325 (Tex.App.1996) (question for jury whether base runner acted intentionally or merely negligently in colliding with catcher rather than sliding or stepping out of baseline to avoid the tag).

2. Plaintiff and defendant were opposing players in a family softball game. Defendant, sliding into second base, knocked the plaintiff down and broke two bones in his ankle. Is there liability? Tavernier v. Maes, 242 Cal.App.2d 532, 51 Cal.Rptr. 575 (1966). What other facts do you want to know about the game to decide if the plaintiff consented to the contact? Would it make a difference if the conduct occurred while players were warming up rather than during the game? Cf. Savino v. Robertson, 273 Ill.App.3d 811, 210 Ill.Dec. 264, 652 N.E.2d 1240 (1995) (no difference).

3. What about a course of rough-house practical joking between the parties in the past? Wartman v. Swindell, 54 N.J.L. 589, 25 A. 356 (1892).

4. Defendant taps plaintiff on the shoulder to attract his attention for a reasonable purpose. May consent be assumed? Wiffin v. Kincard, 2 Bos. & P.N.R. 471, 127 Eng.Rep. 713 (1807); Coward v. Baddeley, 4 Hurl. & N. 478, 157 Eng.Rep. 927 (1859); Wallace v. Rosen, 765 N.E.2d 192 (Ind. App. 2002), page 31. Is this a battery, to begin with?

5. Local custom permits the public to take fish from small lakes and ponds. Defendant passes over plaintiff's property to reach such a lake. Consent? See Marsh v. Colby, 39 Mich. 626 (1878).

Mohr v. Williams

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1905.
95 Minn. 261, 104 N.W. 12.

[Plaintiff consulted defendant, an ear specialist, concerning trouble with her right ear. On examining her, he found a diseased condition of the right ear, and she consented to an operation upon it. When she was unconscious under the anaesthetic, defendant concluded that the condition of the right ear was not serious enough to require an operation; but he found a more serious condition of the left ear, which he decided required an operation. Without reviving the plaintiff to ask her permission, he operated on the left ear. The operation was skillfully performed, and was successful. Plaintiff nevertheless brought an action for battery. In the court below the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $14,322.50. The trial judge denied defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, but granted a new trial on the ground that the damages were excessive. Both parties appeal.]

BROWN, J. * * * The evidence tends to show that, upon the first examination of plaintiff, defendant pronounced the left ear in good condition, and that, at the time plaintiff repaired to the hospital to submit to the operation on her right ear, she was under the impression that no difficulty existed as to the left. In fact, she testified that she had not previously experienced any trouble with that organ. It cannot be doubted that ordinarily the patient must be consulted, and his consent given, before a physician may operate upon him. * * *

The physician impliedly contracts that he possesses, and will exercise in the treatment of patients, skill and learning, and that he will exercise reasonable care and exert his best judgment to bring about favorable results. The methods of treatment are committed almost exclusively to his judgment, but we are aware of no rule or principle of law which would extend to him free license respecting surgical operations. Reasonable latitude must, however, be allowed the physician in a particular case; and we would not lay down any rule which would unreasonably interfere with the exercise of his discretion, or prevent him from taking such measures as his judgment dictated for the welfare of the patient in a case of emergency. If a person should be injured to the extent of rendering him unconscious, and his injuries were of such a nature as to require prompt surgical attention, a physician called to attend him would be justified in applying such medical or surgical treatment as might reasonably be necessary for the preservation of his life or limb, and consent on the part of the injured person would be implied. And again, if, in the course of an operation to which the patient consented, the physician should discover conditions not anticipated before the operation was commenced, and which, if not removed, would endanger the life or health of the patient, he would, though no express consent was obtained or given, be justified in extending the operation to remove and overcome them. But such is not the case at bar. The diseased condition of plaintiff's left ear was not discovered in the course of an operation on the right, which was authorized, but upon an independent examination of that organ, made after the authorized operation was found unnecessary. Nor is the evidence such as to justify the court in holding, as a matter of law, that it was such an affection as would result immediately in the serious injury of plaintiff, or such an emergency as to justify proceeding without her consent. She had experienced no particular difficulty with that ear, and the questions as to when its diseased condition would become alarming or fatal, and whether there was an immediate necessity for an operation, were, under the evidence, question of fact for the jury.

The contention of defendant that the operation was consented to by plaintiff is not sustained by the evidence. At least, the evidence was such as to take the question to the jury. This contention is based upon the fact that she was represented on the occasion in question by her family physician; that the condition of her left ear was made known to him, and the propriety of an operation thereon suggested, to which he made no objection. It is urged that by his conduct he assented to it, and that plaintiff was bound thereby. It is not claimed that he gave his express consent. It is not disputed but that the family physician of plaintiff was present on the occasion of the operation, and at her request. But the purpose of his presence was not that he might participate in the operation, nor does it appear that he was authorized to consent to any change in the one originally proposed to be made. Plaintiff was naturally nervous and fearful of the consequences of being placed under the influence of anaesthetics, and the presence of her family physician was requested under the impression that it would allay and calm her fears. The evidence made the question one of fact for the jury to determine.

The last contention of defendant is that the act complained of did not amount to an assault and battery. This is based upon the theory that, as plaintiff's left ear was in fact diseased, in a condition dangerous and threatening to her health, the operation was necessary, and having been skillfully performed at a time when plaintiff had requested a like operation on the other ear, the charge of assault and battery cannot be sustained; that, in view of these conditions, and the claim that there was no negligence on the part of defendant, and an entire absence of any evidence tending to show an evil intent, the court should say, as a matter of law, that no assault and battery was committed, even though she did not consent to the operation. In other words, that the absence of a showing that defendant was actuated by a wrongful intent, or guilty of negligence, relieves the act of defendant from the charge of an unlawful assault and battery. We are unable to reach that conclusion, though the contention is not without merit. It would seem to follow from what has been said on the other features of the case that the act of defendant amounted at least to a technical assault and battery. If the operation was performed without plaintiff's consent, and the circumstances were not such as to justify its performance without, it was wrongful; and, if it was wrongful, it was unlawful. As remarked in 1 Jaggard on Torts, 437, every person has a right to complete immunity of his person from physical interference of others, except in so far as contact may be necessary under the general doctrine of privilege; and any unlawful or unauthorized touching of the person of another, except it be in the spirit of pleasantry, constitutes an assault and battery. In the case at bar, as we have already seen, the question whether defendant's act in performing the operation upon plaintiff was authorized was a question for the jury to determine. If it was unauthorized, then it was, within what we have said, unlawful. It was a violent assault, not a mere pleasantry; and, even though no negligence is shown, it was wrongful and unlawful. The case is unlike a criminal prosecution for assault and battery, for there an unlawful intent must be shown. But that rule does not apply to a civil action, to maintain which it is sufficient to show that the assault complained of was wrongful and unlawful or the result of negligence. [C]

The amount of plaintiff's recovery, if she is entitled to recover at all, must depend upon the character and extent of the injury inflicted upon her, in determining which the nature of the malady intended to be healed and the beneficial nature of the operation should be taken into consideration, as well as the good faith of the defendant.

Order affirmed.

[Reference to the records of the District Court of Ramsey County, Minnesota, discloses that on the second trial the plaintiff received a verdict and judgment for $39. There was no appeal.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why did plaintiff's attorney sue under a theory of battery instead of ordinary negligent medical malpractice? Should there be recovery if defendant used all reasonable care in the operation? Cf. Rogers v. Board of Road Commissioners, page 72.

2. Plaintiff, a boy 15 years of age, was run over by a train and his foot was crushed. When he arrived at the hospital he was unconscious and bleeding. Defendant, the house surgeon, concluded that immediate amputation of the foot was necessary to save the boy's life. Finding no relatives present, he performed the operation. Is he liable? Why? Luka v. Lowrie, 171 Mich. 122, 136 N.W. 1106 (1912).

3. What if the plaintiff had remained conscious, and had insisted on prohibiting the operation, saying that he would rather die than lose his foot? See Mulloy v. Hop Sang, 1 W.W.R. 714 (Alberta C.A.) (1935) (automobile accident victim arrived at hospital asking that his badly injured hand be treated but not amputated). Construction worker, believing that he saw "666, the sign of the devil" on his hand cut it off with a power saw. His co-workers rushed him and his severed hand, packed in ice, to the hospital. A hand surgeon was standing by ready to attempt to reattach it. Patient refused permission, saying it was against his religion. What should surgeon do? See "Man Who Lost Hand Loses Lawsuit," The Richmond Times Dispatch, Sept. 14, 1997 at C4.

4. Medical care providers may act in the absence of express consent if (1) the patient is unable to give consent (unconscious, intoxicated, mentally ill, incompetent); (2) there is a risk of serious bodily harm if treatment is delayed; (3) a reasonable person would consent to treatment under the circumstances; and (4) the physician has no reason to believe this patient would refuse treatment under the circumstances. See, e.g., Kozup v. Georgetown U. Hosp., 851 F.2d 437 (D.C.Cir. 1988) (parents' consent to baby's transfusion was not implied simply because it was necessary to save baby's life where there was no showing that there was no time to seek consent); Stewart–Graves v. Vaughn, 162 Wash.2d 115, 170 P.3d 1151 (2007) (father's consent implied as a matter of law even though he was in nearby waiting room because there was no meaningful opportunity for a deliberate, informed decision concerning treatment where failure to treat would have meant certain and immediate death of newborn).

5. The principal case has been regarded for years as the leading case on unauthorized operations. It is still sound law. Most surgery is performed in hospitals, which have their own rules and standardized practices, including consent forms. In many cases, it has been found that the consent is sufficiently general in its terms to justify the physician in doing whatever the physician believes necessary in the course of the operation. See for example Rothe v. Hull, 352 Mo. 926, 180 S.W.2d 7 (1944); Baxter v. Snow, 78 Utah 217, 2 P.2d 257 (1931). Does that mean the consent should be as broadly worded as possible? What if an obstetrician who has privileges at a hospital fails to obtain consent for a blood transfusion? The obstetrician would be liable. Would the hospital? Ward v. Lutheran Hospitals & Homes Soc. of Am., Inc., 963 P.2d 1031 (Alaska 1998) (noting that overwhelming weight of authority holds that hospital does not owe duty to patient to obtain consent for treatment when patient is under care of independent physician).

6. What if the plaintiff specifically insists that the procedure shall go thus far, and no further? For example, she consents to an incision and an examination of her stomach under ether, but expressly forbids anything more. If the surgeon goes ahead and removes a tumor found there, is he liable? Schloendorff v. Society of New York Hospital, 211 N.Y. 125, 105 N.E. 92 (1914). What if patient limits her consent to female health care providers, explaining that her religious beliefs prohibit her from being seen unclothed by a member of the opposite sex? During surgery, a male nurse sees and touches her as part of proper medical treatment. Liability for battery? Cohen v. Smith, 269 Ill.App.3d 1087, 207 Ill.Dec. 873, 648 N.E.2d 329 (1995) (violation of plaintiff's right to bodily integrity by unconsented to touching is the essence of battery). What if the consent form states anesthesia will be administered by ''a physician privileged to practice anesthesia'' and an EMT in training is permitted to do her first intubation on the patient? Mullins v. Parkview Hosp., Inc., 865 N.E.2d 608 (Ind. 2007) (battery claim stated against anesthesiologist but not student EMT who did not know that consent had not been obtained). What if patient, about to undergo an MRI, limits her consent to particular drugs—demerol and morphine—because she is concerned about an allergic reaction. The nurse gives her fentanyl. Battery? Duncan v. Scottsdale Med. Imaging Ltd., 205 Ariz. 306, 70 P.3d 435 (2003) (rejecting argument that the patient consented to the administration of pain medication and therefore the nature of the procedure was the same no matter which drug was used). What if a patient withdraws her consent during the procedure? Schreiber v. Physicians Ins. Co. of Wisconsin, 223 Wis.2d 417, 588 N.W.2d 26 (1999) (withdrawal of consent means that physician must conduct new informed consent discussion, cannot continue to rely on previously given consent); Coulter v. Thomas, 33 S.W.3d 522 (Ky. 2000) (withdrawal of consent while medical procedure in progress must be unquestionable response from clear and rational mind and it must be medically feasible for doctor to stop).

7. May a competent, informed adult refuse medical treatment that is necessary to preserve life? Thor v. Superior Court, 5 Cal.4th 725, 855 P.2d 375, 21 Cal.Rptr.2d 357 (1993) (right to refuse treatment not limited to those who are suffering from terminal conditions).

8. Brother Joseph Fox, an 83–year–old member of the Marianists, a Roman Catholic order, had previously expressed a desire not to have his life artificially prolonged by extraordinary means of treatment if there was no reasonable hope for recovery. During surgery to repair a hernia, he suffered permanent brain damage due to cardiac arrest. Was his refusal of extraordinary means of treatment (a respirator) still effective after he became incompetent? Matter of Storar, 52 N.Y.2d 363, 438 N.Y.S.2d 266, 420 N.E.2d 64, cert. denied, 454 U.S. 858 (1981). This issue is resolved in many jurisdictions by statutory provisions for ''living wills'' or ''advance directives'' that state the patient's consent and limitations on treatment.

9. When plaintiff refused to consent to a transfusion on religious grounds, the court in Application of the President and Directors of Georgetown College, 331 F.2d 1000 (D.C.Cir.1964), granted a declaratory judgment to proceed, with the judge who issued the emergency order finding that the patient felt that it would not be her responsibility if the judge ordered the transfusion. A similar request was denied in In re Osborne, 294 A.2d 372 (D.C.App.1972), where a bedside hearing disclosed that the patient would regard a transfusion under any circumstances as violative of his religious beliefs. See also Stamford Hospital v. Vega, 236 Conn. 646, 674 A.2d 821 (1996) (patient competent to make decisions entitled to refuse blood transfusion even if that decision is fatal).

10. What happens if health care personnel ignore a "do not resuscitate order"? If the patient (or his family) has a cause of action for battery, what is the measure of damages? Campbell v. Delbridge, 670 N.W.2d 108 (Iowa 2003) (plaintiff entitled to emotional distress damages for unauthorized transfusion); Anderson v. St. Francis–St. George Hospital, Inc., 77 Ohio St.3d 82, 671 N.E.2d 225 (1996) (where the battery was physically harmless, plaintiff entitled only to nominal damages, not compensatory damages for wrongful living or wrongful prolongation of life.) See also, Milani, Better Off Dead Than Disabled?: Should Courts Recognize a "Wrongful Living" Cause of Action When Doctors Fail to Honor Patients' Advance Directives?, 54 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 149 (1997).

11. In the case of a minor child, consent of the parent is necessary for any medical procedure, except in an emergency. Zoski v. Gaines, 271 Mich. 1, 260 N.W. 99 (1935) (9½ years) (tonsillectomy); Bonner v. Moran, 126 F.2d 121 (D.C.Cir.1941) (15 years) (skin graft). A minor 17 or 18 years of age, however, has been held capable of legally consenting, at least to minor procedures, Gulf & S.I.R. Co. v. Sullivan, 155 Miss. 1, 119 So. 501 (1928) (smallpox vaccination), but not to major ones, Lacey v. Laird, 166 Ohio St. 12, 139 N.E.2d 25 (1956) (nose job). Is consent from a parent necessary to prescribe contraception? The right of mature teenage females to give or withhold consent to abortions is governed by statute in most jurisdictions and the statutes, in turn, must fall within constitutional parameters.

12. When a parent refuses on religious or other grounds to allow a hospital to provide medical treatment for a child, courts are likely to grant a hospital's application to overrule the parent if the treatment is for a life threatening condition, but not if it only will improve the child's comfort or appearance. Compare In re Sampson, 29 N.Y.2d 900, 328 N.Y.S.2d 686, 278 N.E.2d 918 (1972) (approving) with In re Green, 448 Pa. 338, 292 A.2d 387 (1972) (disallowing).

13. Can parents "consent" on behalf of their child to be a donor in a transplant operation for the benefit of a sibling? See Hart v. Brown, 29 Conn.Supp. 368, 289 A.2d 386 (1972). Can a guardian consent to an incompetent's donation of an organ? See Strunk v. Strunk, 445 S.W.2d 145 (Ky.1969). Can a parent consent to a child's participation in nontherapeutic research in which there is a risk of injury or damage to the health of the child? Grimes v. Kennedy Krieger Institute, Inc., 366 Md. 29, 782 A.2d 807 (2001). Does the mother's consent to an abortion prevent the child who was injured by the failed abortion from bringing a personal injury action against the physician? Vandervelden v. Victoria, 177 Wis.2d 243, 502 N.W.2d 276 (App.1993).

De May v. Roberts

Supreme Court of Michigan, 1881.
46 Mich. 160, 9 N.W. 146.

MARTSON, C.J. The declaration in this case in the first count sets forth that the plaintiff was at a time and place named a poor married woman, and being confined in child-bed and a stranger, employed in a professional capacity defendant De May who was a physician; that defendant visited the plaintiff as such, and against her desire and intending to deceive her wrongfully, etc., introduced and caused to be present at the house and lying-in room of the plaintiff and while she was in the pains of parturition the defendant Scattergood, who intruded upon the privacy of the plaintiff, indecently, wrongfully and unlawfully laid hands upon her and assaulted her, the said Scattergood, which was well known to defendant De May, being a young unmarried man, a stranger to the plaintiff and utterly ignorant of the practice of medicine, while the plaintiff believed that he was an assistant physician, a competent and proper person to be present and to aid her in her extremity. * * *

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to prove the allegations of the declaration. On the part of the defendants evidence was given tending to prove that Scattergood very reluctantly accompanied Dr. De May at the urgent request of the latter; that the night was a dark and stormy one, the roads over which they had to travel in getting to the house of the plaintiff were so bad that a horse could not be rode or driven over them; that the doctor was sick and very much fatigued from overwork, and therefore asked the defendant Scattergood to accompany and assist him in carrying a lantern, umbrella and certain articles deemed necessary upon such occasions; that upon arriving at the house of the plaintiff the doctor knocked, and when the door was opened by the husband of the plaintiff, De May said to him "that I had fetched a friend along to help carry my things;" he, plaintiff's husband, said all right, and seemed to be perfectly satisfied. They were bid to enter, treated kindly and no objection whatever made to the presence of defendant Scattergood. That while there Scattergood, at Dr. De May's request, took hold of plaintiff's hand and held her during a paroxysm of pain, and that both of the defendants in all respects throughout acted in a proper and becoming manner actuated by a sense of duty and kindness. * * *

Dr. De May therefore took an unprofessional young unmarried man with him, introduced and permitted him to remain in the house of the plaintiff, when it was apparent that he could hear at least, if not see all that was said and done, and as the jury must have found, under the instructions given, without either the plaintiff or her husband having any knowledge or reason to believe the true character of such third party. It would be shocking to our sense of right, justice and propriety to doubt even but that for such an act the law would afford an ample remedy. To the plaintiff the occasion was a most sacred one and no one had a right to intrude unless invited or because of some real and pressing necessity which it is not pretended existed in this case. The plaintiff had a legal right to the privacy of her apartment at such a time, and the law secures to her this right by requiring others to observe it, and to abstain from its violation. The fact that at the time, she consented to the presence of Scattergood supposing him to be a physician, does not preclude her from maintaining an action and recovering substantial damages upon afterwards ascertaining his true character. In obtaining admission at such a time and under such circumstances without fully disclosing his true character, both parties were guilty of deceit, and the wrong thus done entitles the injured party to recover the damages afterwards sustained, from shame and mortification upon discovering the true character of the defendants. * * *

Judgment for plaintiff affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The court says that the plaintiff consented to Scattergood's presence ''supposing him to be a physician'' and that the defendants introduced him without ''fully disclosing his true character.'' In order for a consent to be valid, how much does defendant have to disclose? What if the plaintiff asks no questions? Under what circumstances can consent be assumed? Breast cancer patient, on a routine visit to her oncologist's office, is shown into a private examining room. Her doctor arrives, accompanied by another man, who is introduced as someone who is following his work. She says nothing. Following her doctor's instructions, she disrobes and he examines her breasts and lower abdomen in the other man's presence. As she leaves the office, she asks the receptionist who the other man is and is told he is a ''drug salesman.'' Consent? Cf. Sanchez–Scott v. Alza Pharmaceuticals, 86 Cal.App.4th 365, 103 Cal.Rptr.2d 410 (2001) (because true status of drug company representative was not disclosed to patient, no consent was implied by failure to object).

2. Defendant calls on plaintiff, a woman with an artificial leg, in her house. Representing himself to be a doctor referred by the company that made her leg, he induces her to remove her dress, expose her person, and to permit him to touch her. He is in fact a doctor, but of theology. Battery? Cf. Commonwealth v. Gregory, 132 Pa.Super. 507, 1 A.2d 501 (1938). Defendant gives plaintiff some chocolate candy, which contains an irritant poison. In ignorance of this fact, plaintiff eats the candy, and is made ill. Is there liability for a battery? Cf. Commonwealth v. Stratton, 114 Mass. 303, 19 Am.Rep. 350 (1873). Defendant represents himself to be a licensed physician, but he is not. Cf. Taylor v. Johnston, 985 P.2d 460 (Alaska 1999) (battery claim may lie if person falsely claiming to be physician touches patient, even for purpose of providing medical treatment). On the effect, in general, of fraud and mistake on consent, see Restatement (Second) of Torts § 892B.

3. Suppose that A consents to sexual intercourse with B, in ignorance of the fact that B has a sexually transmitted disease. A contracts the disease. Has she an action against B? Kathleen K. v. Robert B., 150 Cal.App.3d 992, 198 Cal.Rptr. 273 (1984). Crowell v. Crowell, 180 N.C. 516, 105 S.E. 206 (1920); cf. De Vall v. Strunk, 96 S.W.2d 245 (Tex.Civ.App.1936). A woman consents to sexual intercourse with a man only after he assured her that ''I can't possibly get anyone pregnant,'' knowing that the statement was false. She then suffers an ectopic pregnancy and must undergo surgery, which saves her life but makes her sterile. Liability? Barbara A. v. John G., 145 Cal.App.3d 369, 193 Cal.Rptr. 422 (1983). Does it make a difference if he also does not know? See McPherson v. McPherson, 712 A.2d 1043 (Me.1998) (no liability because husband who infected wife with venereal disease neither knew nor had reason to know that he was infected). A wife consents to sexual intercourse with her husband, in ignorance of the fact that he is having an affair. After learning of the affair, she sues him for battery, claiming that her consent was obtained by fraud. Liability? Neal v. Neal, 125 Idaho 617, 873 P.2d 871 (1994).

4. Law Professor agrees to appear in the dunking booth at a law school fair. She was told that the proceeds would be donated to a fund to provide debt reduction for students who embark on public interest careers but later learned that the students spent the money on a fancy graduation reception for their parents. Consent valid? Consent induced by fraud or misrepresentation as to a collateral matter, rather than fraud as to the essential character of the act itself, will not invalidate consent. See Restatement (Second) of Torts §§ 55, 57 (1965).

5. Plaintiff consents to an operation under a general anesthetic only on condition that her own physician is present during the operation. He was not present. Is the consent vitiated? Pugsley v. Privette, 220 Va. 892, 263 S.E.2d 69 (1980). What is the effect of allowing a resident physician to perform the operation under the supervision of the designated surgeon? Suppose the designated surgeon is not present at all.

6. ''Informed Consent.'' The doctrine of ''informed consent'' requires a physician or surgeon to disclose to the patient the risks of proposed medical or surgical treatment. If she does not do so, she may be liable when injury results from the treatment. In early cases, this liability was placed on the ground of battery, by analogy to De May v. Roberts, and the cases in the preceding notes. Among the cases so holding have been Bang v. Charles T. Miller Hospital, 251 Minn. 427, 88 N.W.2d 186 (1958); Gray v. Grunnagle, 423 Pa. 144, 223 A.2d 663 (1966). Around 1960, the failure to disclose the risk began to be treated as a breach of the doctor's professional duty, and hence as a matter of negligence. The cases now generally proceed on that basis. The matter is therefore treated in Chapter 4, Negligence. When the physician exceeds the boundaries of consent, the matter is still treated as battery as set forth in Mohr v. Williams.

7. Note that most of the ''consent induced by fraud'' cases involve battery. What if the underlying tort is trespass? Compare these two cases against ABC, which broadcasts PrimeTime Live. Plaintiff, an ophthalmic surgeon who owned several clinics, was approached by a producer of PrimeTime Live and told the show was doing a segment on cataract operations. The producer told plaintiff that the segment would not involve ambush interviews or undercover surveillance and would be fair and balanced. Plaintiff cooperated by permitting film crews and interviews of doctors, patients, and technicians at his clinic in Chicago. Unbeknownst to plaintiff, the producer also had dispatched seven undercover test ''patients'' equipped with concealed cameras to other clinic locations owned by plaintiff. The resulting show was very critical of the clinics. Plaintiff sued for trespass, claiming the consent given to the seven test patients with concealed cameras was induced by fraud. Liability? Desnick v. American Broadcasting Co., Inc., 44 F.3d 1345 (7th Cir.1995) (applying Illinois law) (no trespass because not an interference with the ownership or possession of land). Plaintiff, the Food Lion grocery store chain, was the target of a PrimeTime Live exposé on meat handling. Employees of ABC created false identities and applied for work at several Food Lion stores. While working for Food Lion, they filmed various activities with hidden cameras. Food Lion sued for trespass, claiming its consent to the ABC employees' presence in its deli and meatpacking departments was obtained by fraud. Food Lion, Inc. v. Capital Cities/ABC, Inc., 194 F.3d 505 (4th Cir. 1999) (applying North and South Carolina law) (jury verdict of trespass affirmed). See also Copeland v. Hubbard Broadcasting, Inc., 526 N.W.2d 402 (Minn.App.1995) (reporter posing as student interested in observing veterinarian liable in trespass to pet owners who allowed her in their home to observe). For a discussion of the invasion of privacy claims in these cases, see Chapter 18, Privacy.

8. Plaintiff is in a bar, so intoxicated that he does not know what he is doing when he agrees to ''Indian wrestle'' with defendant. Valid consent? Cf. Hollerud v. Malamis, 20 Mich.App. 748, 174 N.W.2d 626 (1969) (consent ineffective if plaintiff incapable of expressing rational will).

9. Plaintiff consented to participate in a prize fight, an illegal activity in that state. He died as a result of a blow received in the fight and his estate filed a battery claim against the other fighter who demurred on the basis of consent. Is consent to an illegal act a valid consent? Hart v. Geysel, 159 Wash. 632, 294 P. 570 (1930) (recognizing split of authority among jurisdictions as to whether consent to an illegal act is valid consent); Janelsins v. Button, 102 Md.App. 30, 648 A.2d 1039 (1994) (same). The question of when plaintiff's consent should be invalidated because defendant violated a criminal statute may depend on several considerations: (a) the policy of denying compensation to an intentional wrongdoer who himself may have committed a crime and been injured as a result of it; (b) the effect of deterring him, and others like him, by denying him recovery if he gets hurt; (c) the effect of potential liability in deterring defendant and others like him; (d) the fact that plaintiff has after all been intentionally battered by defendant; (e) the policy expressed by the maxim, In pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis [In equal guilt, the position of the defendant is the stronger]. Even states that generally recognize the validity of consent to an illegal act will not deny recovery to those whom the statute making the conduct illegal was designed to protect. For example, plaintiff, a 15–year–old girl, consents to intercourse with a 50–year–old man in a state with criminal penalties for men who have sexual relations with children that age. Most courts have held plaintiff's consent to be ineffective. See Gaither v. Meacham, 214 Ala. 343, 108 So. 2 (1926). A competent adult woman, however, cannot maintain an action for her own seduction, even if intercourse between unmarried adults is illegal in the state. See Rouse v. Creech, 203 N.C. 378, 166 S.E. 174 (1932). Defendant provides plaintiff's decedent with sleeping pills, knowing he intends to use them to commit suicide. The state's criminal law prohibits both aiding and abetting suicide and attempted suicide. Schwartz, Civil Liability for Causing Suicide: A Synthesis of Law and Psychiatry, 24 Vand.L.Rev. 217, 220–222 (1971), evaluating the factors set forth above, suggests that a claim should be allowed. Would family members of those who commit suicide using the Kevorkian suicide machine have a cause of action against Dr. Kevorkian?

2. SELF–DEFENSE

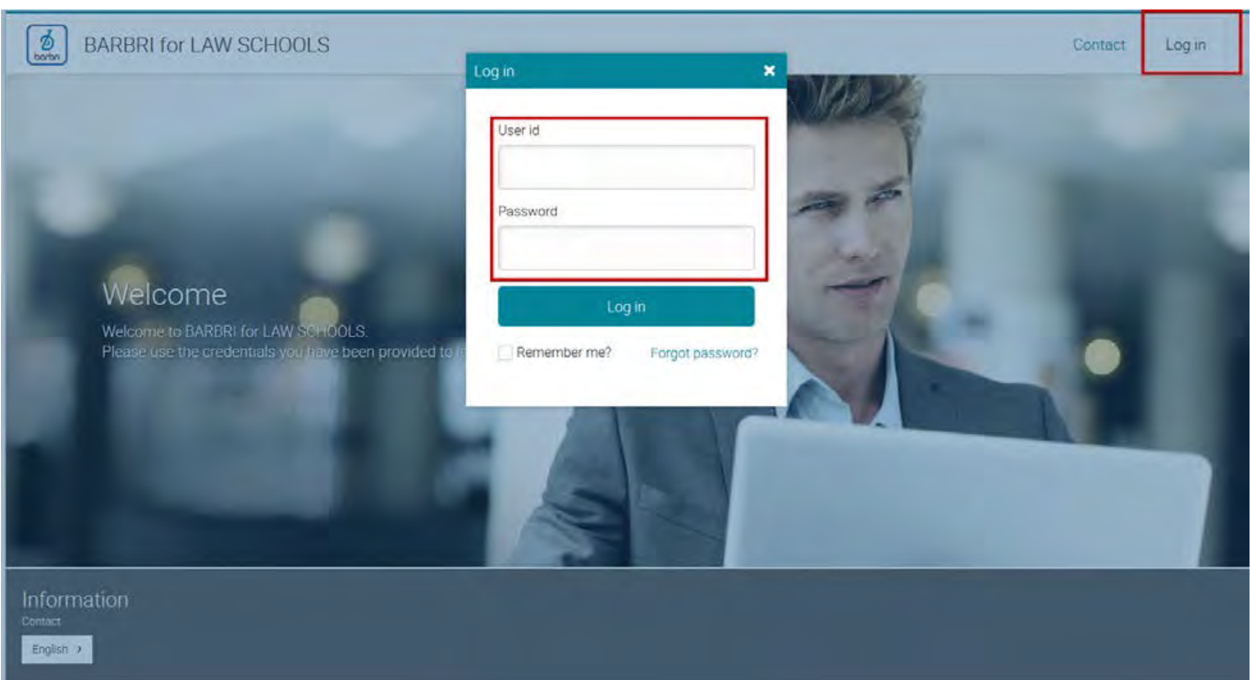
The privilege of self-defense is covered in Criminal Law, and detailed discussion must be left to that course. Cases involving tort liability are infrequent. When they arise, the criminal law rules are carried over and applied without much variation. The following brief summary will indicate how self-defense fits into the tort picture:

1. Existence of Privilege. Anyone is privileged to use reasonable force to defend himself against a threatened battery on the part of another. The recognition of this privilege came as late as about 1400, and it always has been an affirmative defense to be pleaded and proved by the defendant. In some jurisdictions, the burden of proof is reversed if the defendant is a police officer. Then, plaintiff would have to show as his prima facie battery case that the use of force was unreasonable (and thus not privileged). See, for example, Edson v. City of Anaheim, 63 Cal.App.4th 1269, 74 Cal.Rptr.2d 614 (1998) (collecting cases from other jurisdictions). The trial court judge will make the initial determination whether a self-defense instruction is warranted by the facts. See, for example, Goldfuss v. Davidson, 79 Ohio St.3d 116, 679 N.E.2d 1099 (1997) in which the Supreme Court of Ohio approved the trial court judge's refusal to give a jury instruction on self-defense where defendant shot from his kitchen window at two men who had broken in to his pole barn. Defendant and his family were inside the house with all the doors locked, the police had been called, the pole barn

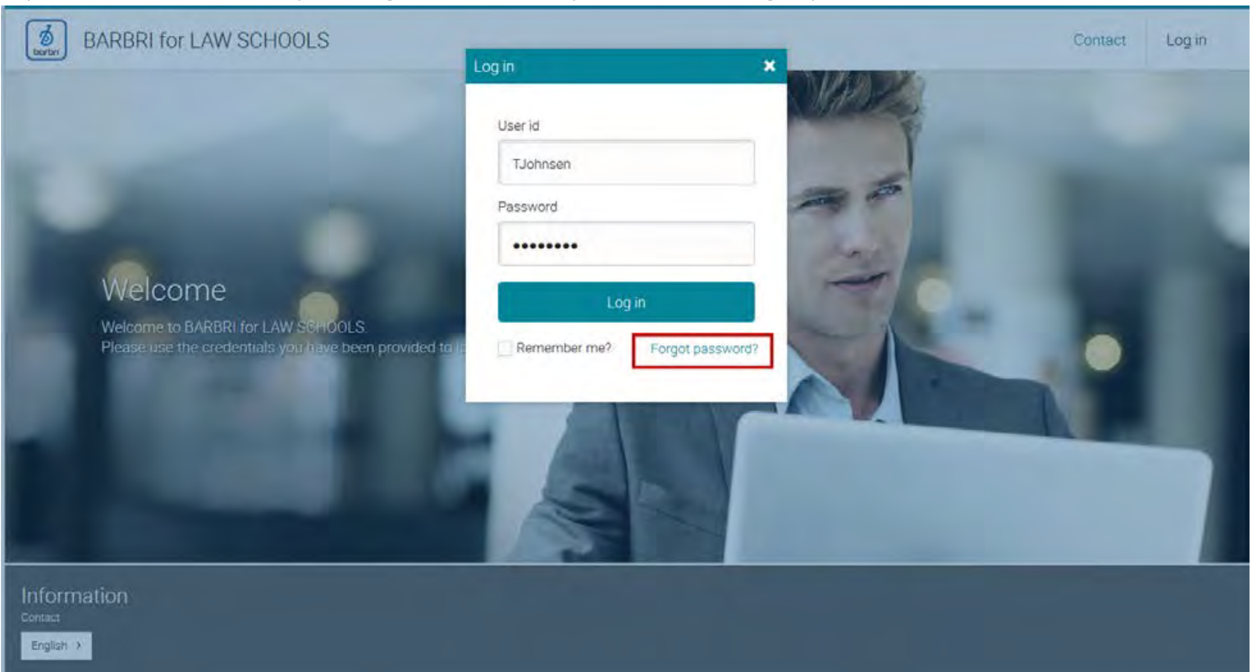
Matrix Instructions For Students

To log in to the BARBRI Matrix Page go to https://barbri.matrixlms.com

Once you are on the website, please click “Log in” on the upper right hand corner and type in your User ID and Password and click “Log in.”

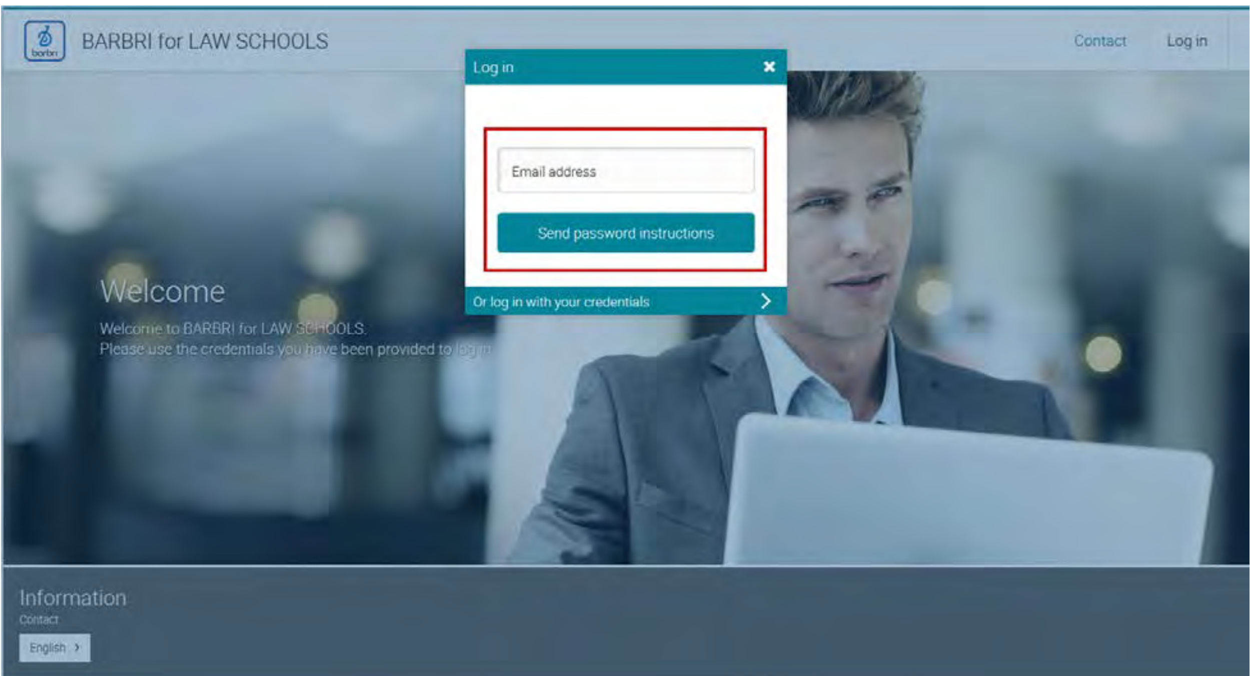


If you have not received your Log in credentials pleaes click “Forgot password.”

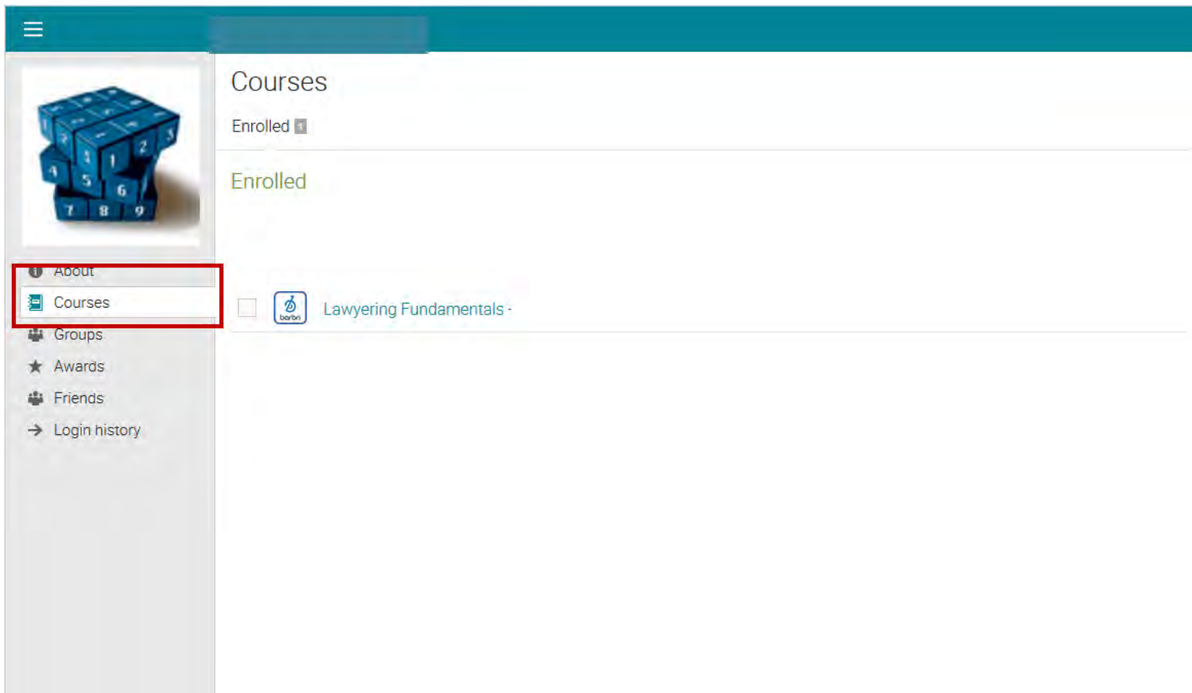


Enter your email address. Click "Send password instructions." You will then receive an email with your log in crententials.

Please Note: Your registratioin email address has been provided by your school. If you need help with the email address provided, please e-mail IPLearningTeam@barbri.com and your Professor.

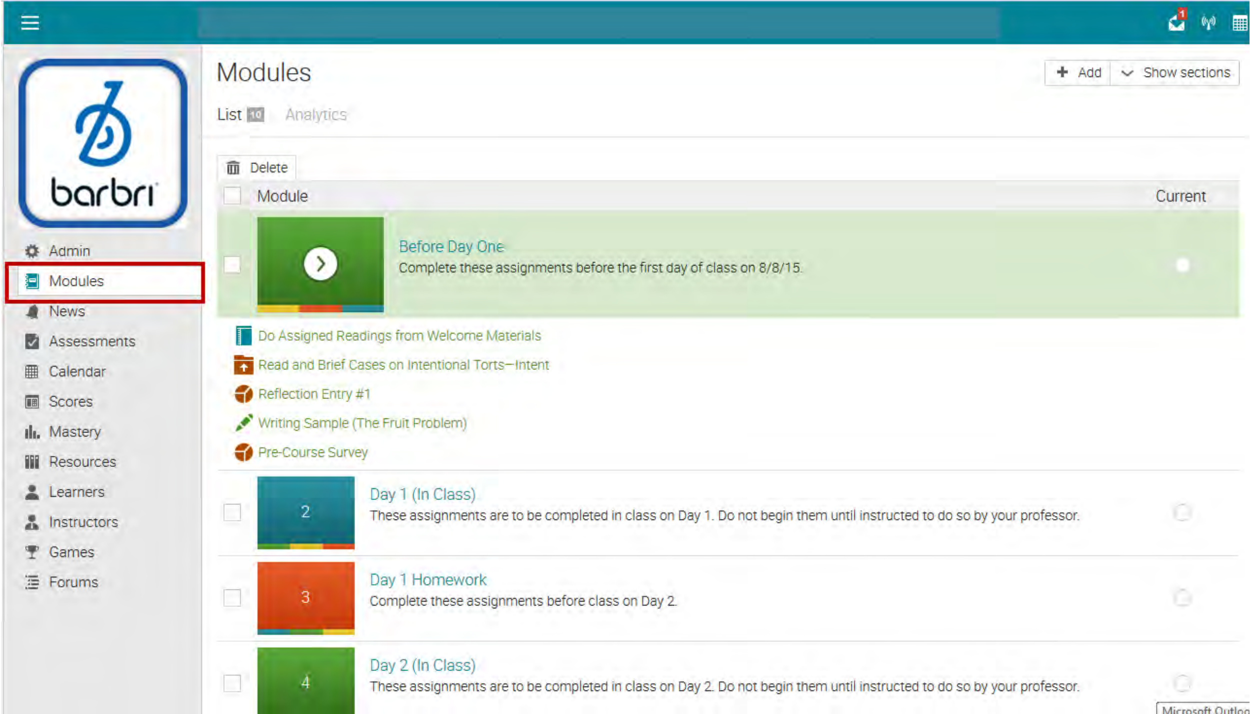


Once you are logged on to Matrix, select "Courses" and then select "Lawyering Fundamentals."

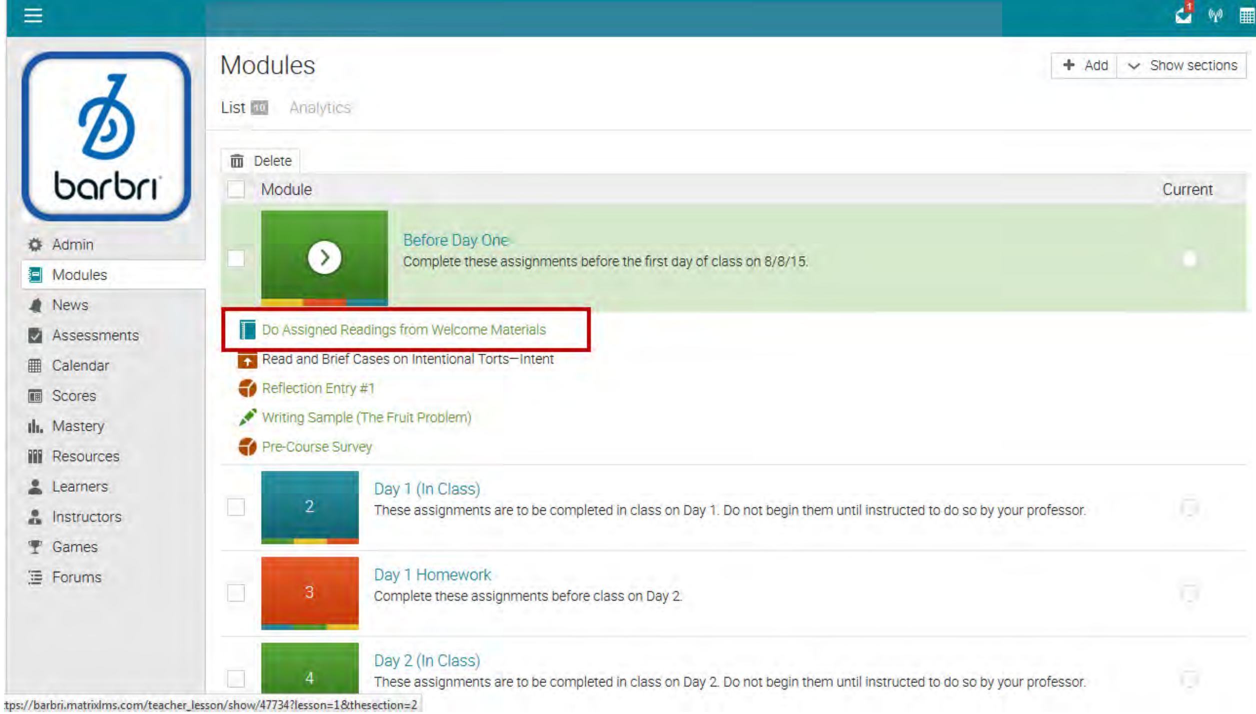


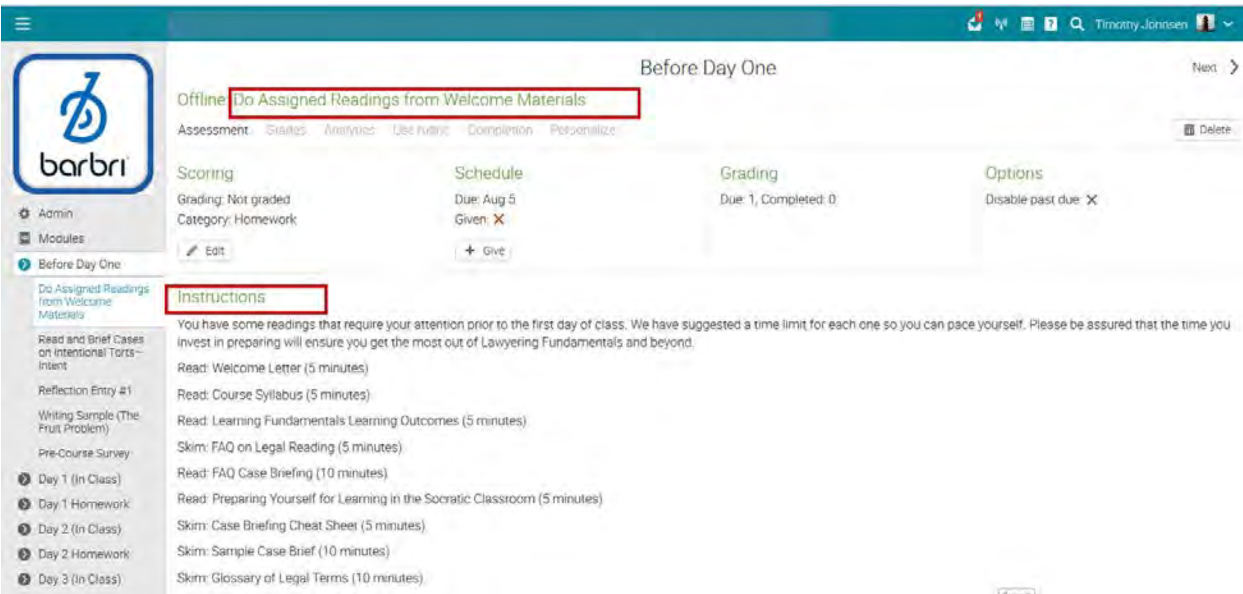
Matrix Instructions For Students

Once you are in the course, click on "Modules." This will show you a list of the assignments you need to complete before each day and during class each day. Please refer to your syllabus for more information on assignment due dates.

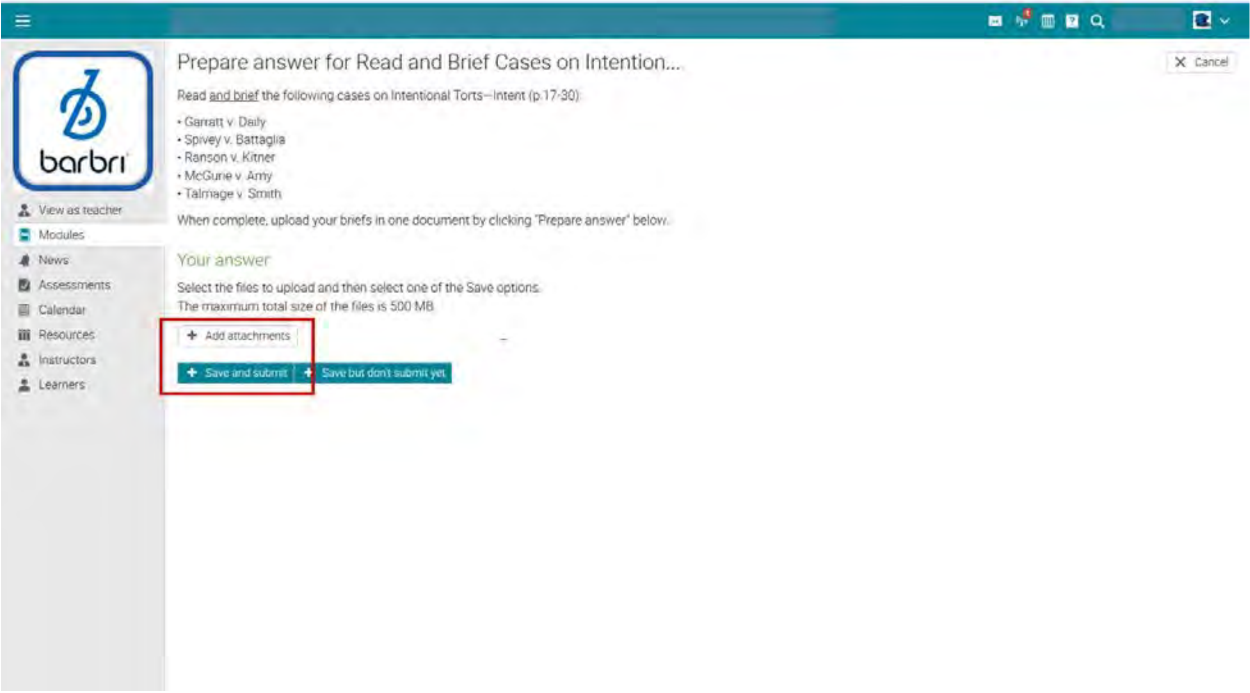


Some assignments require you to answer questions online; other assignments ask for you to upload a document. To see the details of a particular assignment, click on its name and information will appear





If a brown folder appears next to the assignment, you will need to upload a document. To upload a document, click on the assignment, select the “Prepare Answer” button, browse your computer and submit the assignment. Step by Step screen shots below.



Prepare answer f

Upload file

Local

Add Source

Drop file here, or click to browse

Read and brief the following

- Garratt v. Daily
- Spivey v. Battaglia
- Ranson v. Kitner
- McGurie v. Amy
- Talmage v. Smith

When complete, upload you

Your answer

Select the files to upload and

The maximum total size of the files is 500 MB

+ Add attachments

+ Save and submit | + Save but don't submit yet

Cancel

View as teacher
Modules
News
Assessments
Calendar
Resources
Instructors
Learners

Before Day One

Next

Dropbox: Read and Brief Cases on Intentional Torts—Intent

Assessment

Scoring	Your submission	Teacher comment
Category: Homework	Attempts: 0
Due: Aug 5	Max. attempts: 3
	Allow late submissions: ✓

Instructions

Read and brief the following cases on Intentional Torts—Intent (p.17-30):

- Garratt v. Daily
- Spivey v. Battaglia
- Ranson v. Kitner
- McGurie v. Amy
- Talmage v. Smith

When complete, upload your briefs in one document by clicking "Prepare answer" below.

+ Prepare answer

View as teacher
Modules
Before Day One
Read and Brief Cases on Intentional Torts—Intent Writing Sample (The Fruit Problem)
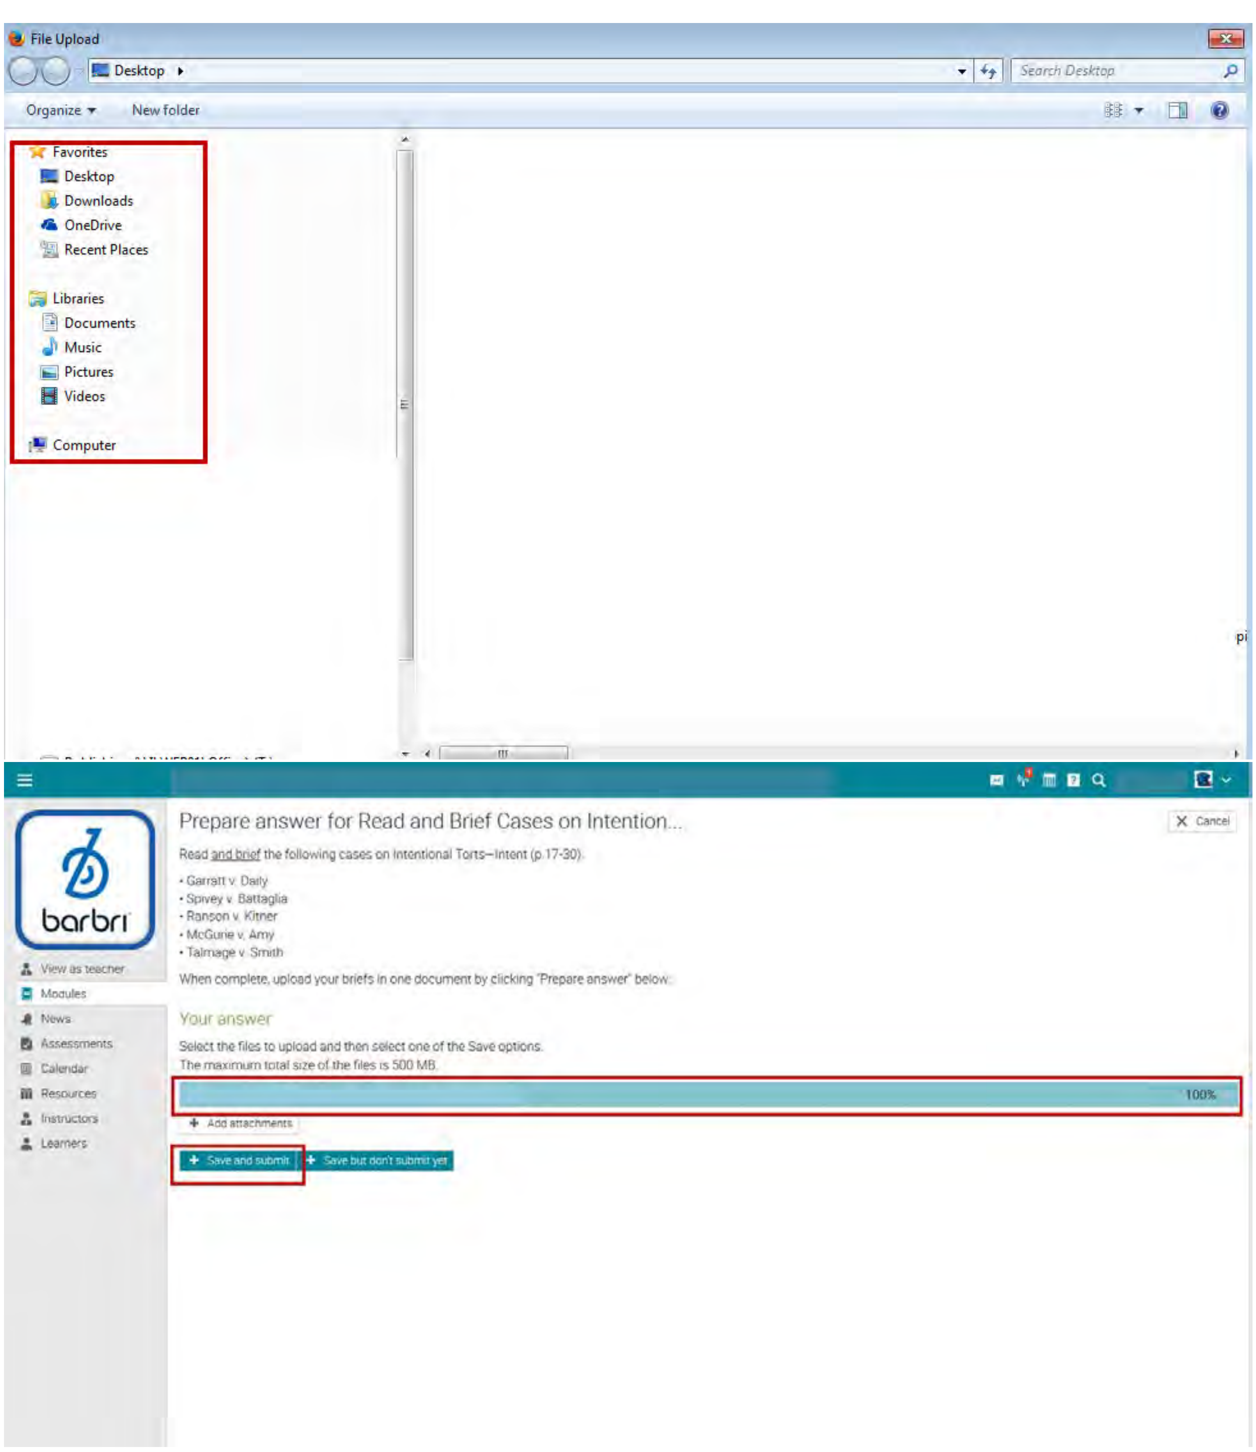
Day 1 (In Class)
Day 1 Homework
Day 2 (In Class)
Day 2 Homework
Day 3 (In Class)
Homework Day 3
Day 4 (In Class)
Homework Day 4
News
Assessments
Calendar
Resources
Instructors
Learners



File Upload
Desktop
Search Desktop Organize
New folder
Favorites
Desktop
Downloads
OneDrive
Recent Places
Libraries
Documents
Music
Pictures Videos
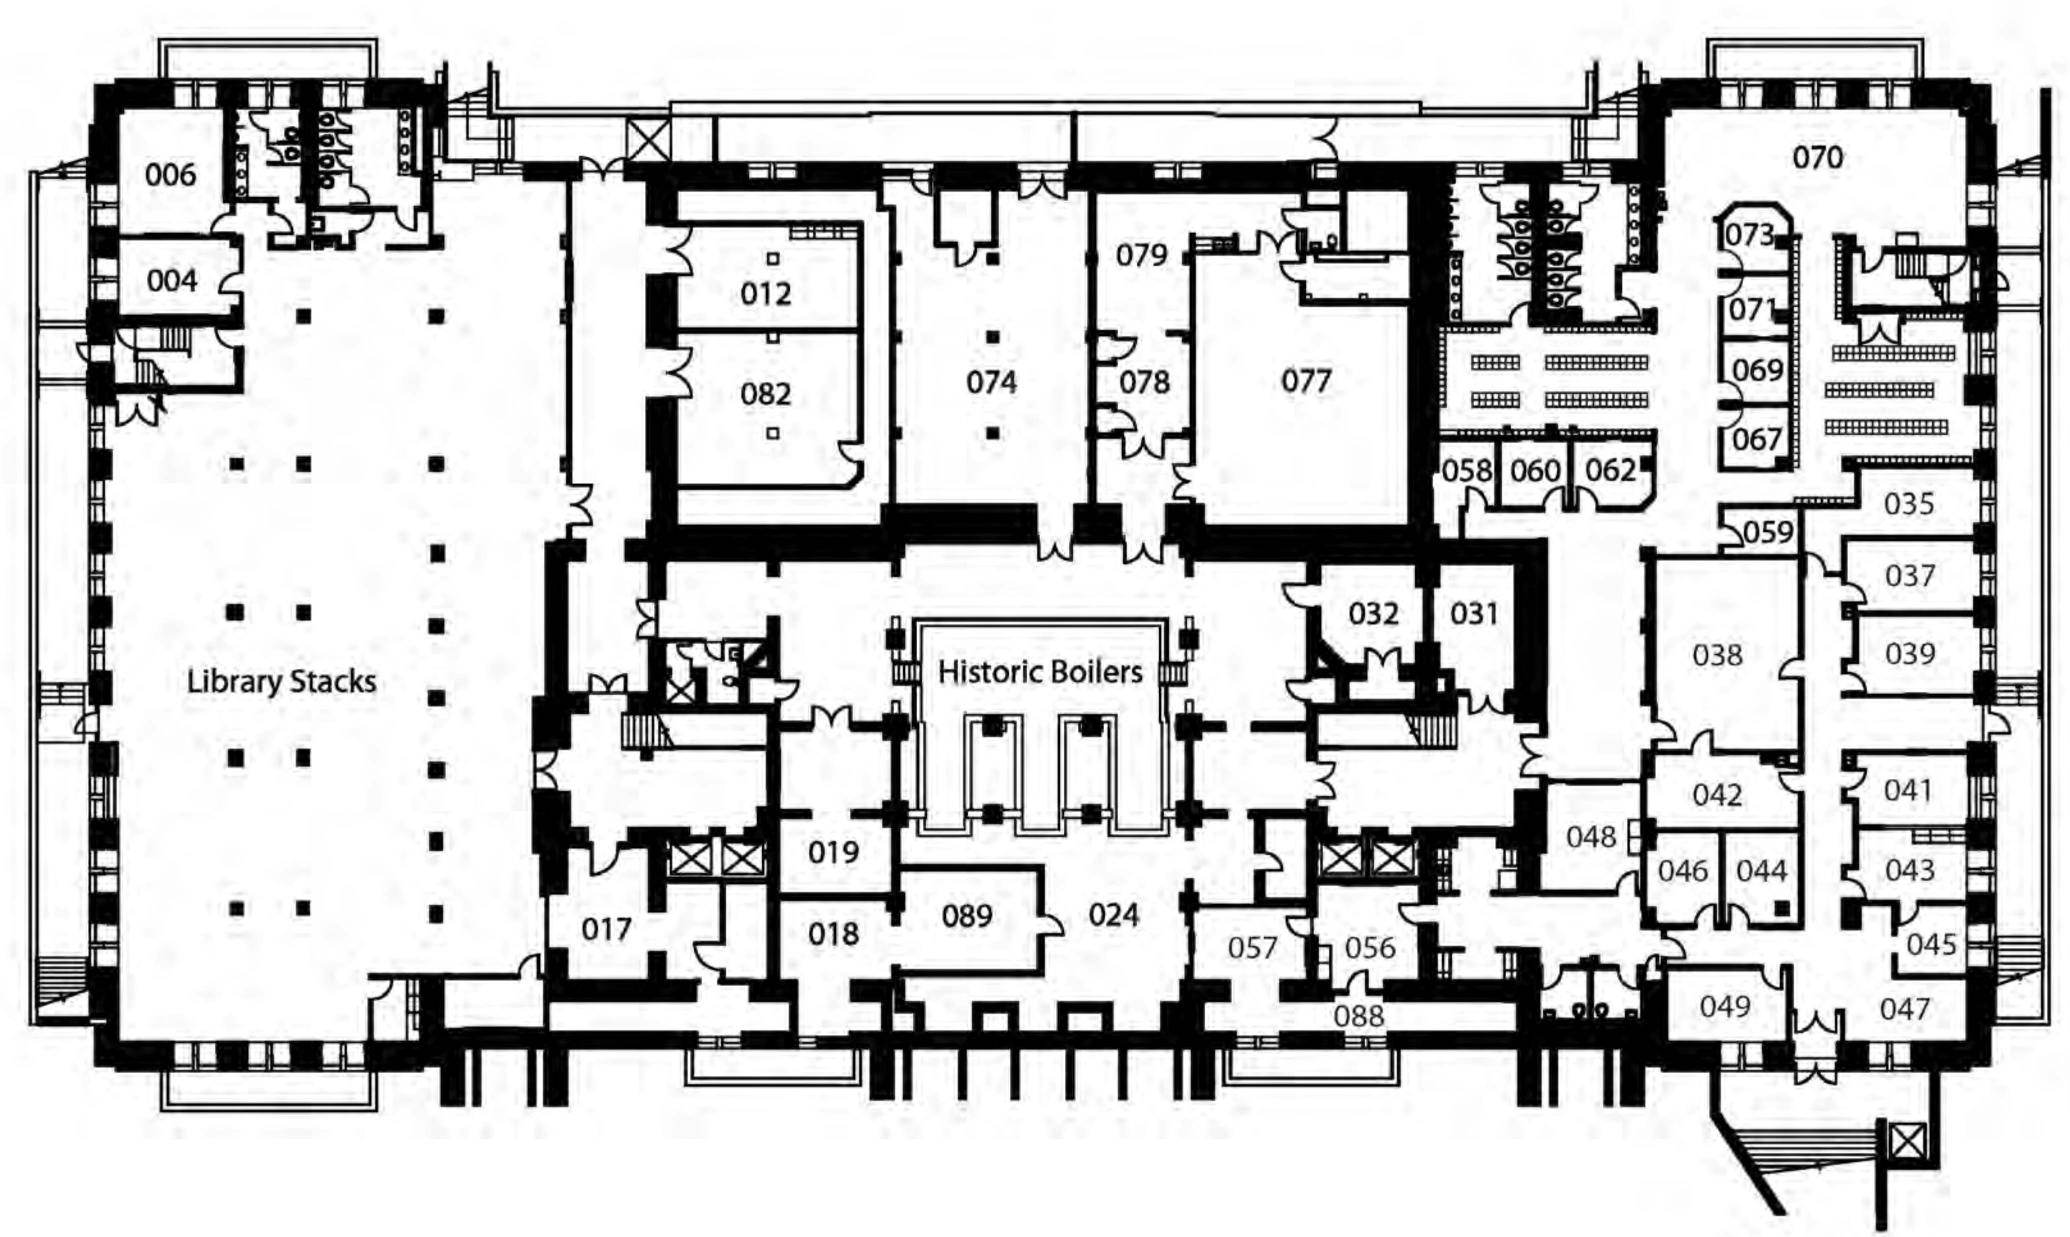
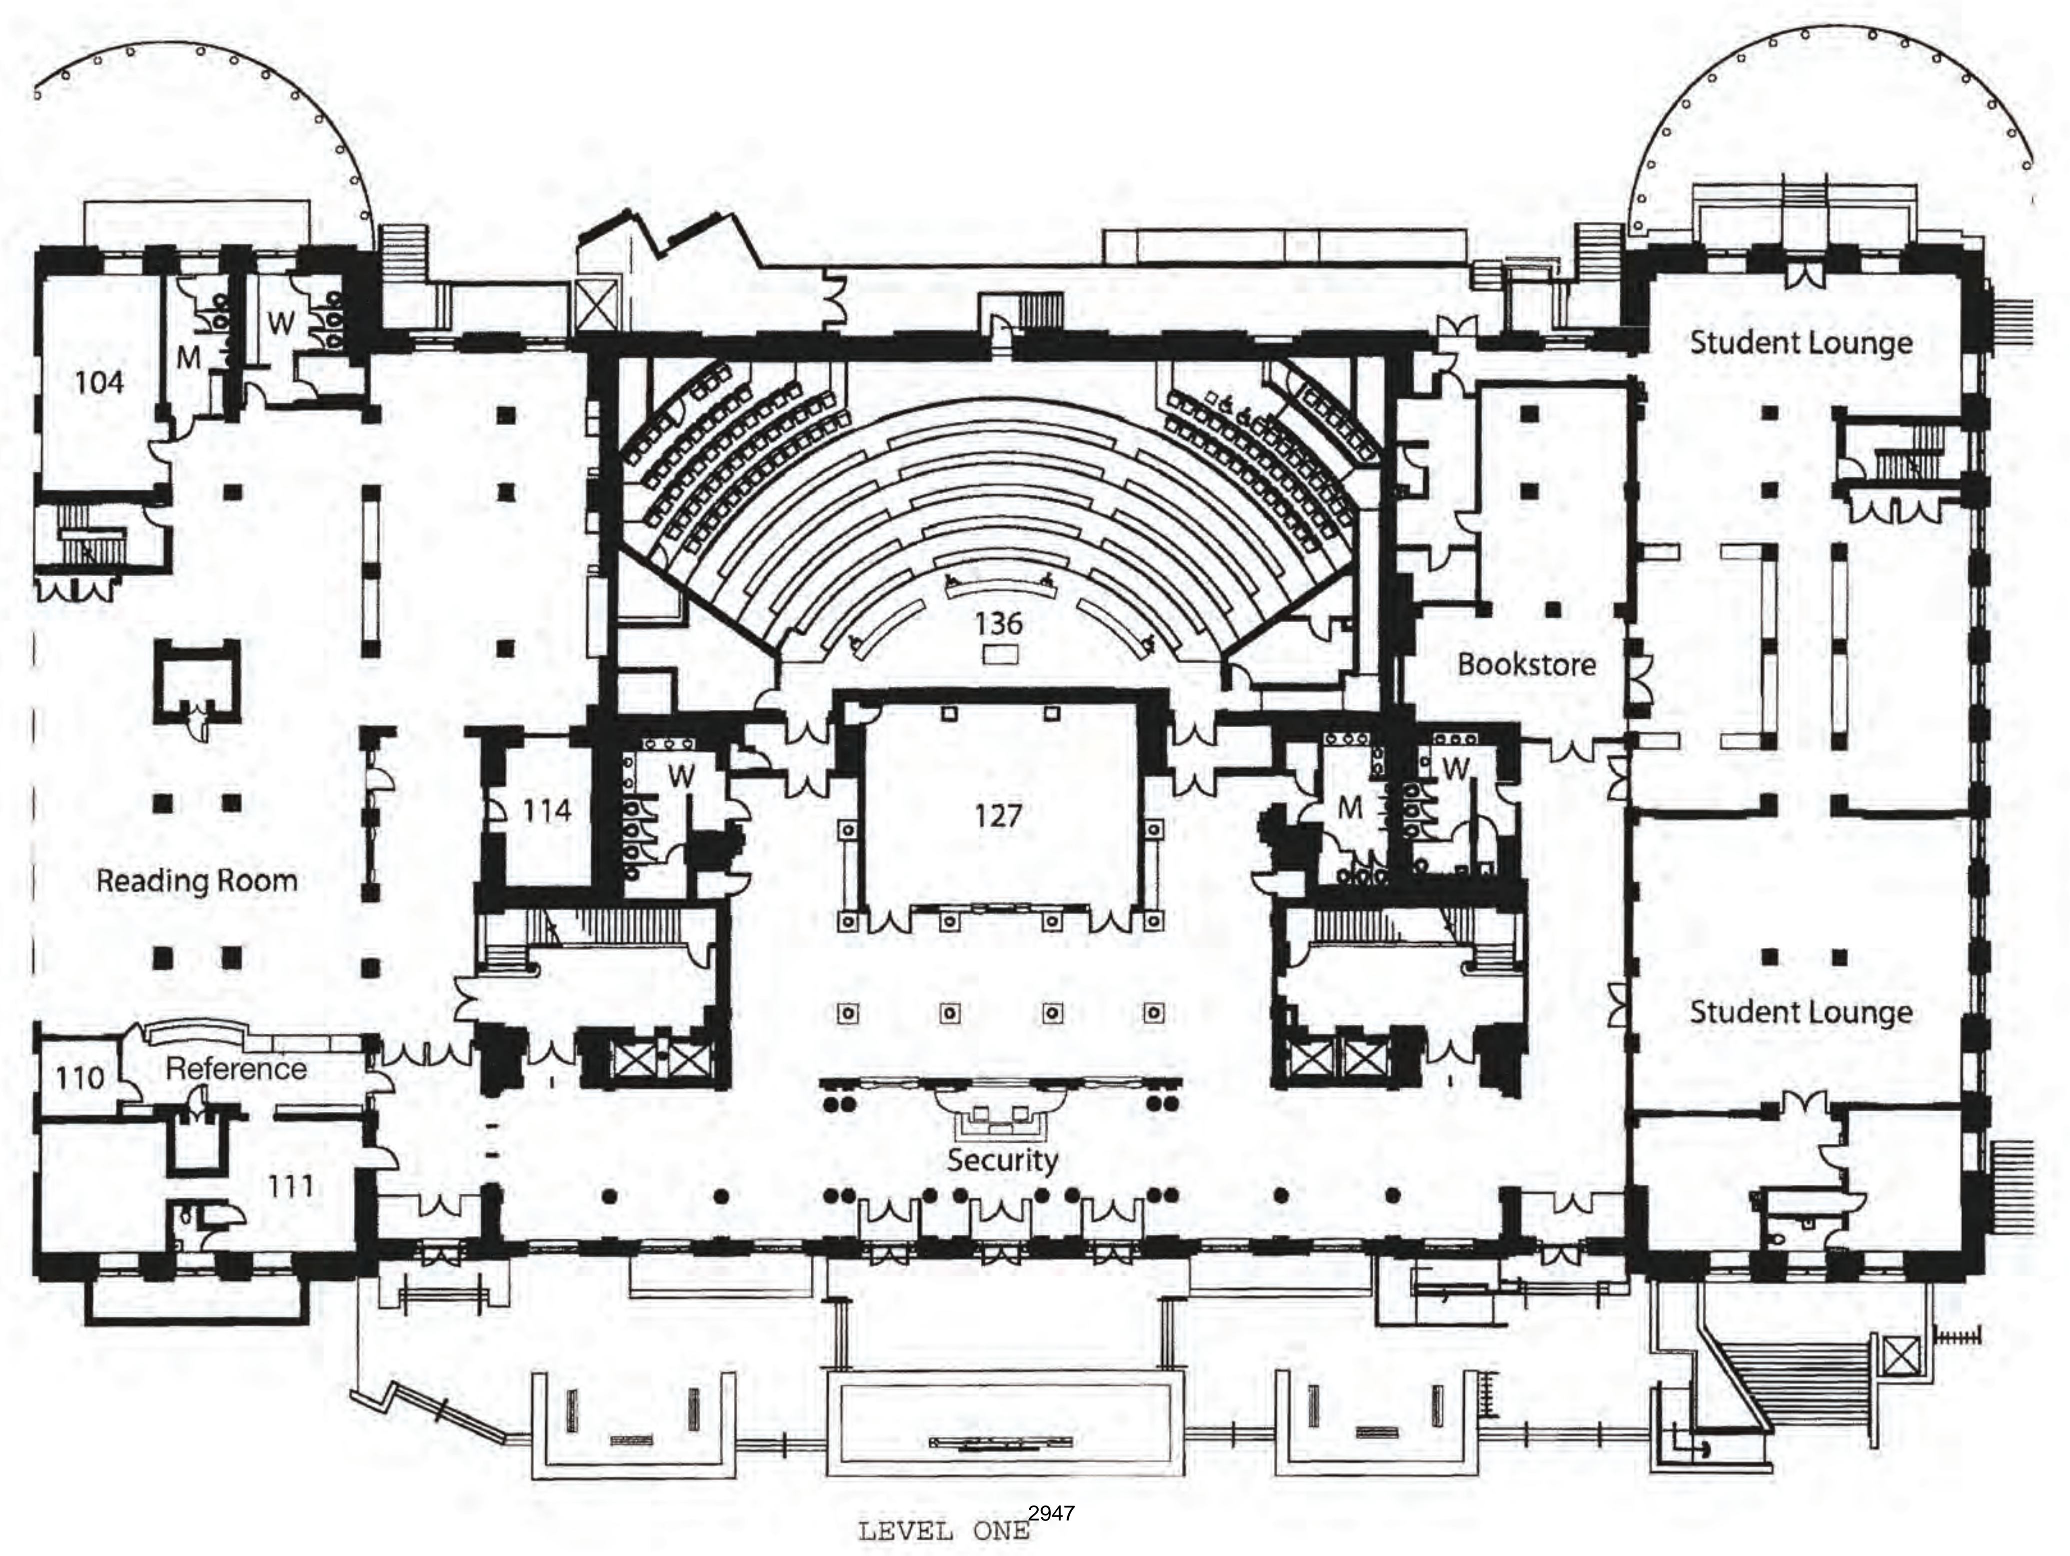
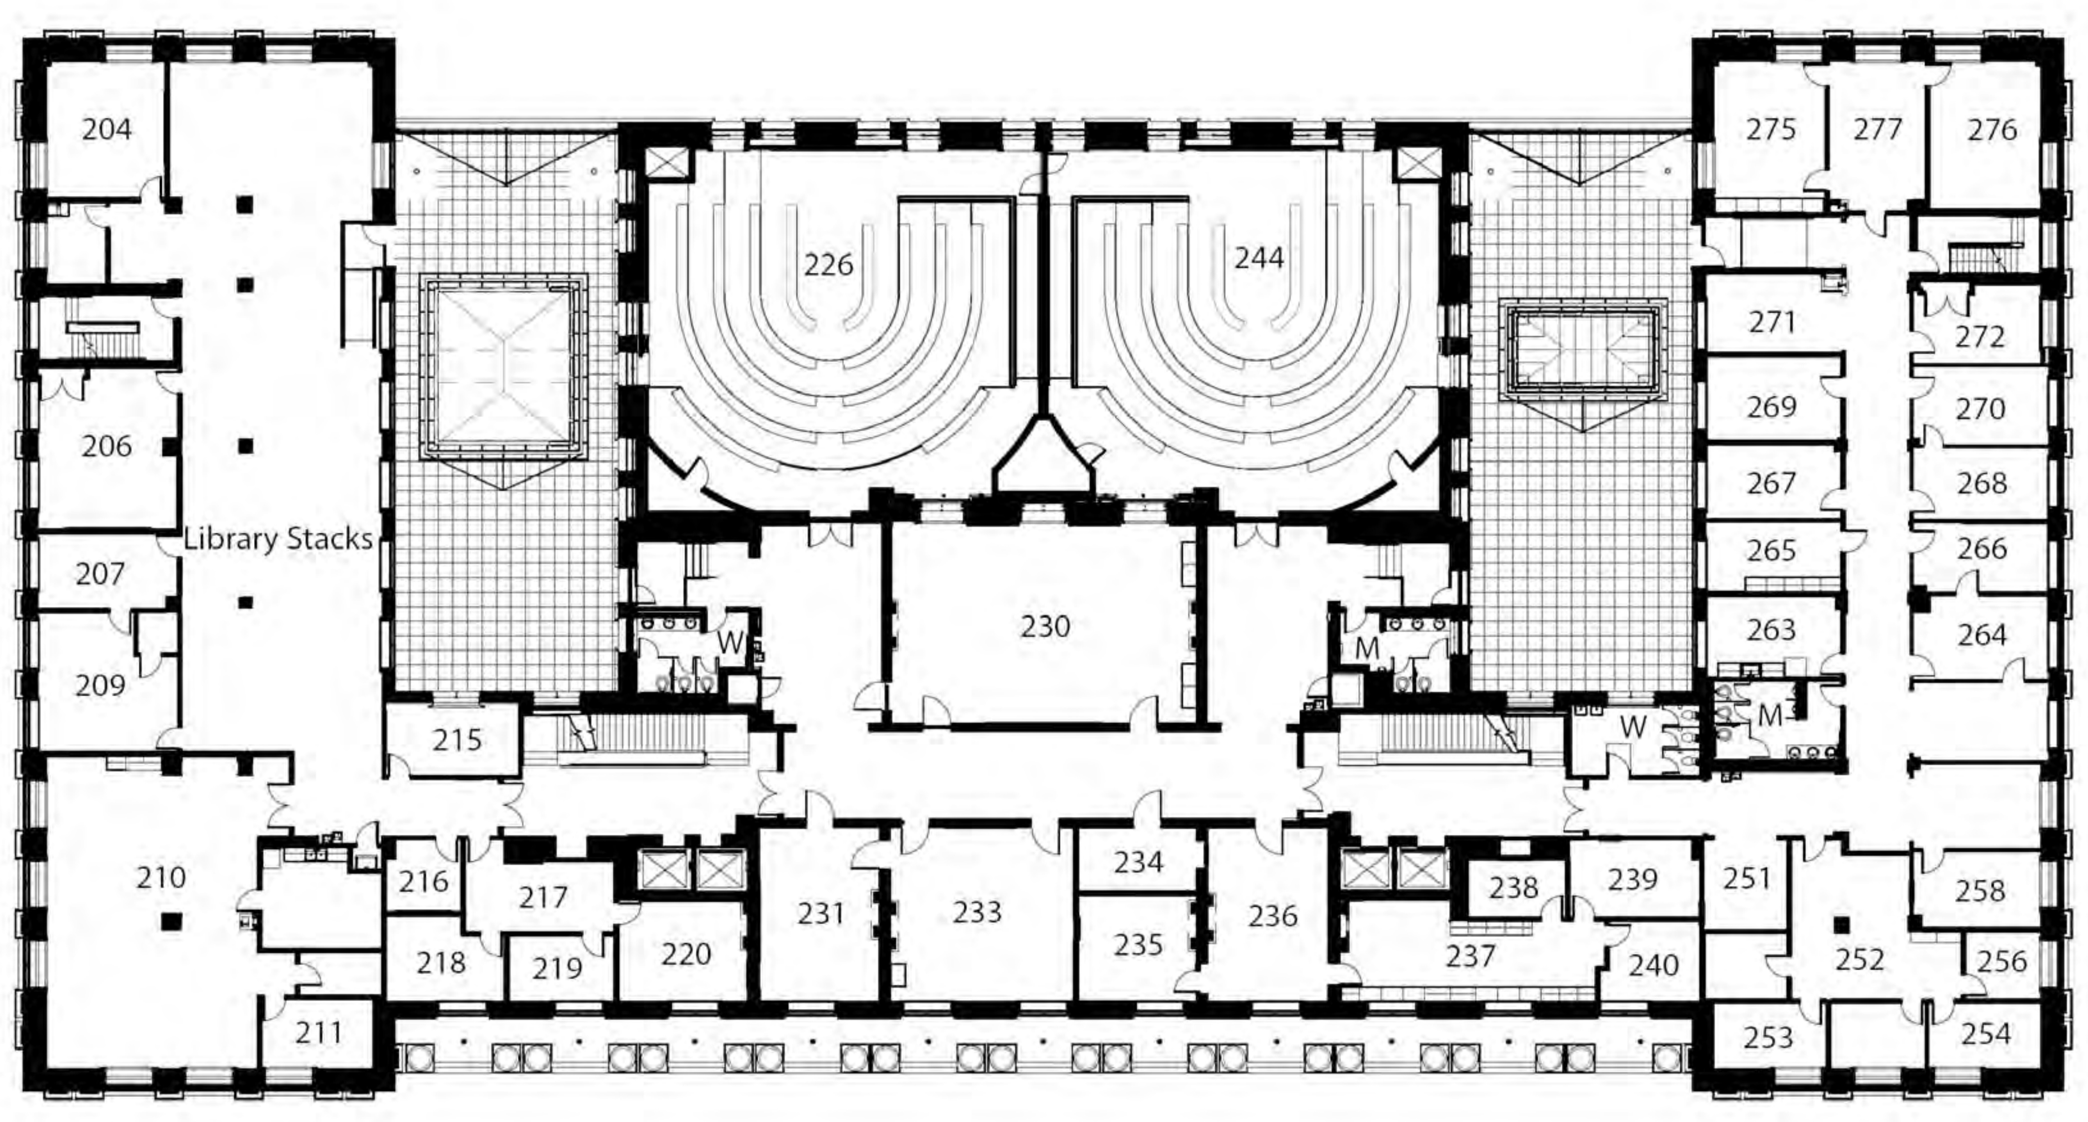
Computer
Prepare answer for Read and Brief Cases on Intention...
Cancel
Read and brief the following cases on Intentional Torts—Intent (p.17-30).
• Garratt v. Daily
• Spivey v. Battaglia
• Ranson v. Kitner
• McGuire v. Amy
• Talmage v. Smith
When complete, upload your briefs in one document by clicking "Prepare answer" below.
Your answer
Select the files to upload and then select one of the Save options.
The maximum total size of the files is 500 MB.
100%
Add attachments
Save and submit
Save but don't submit yet
barbri
View as teacher
Modules
News
Assessments
Calendar
Resources
Instructors
Learners



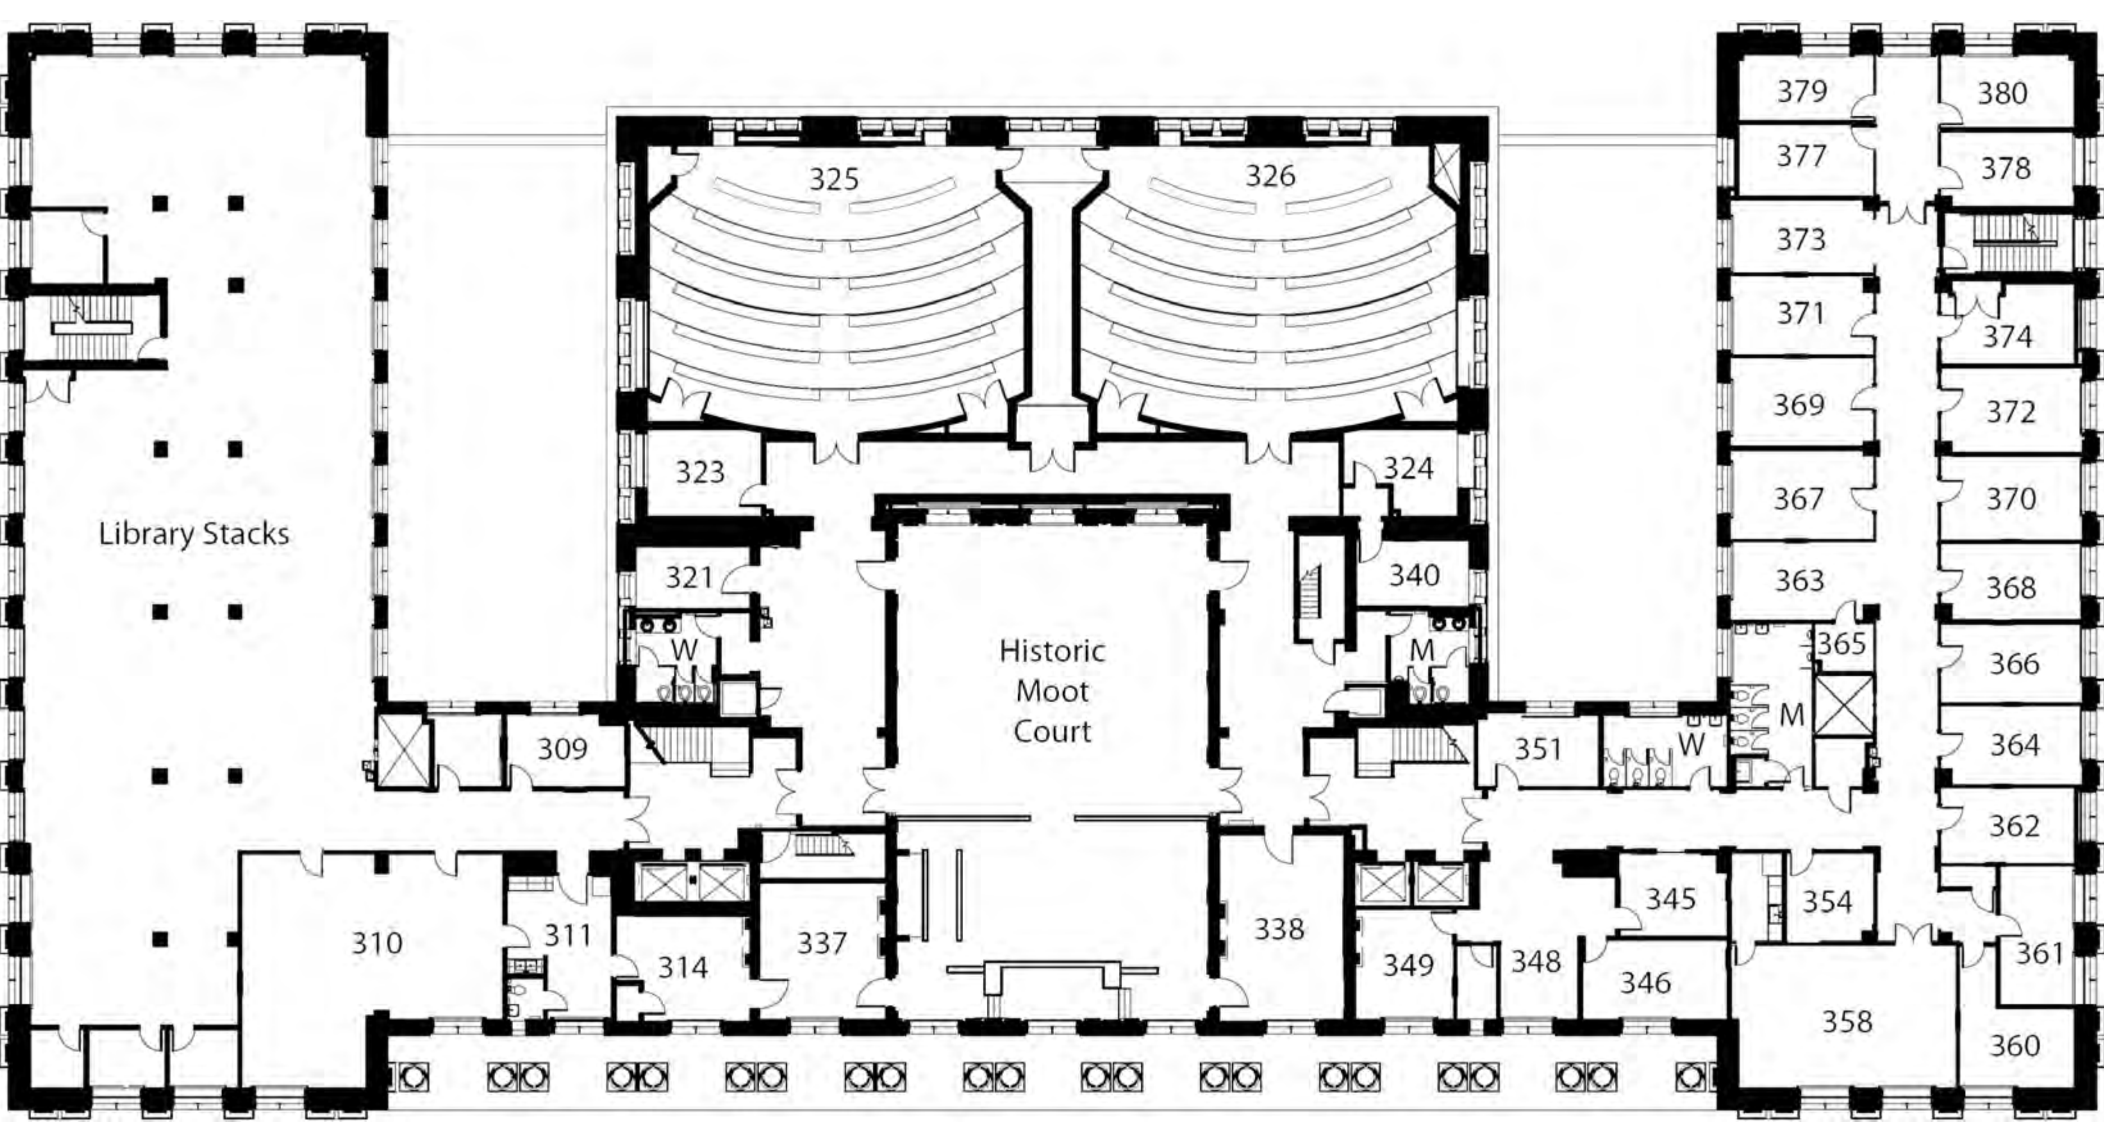
LEVEL ZERO



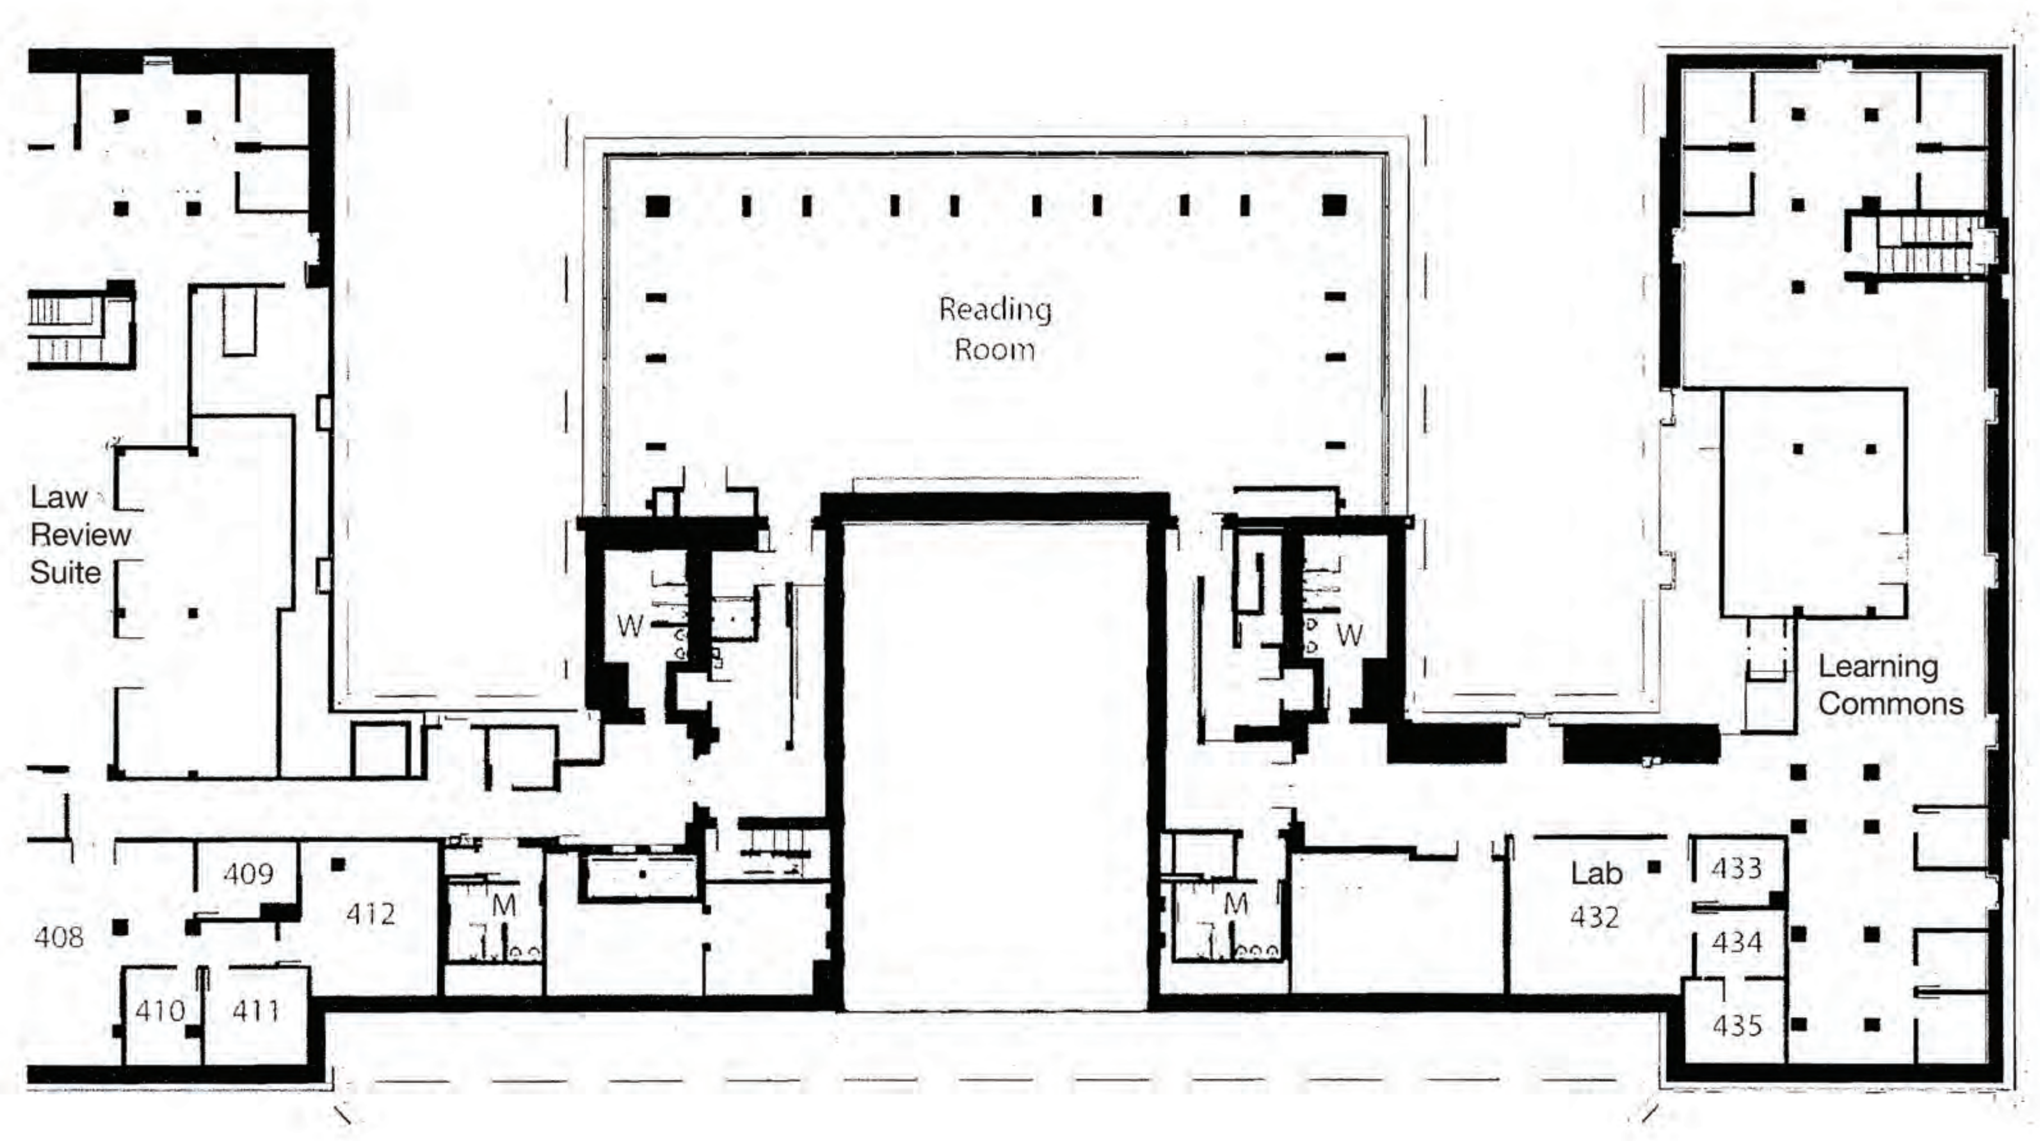
LEVEL ONE



LEVEL TWO



LEVEL THREE



LEVEL FOUR

Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law

Current Students

ALTERNATIVE SPRING BREAK

Memphis Law's Alternative Spring Break program, coordinated and run by PALS, seeks to help low income individuals who need legal representation, while simultaneously providing law students the opportunity to gain experience in the legal field. The University of Memphis program is the only student-led Alternative Spring Break in the country to recruit nationally, taking applicants from any American Bar Association-accredited law school.

Supervised by practicing attorneys and leaders in the Memphis community, law students participate in a variety of specialized tracks throughout the week, with a special keynote address to conclude the weeks activities.

Information about the 2017 Alternative Spring Break Program:

ADVOCATING FOR EDUCATIONAL JUSTICE:BREAKING THE SCHOOL TO PRISON PIPELINE

The eighth annual Alternative Spring Break, sponsored by the University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law and its Public Action Law Society (PALS), will focus on the the "school to prison pipeline," the causes, effects, and solutions. The event's keynote speaker is The Honorable Judge Dan H. Michael of Shelby County Juvenile Court in Memphis, Tennessee.

The "school to prison pipeline" refers to the national trend of students being funneled through public schools and into the juvenile and criminal justice system. The Alternative Spring Break 2017 program will take an in-depth look at this issue through several specialized legal tracks and panel discussions throughout the course of the program.

Sixty-six law students from 4 different law schools will participate in Alternative Spring Break during the week of March 6–10, 2017. Law students from University of Georgia, University of Toledo, and Loyola Law School will join Memphis Law students in seven specialized pro bono tracks.

Supervised by practicing attorneys and leaders in the Memphis community, law students will participate in seven specialized tracks: Advance Directives, Family Law, Immigration, Criminal Defense, Juvenile Justice, a Research and Writing track, and a Veterans' Clinic.

In the spirit of service, this year Alternative Spring Break will add a non-legal related community service component. PALS has teamed up with Clean Memphis to do a survey of graffiti plagued locations in Downtown Memphis. Students will spend an afternoon spotting areas in Downtown Memphis that need attention to report to Clean Memphis so that action may be taken.

For all participants to have a better understanding of how to combat the "school to prison pipeline," a panel discussion will bring several voices to the table to discuss the key issues and possible solutions. The panel will include The Honorable Magistrate Judge Mitzi Pollard, who sits on the truancy docket for Shelby County Juvenile Court, Ms. Mahal Burr, Community Action Coordinator for BRIDGES USA, Mr. Bernard Williams, a Juvenile Services Specialist at Shelby County Juvenile Court, and Mr. Deangelo Mitchell, a recent graduate of Northwest Prep Academy.

Apply to Memphis Law

News & Events

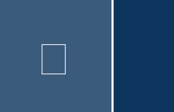
Alumni & Support

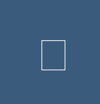
ABA Required Disclosures

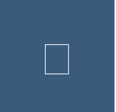
Full sitemap

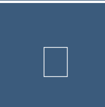
EXPLORE LAMBUTH CAMPUS

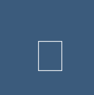
Follow UofM Online

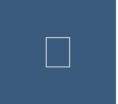












Print | Got a Question? Ask TOM | Copyright 2017 University of Memphis | Important Notice

Last Updated: 2/16/17 | University of Memphis | Memphis, TN 38152 | Phone: 901.678.2000

The University of Memphis does not discriminate against students, employees, or applicants for admission or employment on the basis of race, color, religion, creed, national origin, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity/expression, disability, age, status as a protected veteran, genetic information, or any other legally protected class with respect to all employment, programs and activities sponsored by the University of Memphis. The following person has been designated to handle inquiries regarding non-discrimination policies: Michael Washington, Director for Institutional Equity. For more information see University of Memphis Equal Opportunity and Affirmative Action.

Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 protects people from discrimination based on sex in education programs or activities which receive Federal financial assistance. Title IX states: "No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance..." 20 U.S.C. § 1681 - To Learn More, visit Title IX and Sexual Misconduct.

Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law

About

Admissions

Programs

Current Students

Faculty

Careers

Library

Current Students

HISTORY OF ALTERNATIVE SPRING BREAK

Alternative Spring Break (ASB) began in the spring of 2010 when fifteen UofM law students traveled to Miami after the Haiti earthquake to help Haitians stranded in the U.S. apply for temporary protected status. These students returned to Memphis motivated to help local Memphians in need of quality legal services.

In the spring of 2011, PALS hosted ASB at the University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of law. Under the supervision of attorneys, thirty-seven law students from eight law schools served in three areas or tracks: (1) Pro Se Divorce, (2) Advance Directives, and (3) Non-Profit Organizations. Of the thirty-seven students who participated, twenty were from the UofM. In the pro se divorce track, students assisted couples with no joint property or kids to file pro se divorces. In the advance directives track, students traveled to nursing homes and senior centers to prepare legal documents such as powers of attorney, health care surrogacies, and wills. Students participating in the nonprofit advocacy track worked on different law-related projects with Court-Appointed Special Advocates, Literacy Mid-South, and the RISE Foundation.

The Third Annual Alternative Spring Break took place from March 5-23, 2012. PALS hosted sixty-two students, twenty-nine from the UofM, who participated in four tracks: (1) Pro Se Divorce, (2) Advance Directives, (3) Legislative Drafting, and (4) Immigration. The two new tracks, Legislative Drafting and Immigration, were added to directly respond to the need in Memphis and allow more student participation. Students working in the Legislative Drafting Track partnered with three organizations to draft legislation regarding human trafficking, post-civil commitment proceedings, and predatory lending. The Immigration Track took place over three weeks with the University of Tennessee College of Law and the University of Mississippi College of Law partnering to finish the second and third weeks. Students in the Immigration Track processed U-Visa applications for five victims of serious domestic violence who cooperated with law enforcement.

Morris Dees, the founder of the Southern Poverty Law Center, was the keynote speaker at the 2012 ASB Luncheon. Mr. Dees spoke to the students about his humble roots in rural Alabama, his formative years as a civil rights lawyer, and his current effots to curtail discrimination against immigrants.

The Fourth Annual ASB took place from March 11-15, 2013. This year, ASB added even more tracks, including "Street Court" where students partnered with the Shelby County Public Defender's office to expunge outstanding court fees for homeless individuals. Street Court helped over 70 individuals receive legal counseling so that their issues would not longer be barriers to finding housing and jobs. Over forty-eight law students from seven schools served over 145 clients in ASB. ASB chose a Civil Rights theme, featured an educational series of "hot topics" throughout the week, and hosted keynote speaker Mike Cody, who represented Dr. Martin Luther King when the City of Memphis attempted to stop the sanitation workers' march in Memphis.

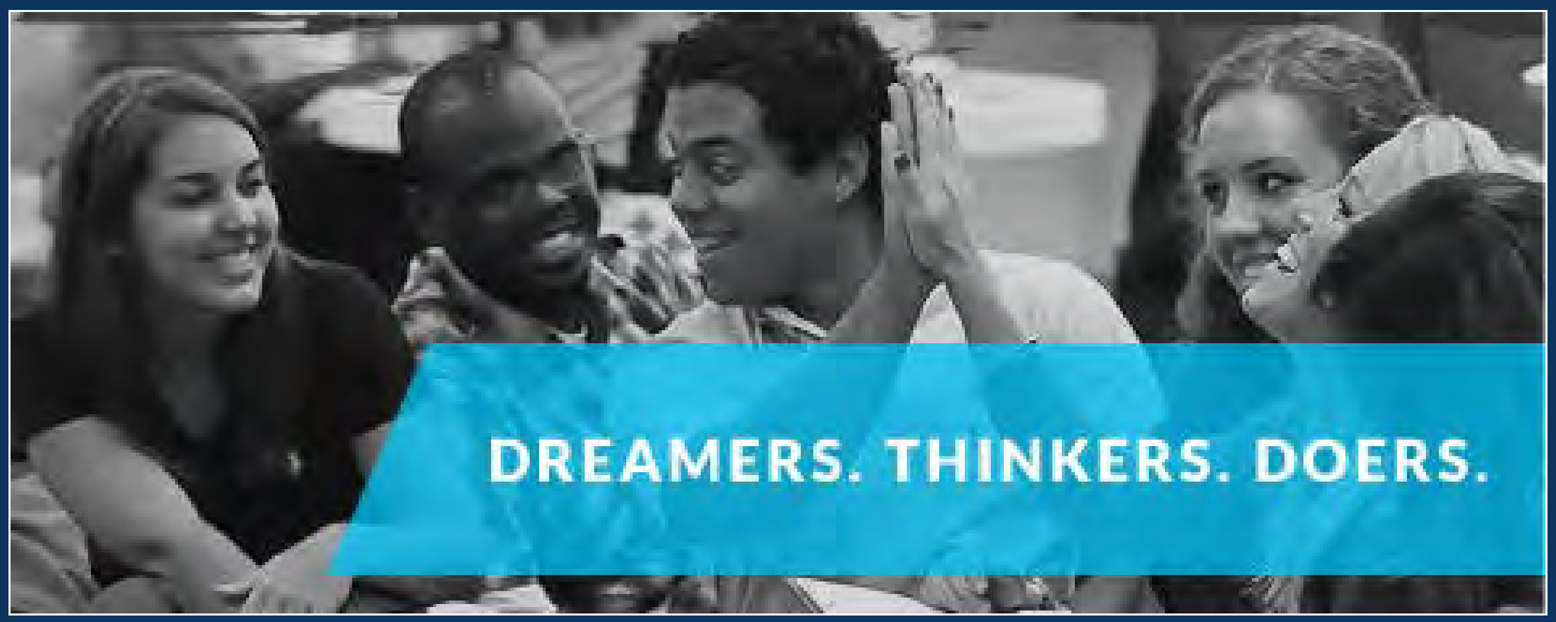
Apply to Memphis Law

News & Events

Alumni & Support

ABA Required Disclosures

Full sitemap



EXPLORE LAMBUTH CAMPUS

Follow UofM Online

Print | Got a Question? Ask TOM | Copyright 2017 University of Memphis | Important Notice

Last Updated: 10/26/16 | University of Memphis | Memphis, TN 38152 | Phone: 901.678.2000

The University of Memphis does not discriminate against students, employees, or applicants for admission or employment on the basis of race, color, religion, creed, national origin, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity/expression, disability, age, status as a protected veteran, genetic information, or any other legally protected class with respect to all employment, programs and activities sponsored by the University of Memphis. The following person has been designated to handle inquiries regarding non-discrimination policies: Michael Washington, Director for Institutional Equity. For more information see University of Memphis Equal Opportunity and Affirmative Action.

Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 protects people from discrimination based on sex in education programs or activities which receive Federal financial assistance. Title IX states: "No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance..." 20 U.S.C. § 1681 - To Learn More, visit Title IX and Sexual Misconduct.

Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law

Current Students

SBA COMMITTEE INFORMATION

Communication and Program Committees

Wellness Wednesdays: a committee of SBA members that organize a weekly program to instill a sense of self-awareness regarding physical, mental, and emotional health to each student. This will involve student activities, guest speakers, and informational sessions throughout the academic year.

Faculty Presentations: a committee of SBA members that work to provide presentations by professors as an opportunity for the students to learn about the projects and studies of the faculty of Memphis Law.

Community Service Projects: a committee of SBA members that organizes community service projects as detailed by the Community Service Liaison in an official report each semester.

Career Service Office Committee: a committee of SBA members selected to work in cooperation with the law school's Career Service Office to foster open communication between the office and the student body.

3L Graduation Committee: a committee of SBA 3L members selected to work with the law school administration to prepare for the graduation ceremony. The committee will work to ensure the graduating class selects a graduation guest speaker, the professor of the year award, takes composite photos, chooses a 3L student class speaker, and any other graduation need.

Student Leaders Committee: a committee appointed by the SBA President with the goal of having active and frequent communication between all of the student organizations at Memphis Law. The committee members are the President, or equivalent there of, of each student organization. The Student Leader Committee will attempt to minimize conflicts and ensure the school events calendar works to the benefit of the majority the student body.

Event Committees

1L Class Welcome to Law School: an event at the end of Orientation to welcome the incoming 1L class to law school, and introduce them to the SBA.

Memphis Law Golf Tournament: a fundraising golf tournament hosted by the SBA. The proceeds will go to helping the SBA pay for other events, guest speakers, or student needs.

Trivia Night: a fun event geared towards building morale and relationship between professors and students. SBA provides prizes for the first, second, and third place teams, and for the team with the most creative team name.

Fall Festival: a festival in the fall semester for the student body to celebrate the law school community. Each student organization puts together a booth or activity for the fall festival. Several of the activities include: face-painting; hot apple cider; a chili cook-off; pumpkin carving; "Pie a Professor"; and more!

Auction: a fundraising event for the SBA. Donations from the local Memphis community will be auctioned off in a silent auction followed by a live auction. The live auction will consist of the donations provided by the Memphis Law Professors. The proceeds will go to the SBA to pay for other events, guest speakers, or student needs.

Grizz Night: a night where the student body goes to Fedex Forum together as a student body to cheer on the Memphis Grizzlies! The goal of the event is to foster school spirit, and a sense of community for law students, as well as the city of Memphis.

Barrister's Ball: an annual semi-formal event held to celebrate our law school community in an intimate and elegant setting. The goal of the celebration is to focus on the unification of each member of the student body and foster a spirit of fellowship.

ABA Mental Health Awareness Day: SBA Wellness Wednesday Committee will put together information and activities to bring awareness of the very real concerns of mental health.

Flaw Review: an annual event always free to the student body. It is a celebration of the academic year. Each class, 2L, 3L, 1L Section 11, 1L Section 12, and the faculty/administration will create and perform a skit poking fun and joking about things that occurred through out the year. The skits are filled with jokes aimed at good, clean fun to laugh at ourselves and enjoy each others company.

Race Judicata: an annual 5K held by the SBA as a community service fundraiser with the proceeds going to an organization or group in need.

3L Class Graduation Celebration: a party for the graduating class hosted by SBA to celebrate and honor the achievements of the class, and to acknowledge their contributions to the law school.

For more up-to-date information regarding SBA news, events and announcements, please visit the SBA TWEN page by clicking HERE.

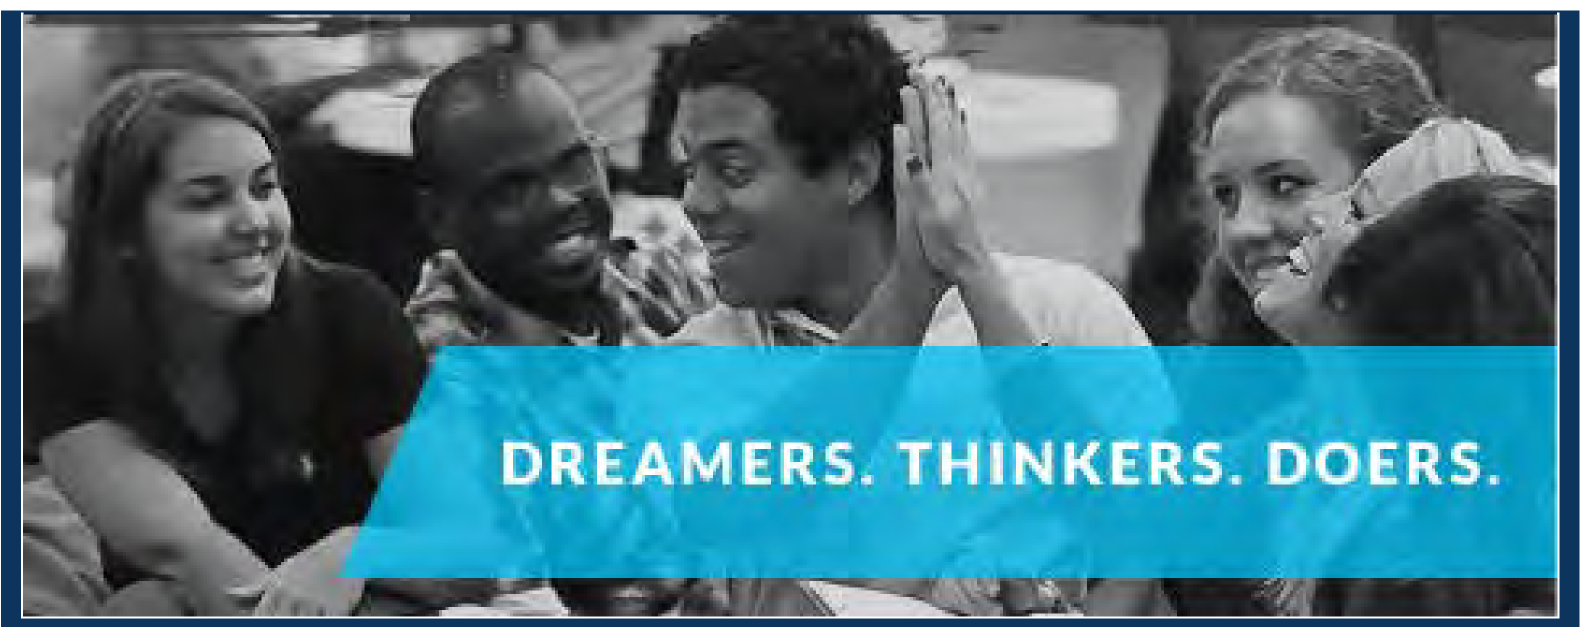
Apply to Memphis Law

News & Events

Alumni & Support

ABA Required Disclosures

Full sitemap



EXPLORE LAMBUTH CAMPUS

Follow UofM Online

Print | Got a Question? Ask TOM | Copyright 2017 University of Memphis | Important Notice

Last Updated: 10/26/16 | University of Memphis | Memphis, TN 38152 | Phone: 901.678.2000

The University of Memphis does not discriminate against students, employees, or applicants for admission or employment on the basis of race, color, religion, creed, national origin, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity/expression, disability, age, status as a protected veteran, genetic information, or any other legally protected class with respect to all employment, programs and activities sponsored by the University of Memphis. The following person has been designated to handle inquiries regarding non-discrimination policies: Michael Washington, Director for Institutional Equity. For more information see University of Memphis Equal Opportunity and Affirmative Action.

Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 protects people from discrimination based on sex in education programs or activities which receive Federal financial assistance. Title IX states: "No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance..." 20 U.S.C. § 1681 - To Learn More, visit Title IX and Sexual Misconduct.

CONSTITUTION

UNIVERSITY OF MEMPHIS CECIL C. HUMPHREYS SCHOOL OF LAW

STUDENT BAR ASSOCIATION

ARTICLE I

NAME

The name of this organization shall be The University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys Student Bar Association, herein referred to as the SBA.

ARTICLE II

PURPOSES

SECTION 1. The purposes of this organization are to bring all of the students of The University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law into one body in order to foster a spirit of fellowship and cooperation and to advance the aims and purposes of the School of Law.

SECTION 2. These purposes shall be carried out:

A. By providing and conducting a forum for the discussion and resolution of student problems.

B. By providing and conducting a forum for the planning of student activities.

C. By cooperating with other departments of the University and other organizations for the advancement of common interests.

ARTICLE III

MEMBERSHIP

SECTION 1. All students enrolled in the University of Memphis School of Law shall be members of the SBA.

SECTION 2. The members of the SBA shall be entitled to all rights and privileges afforded by this Constitution.

SECTION 3. All members of the SBA are invited to attend the regular weekly meetings of the Administrative Council, at a time and place to be published on the SBA bulletin board one week before such meeting. All members are also invited to attend such charitable, social, and educational activities as planned by the Administrative Council.

ARTICLE IV

ADMINISTRATIVE COUNCIL

SECTION 1. The Administrative Council.

A. (1) The Administrative Council shall be comprised of two boards: the Executive Board and the Board of Bar Governors.

(2) The Administrative Council shall direct the policies, activities, and general business of the SBA in pursuance of the purposes of this organization as set forth in Article II of this Constitution.

(3) All members of the Administrative Council shall make a good faith effort to meet weekly, in accordance with Article V, § (4).

(4) All decisions of the Administrative Council shall be by a majority of the current members of the Administrative Council.

(a) Exception: An exception to the majority requirement shall be triggered in the following three situations: (1) to enact a By-Law; (2) to propose a Constitutional Amendment; and (3) to recall an elected official according to either Article IV, § (1) (B) (2) or Article V, § (4) (B). In each of those three situations, a two-thirds (2/3) vote of the current members of the Administrative Council shall be required.

(5) Proxy voting will only be allowed on specific issues and must be given in writing to another member of the Administrative Council stating the specific issue and it must be signed by the absent member. There shall be no general proxies.

(6) Decisions of the Administrative Council that are handled outside of the scheduled meeting time shall be made by email and require a majority of the current members of the Administrative Council.

B. The Administrative Council shall have the authority and the responsibility to enact such legislation as is necessary for the best interest of the SBA. This shall include:

(1) The power to adopt and amend By-Laws and to propose Constitutional amendments.

(2) The power to move for the recall of any elected officer.

(3) The power to approve or disapprove the budget of any proposed item. If such budget is disapproved, no SBA funds shall be spent until a revised budget is approved.

(4) The power to compel the attendance of its own members.

(5) The power to conduct hearings and investigations deemed necessary by a majority of the Administrative Council and to form such committees as it deems necessary.

SECTION 2. The Executive Board.

A. The Executive Board shall share legislative authority with the Board of Bar Governors. The Executive Board shall execute the directives of this Constitution, the By-Laws, and the legislation of the Administrative Council.

B. The Executive Board shall consist of a President; Vice-President; Executive Director; Secretary; Treasurer; Bar Associations Representative; Director of Student Academic Affairs; Director of Student Events; Director of Communications; Community Service Liaison; and any other office that may be provided through the By-Laws or the exercise of Article IV, § (2) (L) (2).

C. The President. The President shall preside over all functions of the SBA and shall work with other officers to coordinate the affairs of the SBA. The President shall have the authority to appoint and remove such committees as deemed necessary. The President shall possess all powers granted by this Constitution.

(1) The President shall oversee the execution of all Administrative Council policies, activities, and general business .

(2) The President shall submit, at the first Administrative Council meeting of his term in office, a report of the programs and activities that the SBA should strive to obtain under his leadership. The President shall direct the Secretary to maintain a copy of this report at all times and to make the copy available to any student that wishes to view it.

(3) The President shall recommend needed legislation and resolutions to the Board.

(4) The President shall call meetings of the Administrative Council.

(5) The President shall post and maintain a schedule of regular office hours, which shall not be less than five (5) hours per week.

(6) In the event of a permanent vacancy of any elected position, the President shall appoint a successor, subject to confirmation by a majority vote of the Administrative Council.

(7) The President shall break all tie votes of the Administrative Council.

(8) The President shall have the power to veto any vote of the Administrative Council. This veto may be overturned by a two-thirds (2/3) vote of the Administrative Council.

(9) The President shall have the power to spend no more than one hundred dollars ($100.00) per month, non-cumulative, without prior Administrative Council approval.

(10) The President shall set an agenda for every meeting and shall provide this agenda to all present at the weekly scheduled meeting.

(11) The President shall have such other powers as are necessary to carry out the duties of the office.

(12) The President shall take attendance at every meeting of the Administrative Council and make note of which members of the Administrative Council did not notify the President or delegated officer of their absence in advance.

D. The Vice-President. There shall be a Vice-President who, with the President, shall equitably divide the committee assignments.

(1) In the temporary absence of the President, the Vice-President shall serve in the place of the President.

(2) If the office of President should become permanently vacant, then the Vice-President shall become President and the office of Vice-President shall be elected by a majority vote by the Administrative Council, as provided in Article VI, § (5) of this Constitution.

E. The Executive Director. There shall be an Executive Director appointed by the SBA President to assist the SBA President.

(1) The Executive Director shall act as an advisor to the President and ensure the effective operation of the Administrative Council.

(2) The Executive Director shall be the custodian of this Constitution and ensure compliance with this Constitution by the Administrative Council and all members of SBA.

(3) The Executive Director will serve as an ex-officio member of all non-standing SBA committees and shall be responsible for the effective operation of such committees.

F. The Secretary. The Secretary shall be chief reporter and correspondent of the SBA. The Secretary shall keep the records and minutes of the Administrative Council. These minutes shall be available to any SBA member to view upon request.

G. The Treasurer. The Treasurer shall keep a record of the expenses and the financial condition of the SBA, which shall be submitted to the new Treasurer at the end of the term of office. The Treasurer shall have all financial information pertaining to the SBA for any SBA member to view upon request.

(1) The Treasure shall update the Administrative Council on the state of SBA's finances during each weekly meeting.

(2) The Treasurer shall have such other duties as are delegated by the President.

H. Bar Associations Representative. The Bar Associations Representative shall represent the SBA at all meetings of local and national bar associations, including the Memphis Bar Association, the Tennessee Bar Association, and the American Bar Association Law Student Division. The Bar Associations Representative shall be one of the University of Memphis' official voting delegates, along with the President, at the Circuit and National ABA–LSD meetings. This officer is responsible for promoting student membership in all bar associations and for distributing information about the bar associations to the student body. The Bar Associations Representative shall act as Election Commissioner as outlined in Article VI, § (1).

(1) The Bar Associations Representative shall make an oral or written report to the Administrative Council within one week of attendance of any bar association meeting. This report shall include all propositions and the Bar Associations Representative's vote on the issues.

(2) The Bar Associations Representative shall have such other duties as are delegated by the President.

I. Director of Student Academic Affairs. The Director of Student Academic Affairs shall investigate all academic issues that come before the Administrative Council and shall be the SBA's delegate to the University of Memphis's Student Government Association at the main campus.

(1) The Director of Student Academic Affairs shall be responsible for overseeing and assisting in all speaking events, all academic issues, all Student Government Association issues that concern the Law School student body, graduation, as well as working with other academic organizations at the Law School that request SBA's assistance.

(2) The Director of Student Academic Affairs shall have other duties as are delegated by the President.

J. Director of Communications. The Director of Communications shall be responsible for approving and publishing all emails, statements, memos, flyers, and posters coming from the Administrative Council.

(1) The Director of Communications will work with the Secretary and the Law School's Director of Communications to keep all parties aware of policies, activities, and general business of the SBA.

(2) The Director of Communications shall work with the other members of the Administrative Council to ensure the SBA is updated on all communications.

(3) The Director of Communications shall have other duties as are delegated by the President.

K. Director of Student Events. The Director of Student Events shall be responsible for supporting and promoting all of SBA's annual events, including, but not limited to, Orientation, Golf Tournament, Barristers' Ball, Auction, Race Judicata, and Flaw Review.

(1) The Director of Student Events shall promote all SBA events, in-person, prior to each event and solicit student feedback regarding each event. They will report student feedback to the Administrative Council after each event.

(2) The Director of Student Events shall communicate with the chair of the committee for each event and support in any additional tasking for each event, e.g. soliciting donations and arranging for event sponsors.

(3) The Director of Student Events shall have other duties as are delegated by the President.

K. Community Service Liaison. The Community Service Liaison shall be responsible for coordinating and publicizing community service opportunities for SBA members.

(1) The Community Service Liaison shall organize one (1) community service project in both the fall and spring academic semesters and solicit the participation of the general SBA membership in those projects.

(2) The Community Service Liason shall have other duties as are delegated by the President.

L. Other Executive Officers.

(1) The Administrative Council may create new executive offices through the By-Laws. The name of the office, the duties of the officer, the term of office, the means of assuming office and whether the officer is to have a vote in the business of the Administrative Council shall be specified in the By-Laws and approved by a vote of the Administrative Council.

(2) The President shall retain the right to appoint any other member of the SBA to the Executive Board, if a position is deemed necessary for the success of the SBA.

Any member appointed by the President under this part must be approved by a majority vote of the Administrative Council.

SECTION 3. Board of Bar Governors.

A. The Board of Governors shall share Legislative authority of the SBA with the Executive Board. The Board of Bar Governors shall resolve questions of interpreting this Constitution and its By-Laws.

B. The Board of Bar Governors shall be comprised of four (4) representatives from the 3L class and four (4) representatives from the 2L class, along with two (2) representatives each from Section 11 and Section 12 of the 1L class.

ARTICLE V

QUALIFICATION OF OFFICERS

SECTION 1. Administrative Council General Requirements. No person shall serve in any office of the Executive Board of Bar Governors unless qualified as follows:

A. Every candidate must have a minimum of a 2.0 grade point average on a 4.0 scale at the time of election for a position.

B. Nomination by filing a petition with the required number of signatures at the proper time and place with the Bar Associations Representative, acting as Election Commissioner, as specified by the election rules.

C. Every candidate shall certify to the Bar Associations Representative, acting as Election Commissioner, a good faith pledge which indicates that in the event of being elected to office, the candidate will continue to be enrolled as a student of the Law School during the entire term of the office. Application for early graduation will result in the immediate termination of the officer's term.

SECTION 2. Qualification for Executive Board Officers. In addition to the general qualifications for all other Administrative Council officers, the Executive Board officers shall also meet these additional qualifications where applicable:

A. The SBA President. Each candidate for SBA President must be a rising 3L.

B. The ABA/LSD Representative. Each candidate for ABA Representative shall meet the requirements of said office by complying with the applicable rules of the ABA, which rules are incorporated herein by reference.

C. Other Executive Offices Created Through the By-Laws. Other executive officers may be created through the By-Laws, which shall enumerate the qualifications for each office.

SECTION 3. Qualifications for Board of Bar Governors. In addition, to the general qualifications for all other Administrative Council officers, the Board of Bar Governors shall also meet these additional qualifications where applicable:

A. The Candidates for 3rd Year Bar Governors shall be students who have successfully completed thirty-six (36) hours.

B. The Candidates for 2nd Year Bar Governors shall be students who have successfully completed twelve (12) hours.

C. The Candidates for 1st Year Bar Governors shall be newly enrolled students who have completed zero (0) hours.

SECTION 4. Attendance and Participation Requirements of Executive Board Officers and Bar Governors. All members of the Administrative Council, including all Executive Board officers and all Bar Governors, are required to make a good faith effort to attend all meetings of the Administrative Council and to make a good faith effort to participate in all SBA events and activities. Failure to do so can result in the recall of the Executive Board officer or the Bar Governor per Article IV, § (1) (B) (2) . Such a good faith effort includes notifying the President or delegated officer of any absence prior to an Administrative Council meeting or SBA event.

A. A strike shall be automatically dispensed by the President to any Executive Board officer or Bar Governor that fails to attend an Administrative Council meeting(s) or an SBA event(s) and does not provide a valid reason for his or her failure to attend the meeting(s) or SBA event(s) prior to the meeting(s) or SBA event(s).

B. When any member of the Administrative Council accumulates three (3) strikes, the Administrative Council must hold a recall vote in accordance with Article IV, § (1) (A) (4) (a).

ARTICLE VI

ELECTIONS

SECTION 1. Election Commissioner. The Bar Associations Representative shall be responsible for scheduling and conducting all SBA elections and referenda. The determination of any and all matters and rules pertaining to such election shall be within the jurisdiction of the Bar Associations Representative and its decision, subject to the approval of the SBA President, shall be final.

SECTION 3. Election of Executive Board Officers. Executive Board officers shall be elected for a period of one (1) year and shall take office upon graduation day. Executive Board officers, with the exception of appointed officers, shall be elected as follows:

A. The election of Executive Board officers shall be held in the Spring General Election.

B. Executive Board officers shall be elected by the general membership of the SBA.

C. The candidate for each Executive Board office who receives a majority of votes cast shall be elected.

D. In the absence of one candidate receiving a majority of the votes cast, a run-off election shall be held between the two candidates who have received the most votes. The candidate receiving a majority of the votes in the run-off election shall be elected.

E. In the case of a run-off tie, the position will be determined by a vote of the present Administrative Council.

SECTION 4. Election of the Board of Bar Governors. The Governors of the Board of Bar Governors shall be elected for a period of one (1) year and shall take office at graduation with the exception of First Year Bar Governors who shall serve from fall until the following year's graduation. The Governors of the Board of Bar Governors shall be elected as follows:

A. The election of the Board of Bar Governors shall be held in the Spring General Election, except that First Year Bar Governors shall be elected within the first three (3) weeks of the Fall Semester.

B. Each member of the SBA shall be entitled to vote for the Bar Governors representing his or her division.

C. Each voter shall be entitled to cast one vote for each of the Bar Governor seats for his or her division, but no voter shall cast more than one vote for any candidate.

D. For each division, the candidates receiving the most votes shall be elected.

E. In the case of a tie, a run-off election shall be held between the tied candidates.

F. In the case of a run-off tie, the position will be determined by a vote of the present Administrative Council.

SECTION 5. Uncompleted Terms of Office.

A. If the office of President should become permanently vacant, then the Vice-President shall become President and the office of Vice-President shall be elected by a majority vote by the Administrative Council.

B. In the event of permanent vacancy in any other office, besides the President, in the Administrative Council, the President shall appoint a successor, subject to a majority vote of the Administrative Council's approval.

ARTICLE VII

FINANCES

SECTION 1. Funds for the organization shall be raised through donations, fundraisers, support of the Law School, or other means adopted by the Administrative Council.

SECTION 2. Upon dissolution of the SBA, any remaining funds shall be donated to the University of Memphis Foundation for use by the Law School at the Dean’s discretion.

ARTICLE VIII

REFERENDUM

SECTION 1. There is reserved in the general membership of the SBA the right to petition the Administrative Council for a referendum election. The referendum shall be to recall an official, change the Constitution, or change the By-Laws.

SECTION 2. The procedure to be followed is hereinafter set forth.

A. The petition calling for a referendum election is to be initiated and signed by ten percent (10%) of the general membership.

B. The petition should be submitted to the Administrative Council at a regular or specified special meeting.

SECTION 3. Upon submission to and verification of said petition by the Administrative Council, the President of the SBA shall direct the Bar Associations Representative, as Election Commissioner, to hold an immediate general election.

SECTION 4. A two-thirds (2/3) affirmative vote by the voting membership of the SBA is required to pass and adopt the said proposal.

ARTICLE IX

BY-LAWS

SECTION 1. The Administrative Council shall adopt such By-Laws as it deems necessary to carry out the purpose of the SBA.

SECTION 2. By-Laws of the SBA shall be adopted by the Administrative Council by a two-thirds (2/3) vote of the entire Council membership. In adopting the By-Laws, the following procedure shall be followed:

A. The proposed By-Law shall be submitted to the Secretary and posted in a conspicuous place by the Secretary at least forty-eight (48) hours prior to the first reading.

B. The proposed By-Law shall be submitted to the Administrative Council and if it receives a two-thirds (2/3) vote of the entire Administrative Council membership, it shall be tabled to be read a second time at the next meeting.

C. The Secretary shall publish the proposed By-Law subsequent to its passage at the first reading.

D. After the second reading, there shall be requires a two-thirds (2/3) affirmative vote of the Administrative Council membership to approve and enact a By-Law.

SECTION 3. To amend a By-Law, the same procedure established in Section 2 of this Article shall be followed.

ARTICLE X

AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

SECTION 1. Amendments to the Constitution of the SBA must be proposed by members of the Administrative Council or by petition signed by ten percent (10%) of the general SBA membership.

SECTION 2. The Constitution shall be amended when:

A. The proposed amendment is passed by two-thirds (2/3) of the entire Administrative Council, or signed by the percent (10%) of the general SBA membership, and,

B. The proposed amendment has been posted conspicuously for at least (2) weeks prior to the ratification vote, and,

C. The proposed amendment is ratified by a two-thirds (2/3) of those voting in the election in which the proposed amendment appears. A non-vote is to be considered an abstention and is not to be included in the two-thirds (2/3) necessary for passage.

ARTICLE XI

IMPLICATION

SECTION 1. This Constitution shall take effect as of May 11, 2014.

First-Year Scholarships

Due to the generosity of friends of the School of Law, alumni, and state appropriations, the University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law offers a number of scholarships to entering first-year law students. These scholarships include academic merit awards, diversity awards, and awards for students with demonstrated financial need. In addition, there are scholarships funded by private donations based on specific criteria. Most scholarships are based on the information in the application, although some require additional information. To be considered for scholarships for which financial need is a factor, applicants must complete the Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA).

Some scholarship awards are based on the information in the application for admission, while others require additional information. All applicants are encouraged to complete the optional questions on the application and submit any required addenda. With the exception of the Memphis Access and Diversity Law Scholarship, all admitted applicants are considered for scholarships. The Memphis Access and Diversity Law Scholarship is only available to Tennessee residents and applicants must complete the optional questions and submit the required separate statement. To be considered for scholarships, applications must be completed by the March 1 deadline. Recipients will be notified as soon as possible of their scholarship award, usually by May 1.

Scholarships are funded in varying amounts ranging from partial to full in-state tuition awards. Many of the awards are renewable for all three years of law school, while others are limited to one year only. If you do not receive scholarship assistance as an entering student, you can apply for second- and third-year scholarships in the spring of each year. Returning student scholarship awards are based upon a variety of criteria, including academic performance in law school, service to the law school and community, and financial need.

LIST OF FIRST-YEAR SCHOLARSHIPS

The Average Student Scholarship will be awarded to an entering student who meets the following minimum criteria: (1) the student's LSAT score and undergraduate GPA do not exceed the median of the student's incoming class; (2) the student's résumé reflects consistent employment as an undergraduate student; and (3) the student has an undergraduate degree in business.

Lydia & Rehim Babaoglu Book Scholarship is a one-year award, funded by Memphis Law alumni Lydia and Rehim Babaoglu. It is valued at $1,000. The scholarship is given to a first-year, non-resident law school student to assist in expenses associated with textbooks.

Claude T. Coffman Memorial Scholarship is named in honor of the late Professor and former interim Dean of the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. The scholarship is made available through the donations of the Coffman family and friends of Professor Coffman. All students are eligible for consideration with selection based upon academic merit and financial need.

C. Cleveland Drennon, Jr. Memorial Scholarshipis funded by Humphrey E. Folk, Jr. and the Drennon family and friends. All full-time students are eligible for this award, with special consideration given to student-athlete graduates of The University of Memphis or Vanderbilt University.

The Dean Emeritus James R. Smoot Endowed Scholarship is named in honor of Dean Emeritus James R. Smoot. Dean Emeritus Smoot joined the law school faculty in 1990, left for a brief period to teach at Valparaiso University School of Law, and rejoined the faculty of the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law in 1998. His courses included banking law, business organizations, contracts, corporate finance, international finance and securities regulations. From 2004-2008 he served as Dean and it is in this leadership position that he had an instrumental role in the relocation of the law school to the former U.S. Custom House, Court House, and Post Office. A scholarship will be awarded to a student who exemplifies academic merit.

Faculty Emeritus Scholarship is funded by the University of Memphis Foundation, a non-profit foundation in Memphis, Tennessee. The University of Memphis Foundation works to support students who demonstrate financial need. This scholarship will be awarded to first-year students who have demonstrated academic merit and financial need.

Federal Court Bench and Bar Scholarships are awarded to economically disadvantaged law students from the Middle District of Tennessee. The recipients must be in good academic standing at the law school or the most recent school attended, but this is not intended to be a merit or academic achievement based scholarship. The goal is to broaden the Middle District of Tennessee bar through expanded opportunities for law students from all backgrounds. The recipients must have demonstrated financial need and must have either graduated from a high school in, or resided for the previous three years as a non-full time student in, one of the following Tennessee Counties: Cannon, Cheatham, Clay, Cumberland, Davidson, DeKalb, Dickson, Fentress, Giles, Hickman, Houston, Humphreys, Jackson, Lawrence, Lewis, Macon, Marshall, Maury, Montgomery, Overton, Pickett, Putnam, Robertson, Rutherford, Smith, Stewart, Sumner, Trousdale, Wayne, White, Williamson, or Wilson. The recipient does not become ineligible for this scholarship merely by moving from the Middle District to the Western or Eastern District to attend law school. The following students are ineligible for this scholarship: Judges and employees of the United States courts and their family members, and Nashville Bar Association employees or Board members and their family members. "Family member" shall include any person covered by Canon 3C(1)(d) or (3)(a) of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges.

The First Tennessee Law Scholars Scholarship was established with donations from the First Tennessee Foundation to assist deserving students at the University of Memphis School of Law. This three-year scholarship will be awarded to a full-time diverse student with competitive academic credentials. The recipients will also demonstrate strong academic or professional achievement and show potential for an outstanding legal career.

Herbert Herff Presidential Law Scholarships are funded by the Herbert Herff Trust. The trust was created by a combination of funds from the Herbert Herff Estate, state appropriations, and University funds. The School of Law awards several Herff Scholarships each year to students who have demonstrated high academic or professional achievement and who show potential for an outstanding law career. These scholarships can be renewed for an additional two years if the recipient maintains full-time status and earns a law grade point average of 2.67.

Judge William B. Leffler Scholarship is awarded to a student who has demonstrated both academic merit and financial need. The award is funded through the Leffler family, the donations of friends, and proceeds from the annual bankruptcy law seminar in Judge Leffler's memory.

H. H. McKnight Memorial Scholarship is awarded to a veteran of the United States Armed Forces with financial need and who is interested in pursuing a career in criminal law. Two scholarships are awarded annually, one to an entering student and one to a returning student. Final selection is made by the donor committee.

Memphis Access and Diversity Law Scholarship. The Tennessee Board of Regents has allocated funds for a diversity scholarship program at the University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. If you are interested in applying for this diversity scholarship, you must complete the scholarship portion of the application and attach a separate statement explaining in detail the circumstances that qualify you to be considered for this scholarship. To the extent possible, you should attach corroborating information to document an economic or educational disadvantage. Applicants must be a Tennessee resident or a resident of Mississippi (De Soto, Marshall, Tate, and Tunica) and Arkansas (Crittenden) Counties.

Out-of-State Tuition Waiver Scholarship. The University of Memphis has a non-resident tuition waiver scholarship available for students whose credentials exceed the median of their entering class or who bring diversity to the law school. Applicants selected for this award will have their out-of-state tuition waived and will pay at the in-state rate. Up to five awards are offered annually. If selected, the applicant must remain in good academic standing for the out-of-state tuition waiver to be renewed. Only non-residents are eligible to apply and the waiver would only apply to law school tuition. Interested candidates should contact the Law Admissions Office.

Donald & Susan Polden Dean's Scholarship supports deserving law students who have demonstrated a commitment to community or public service or who express their desire to serve their community during or following law school. Preference is given to minority students. Dean Donald J. Polden was dean of the law school from 1993 - 2003.

Amy E. Spain Memorial Scholarship was established by the family and friends of Amy Elizabeth Spain who, at age 30, died in a car accident in 1995. A 1989 graduate of the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law, Ms. Spain was an Assistant U.S. Attorney in Memphis, Tennessee, served as a judicial clerk for U.S. District Court Judge James Todd in Jackson, Tennessee, and was an adjunct professor of Legal Methods and Writing at the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. The Attorney General authorized a posthumous award of superior performance in honor of Ms. Spain. The scholarship is given to a law student who has demonstrated academic merit, a commitment to community/professional service, and personal industriousness.

Wyatt, Tarrant & Combs, LLP, Dr. Benjamin L. Hooks Scholarship, in memory of Dr. Benjamin L. Hooks is made possible by the law firm of Wyatt, Tarrant & Combs, LLP. This scholarship will be offered every three years to a full-time student attending the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law at the University of Memphis, with a preference given to a Tennessee resident. This gift is made with the intention of enhancing and assisting the School of Law in achieving its goal of greater diversity in its classes, by making it financially possible for highly qualified applicants from underrepresented racial or ethnic populations to choose the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law at the University of Memphis. The recipient must have a minimum GPA of 3.00 and a minimum LSAT score of 153. The recipient must maintain a cumulative law school grade point average that places him/her in the top 50% of the class. The law firm will be involved in the final selection of the candidate. Should the recipient meet the law grade point average requirement, Wyatt, Tarrant & Combs, LLP Scholarship, LLP will provide a summer associate opportunity following the recipient's first academic year.

The Robert A. Wampler Law Scholarship was established by Robert A. Wampler. This scholarship was provided by Mr. Bobby Wampler, who is a double graduate of the University of Memphis. He graduated in 1972, from law school, and in 1969, with a BBA in Business Management. Mr. Wampler is currently a partner at Wampler and Pierce, where his practice is focused on domestic relations and contract litigation. The scholarship will be awarded to a law student who is enrolled full-time and has strong academic credentials and financial need Law Alumni Board Scholarship Award is awarded by The Law Alumni Scholarship Committee who makes the final selection. Factors reviewed by the committee include financial need, undergraduate grade point average, law school grade point average, law school activities, and personal statement. Additional consideration is given to candidates who are current members of the University of Memphis Alumni Association, are legacies, and have been involved with alumni events. The recipient is invited to, and recognized at, a Law Alumni Board meeting and expected to attend future law alumni activities.

The Springfield Family Scholarship is made possible by an endowment fund established by Mr. and Mrs. Springfield. One scholarship is awarded annually to an entering student who is a graduate of Rhodes College. Mr. Springfield, a retired executive vice-president and general counsel of Union Planters National Bank, earned his law degree in 1960 from The University of Memphis Law School after receiving his B.A. degree with distinction in economics in 1951 from Rhodes College (formerly Southwestern at Memphis). Mrs. Springfield attended The University of Memphis in 1971.

Kathy and J.W. Gibson Scholarship was established to support deserving students who demonstrate high academic or professional achievement and who show potential for an outstanding law career. Additional consideration is given to those who demonstrate past engagement with their community and a propensity to engage in the Memphis/Shelby County community.

3L Scholarship is a discretionary award provided to a student who demonstrates a commitment to academic excellence.

Pauline A. Weaver Scholarship is awarded to a diverse student or students who are pursuing a career in the Public Defender's Office. Pauline A. Weaver graduated from Cecil C. Humphrey's School of Law in 1979. Pauline worked for years as an advocate for health and human services and was a public defender in Alameda County, California for over 29 years. Having faced the challenges that come with being a female student during a critical time in higher education, this scholarship seeks to honor and support students in similar circumstances.

University of Memphis School of Law
1 N. Front Street
Memphis, TN 38103
901.678.5403
lawadmissions@memphis.edu

Returning 2nd and 3rd Year Law Students

The School of Law annually awards scholarships to outstanding students on the basis of academic performance, leadership, character, personal achievements, and financial need. The scholarships listed below are funded through private donations and are administered by the law school. They are open to all University of Memphis School of Law students who meet the specified criteria and complete the application process. Visiting law students are not eligible for these scholarships.

RETURNING STUDENT SCHOLARSHIPS

Tillie B. Alperin Scholarship is named in honor of the late Tillie Blen Alperin, a 1935 graduate of the old University of Memphis Law School and one of the first women to practice law in Tennessee. Female law students who have successfully completed their first year with a B average, have demonstrated a commitment to the legal profession, and have financial need are eligible. Preference will also be given to applicants who have overcome significant obstacles in pursuit of their education.

Black McLaren Jones Ryland & Griffee Judicial Endowment Fund is a scholarship given by the law firm of Black McLaren Jones Ryland & Griffee, P.C. to a deserving and qualified student who is a member of the editorial staff of the Law Review at the University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. The Editor-in-Chief and the Associate Editor are excluded from eligibility for this award.

C. Cleveland Drennon, Jr. Memorial Scholarship is funded by Humphrey E. Folk, Jr. and the Drennon family and friends. All full-time students are eligible for the award, with special consideration given to applicants who were student-athletes graduates of The University of Memphis or Vanderbilt University.

Deal Cooper Holton PLLC Award for Excellence in Trial Advocacy was established by the law firm of Deal, Cooper & Holton, PLLC. This award will be given to the student with excellent performance in the School of Law course entitled Trial Advocacy.

Dinkelspiel Family Scholarship is made possible by Robert and Elizabeth Ann Dinkelspiel to support University of Memphis law students. The award is given annually to a student who has distinguished himself or herself academically, without regard to consideration of financial need.

Tennessee Judicial Conference Foundation Scholarships are made possible by a grant from the Tennessee Judicial Conference Foundation. Three scholarships are awarded annually to a second- or third-year student who has demonstrated community involvement and/or a commitment to public service. The first scholarship honors Dr. Benjamin L. Hooks, the minister, attorney, NAACP director, and civil rights leader from Memphis. The second scholarship honors Judge William H. Williams of Tennessee. The third scholarship honors Judge Don Ash, Senior Judge for the State of Tennessee. The scholarship recipient may be required to attend and participate in the annual Tennessee Judicial Conference. The recipient's travel, meals, and lodging expenses will be provided by the Tennessee Judicial Conference Foundation. While the scholarship is awarded annually, the requirement to attend the annual Tennessee Judicial Conference rotates among the other law schools in the state.

Evans & Petree Law Firm Scholarship in Honor of Percy Harvey, Esq. was established by this Tennessee law firm to demonstrate their commitment to increasing access for minority students to the legal profession. One scholarship is awarded annually, with preference given to a returning African American student with financial need. Final selection is made by the donor committee.

Evolve Bank & Trust Scholarship is given in memory of E. James House, Jr. to a new or returning law student with an undergraduate degree or interest in business and an aptitude for banking and finance. Additional consideration will be given to a student who has overcome adversity or demonstrated personal industriousness with a preference given to students who are graduates of Vanderbilt University.

Federal Bar Association – Memphis Mid-South Chapter Award is an award made possible through the Memphis Mid-South Chapter of the Federal Bar Association to recognize student achievement and support the study of the federal court system. The award is presented to the student who receives the highest grade in the Federal Courts course at the School of Law. In the case of a tie, the award shall be divided between students.

Federal Court Bench and Bar Scholarships are awarded to economically disadvantaged law students from the Middle District of Tennessee. The recipients must be in good academic standing at the law school or the most recent school attended, but this is not intended to be a merit or academic achievement based scholarship. The goal is to broaden the Middle District of Tennessee bar through expanded opportunities for law students from all backgrounds. The recipients must have demonstrated financial need and must have either graduated from a high school in, or resided for the previous three years as a non-full time student in, one of the following Tennessee Counties: Cannon, Cheatham, Clay, Cumberland, Davidson, DeKalb, Dickson, Fentress, Giles, Hickman, Houston, Humphreys, Jackson, Lawrence, Lewis, Macon, Marshall, Maury, Montgomery, Overton, Pickett, Putnam, Robertson, Rutherford, Smith, Stewart, Sumner, Trousdale, Wayne, White, Williamson, or Wilson. The recipient does not become ineligible for this scholarship merely by moving from the Middle District to the Western or Eastern District to attend law school. The following students are ineligible for this scholarship: Judges and employees of the United States courts and their family members, and Nashville Bar Association employees or Board members and their family members. "Family member" shall include any person covered by Canon 3C(1)(d) or (3)(a) of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges.

The Professor W. Walton Garrett Scholarship was established in 1978 and is awarded annually to the Student Bar Association President. Garrett taught at Memphis Law from 1961 until his retirement in 1985. He taught classes in many subject areas of the curriculum, most enjoying Family Law. His wife, Marion, encouraged him to establish this scholarship to support the President of the SBA; he and his now-deceased wife fund over eleven scholarships at various religious organizations and education institutions.

Kimberly and Stephen Hale Endowed Fund was established by Kimberly and Stephen Hale. This scholarship will be awarded to Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law students who have demonstrated exceptional academic ability, both as undergraduates and law students. Mr. Hale was a native Memphian who attended both Raleigh-Egypt and Christian Brothers High School and a received his B.A.in political science and economics from the University of Memphis. Mr. Hale was a 1982 graduate of the University of Memphis School of Law who started his legal career as a Deputy Prosecuting Attorney in Mississippi County, Arkansas. He practiced as a civil litigator with several firms before forming the Hale Law Group. He was admitted to practice in Tennessee and Arkansas, United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth, Eighth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits, and numerous federal district courts. His practice was nationally recognized in consumer and commercial bankruptcies and commercial litigation. This scholarship is given to students who have maintained at a minimum a 3.0 GPA in both undergraduate and law school.

Harris Shelton Hanover Walsh Scholarship is made possible by the law firm of Harris Shelton Hanover Walsh, PLLC to support University of Memphis law students. The award is given annually to a student who has distinguished himself or herself academically, without regard to consideration of financial need.

Robert and Elaine Hoffmann Memorial Scholarship is named in honor of the late Chancellor Robert Hoffmann and his sister Elaine. All students are eligible for consideration, with selection based upon academic merit. Two awards are available, one to a second-year and one to a third-year law student.

Kathryn Hookanson Law Fellowship was established by Ms. Hookanson, her family, friends and colleagues. Kathryn Hookanson was Legal Counsel for The University of Memphis, a member of the law faculty, and a practicing member of the Memphis Bar. All students are eligible to apply. Preference may be given to female students and those in financial need.

John C. "Jack" Hough Memorial Law Scholarship is named in honor of the late John C. "Jack" Hough, a former member of the Shelby County Public Defender's Office. The scholarship is available to a second- or third-year law student who demonstrates financial need and is working either for compensation, as a volunteer or in a law school externship in the office of the Shelby County Public Defender. Preference will also be given to applicants who express an interest in a career in government service as a public defender or prosecutor, or in the field of criminal law.

Cecil C. Humphreys Law Fellowships are funded through a grant from the Plough Foundation. The fellowships are awarded to students who have demonstrated outstanding academic performance, leadership, good citizenship, and scholarship achievement. Fellows engage in activities under the direction of law faculty for 15 hours per week. Recipients can not engage in outside employment. Fellowships are only awarded to second-and third-year students.

The Honorable David S. Kennedy Bankruptcy Achievement Award Fund was established to recognize an excellent student and support the study of bankruptcy law at the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. It was established by an alumnus who has great admiration and respect for his bankruptcy professor, Judge David S. Kennedy.

Littler Mendelson Labor Law Award was established by the law firm of Kiesewetter, Wise, Kaplan & Prather, PLC. This award provides scholarship assistance to the student with the highest grade in the School of Law course entitled Labor Law. In the event of a tie for the highest grade, the professor teaching the course will determine the recipient.

The Law Alumni Board Honor Student Scholarship was established by the Law Alumni Board of Directors for a student who reflects the Law School's commitment to excellence and demonstrates an ability to succeed in the legal profession through leadership, scholarships, community service, or other attributes or achievements. The recipient of this $1,000 annual scholarship is an entering student accepted to the University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. The scholarship is renewable for each of the three years, provided that the student maintains a 3.0 GPA and exhibits the high standards of conduct expected of the recipient of the Honor Student award. Recipients are invited to various Law Alumni events where they will be recognized.

The Jackson Lewis Firm Scholarship was established at the University of Memphis School of Law to recognize a second-year student who has a demonstrated interest in, or aptitude for, labor and employment law. Other factors that are considered are the applicant's prior work experience or class work. Additionally, the recipient must have performed well academically during their first year of law school, and preference will be given to awarding the scholarship to someone underrepresented in the legal community.

The Judge John Martin Scholarship is presented annually to a student in recognition of Judge Martin's contributions to the federal judiciary and to the community. Judge Martin was a United States District Judge for the Western District of Tennessee from 1935-1941, and served both as judge and Chief Justice on the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit from 1941 until his death in 1962. The scholarship is presented to the Chief Justice of the University of Memphis Moot Court Board.

H. H. McKnight Memorial Scholarship is awarded to a veteran of the United States Armed Forces with financial need and who is interested in pursuing a career in criminal law. Two scholarships are awarded annually, one to an entering student and one to a returning student. Final selection is made by the donor committee.

Memphis Access and Diversity Law Scholarship. The Tennessee Board of Regents has allocated funds for a diversity scholarship program at the University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. If you are interested in applying for this diversity scholarship, you must complete the scholarship application and explain why you qualify. Applicants must be a Tennessee resident or a resident of Mississippi (Desoto, Marshall, Tate, and Tunica) and Arkansas (Crittenden) Counties.

The Joe A. Moore Award is named in honor of former law professor Joe A. Moore and is granted to a graduating student who has excelled in oral advocacy. Recipients are selected by the law dean and faculty.

Sam A. Myar, Jr. Law Scholarship provides scholarship assistance to the Editor-in-Chief and the Managing Editor of the University of Memphis Law Review. Sam A. Myar, Jr. was a highly regarded Memphis attorney and Professor of Law who passed away at the untimely age of 39 in 1959. Mr. Myar was a partner at McCloy Myar & Wellford, where his concentration was in Corporate and Tax Law. His friends and partners established a scholarship in his name due to his generosity of spirit, wisdom, and dedication to pursuing justice for all. This scholarship was established in 1960 at Southern Law University, which is now known as the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. Mr. Myar was a graduate of the University of Virginia and received his law degree from the University of Chicago.

Pillars of Excellence Law Alumni Scholarship Endowment Fund provides scholarship assistance to a second- or third-year law school student based on financial need, undergraduate and law school grade point average, law school activities, and scholarship statement. Preference will be given to student members of the University of Memphis Alumni Association. The Law School Honors & Awards Committee screens the applications, selects the top three, and forwards them to the Law Alumni Scholarship Committee. The Law Alumni Scholarship Committee makes the final selection. The recipient will be invited to, and recognized at, a Law Alumni Chapter meeting or event.

Joseph Henry Shepherd Scholarship is made possible by an endowment fund established by Dorothy S. Shepherd. It is awarded on the basis of academic performance and financial need. Three scholarships are awarded annually, one to a member of each class.

Christian D. Soronen Award for Excellence in Oral Advocacy was established in memory of Christian Soronen, a 2007 graduate of University of Memphis Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law. The scholarship will be awarded to a third-year law student in good academic standing. The student must have been a member of a moot court travel team or selected to be a member of such a team during his or her third year. Third-year students who have been or will be a member of a mock trial team, alternative dispute resolution team and have competed in the Advanced Moot Court Competition are also eligible. Preference will be given to students who have excelled in inter-school and in-school competitions, members of the Moot Court Board, students enrolled in the Certificate in Advocacy program, and students who have otherwise demonstrated a commitment to the law school's advocacy program.

Ratner and Sugarmon Scholarship is awarded annually to a second- or third-year student who, in the opinion of the Honors and Awards Committee, best exemplifies a commitment to the needs of the underrepresented in society.

The Judge Kay Spalding Robilio, Victor, Sr., and Cecilia R. Robilio Law Scholarship is awarded annually to a third-year law student.

Jerome Rosengarten Scholarship is made possible by an endowment fund established by Sheldon, Shelli and Anna Rosengarten, the son, wife, and granddaughter of Jerome Rosengarten. Mr. Rosengarten's legal career included service in the Judge Advocate General Corps during World War II and 62 years as an attorney in Memphis, TN. This scholarship is awarded to a second- or third-year student with a minimum grade point average of 3.0, with preference given to a student who is interested in pursuing a career in property or real estate law.

BankTennessee John S. Wilder Law School Scholarship is funded by BankTennessee, and named in honor of Tennessee's late Lt. Governor John S. Wilder. Mr. Wilder graduated from the University of Memphis School of Law in 1957, served for forty-four years in the Tennessee Senate, including thirty-six years in the dual office of lieutenant governor and speaker, from January 1971 to January 2007. The scholarship in his name will be awarded to a third-year law student who, in the spirit of John S. Wilder, has a demonstrated commitment to public service and to enhancing the common good, is a resident of the State of Tennessee, and has been elected as a Section Editor for the Law Review of the Cecil C. Humphreys School of Law.

Wilford Hayes Gowen Scholarship Fund was established in memory of Wilford Hayes Gowen, through the Community Foundation of Western North Carolina, in memory of Wilford Hayes Gowen. Hayes Gowen, a graduate of Southern Law School in the late 1930's, founded the Law and Real Estate division for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. This scholarship is awarded to a second- or third-year law student on the basis of academic performance, financial need, and personal industriousness.

Tennessee Bar Foundation IOLTA Scholarship will be awarded to a third year student who is a Tennessee resident and in good academic standing. Additional consideration will be given to students with a demonstrated concern for public interest law.

Rice Amundsen & Caperton, PLLC Family Law Scholarship is given to a returning student who exemplifies academic merit and has excelled in the course Family Law. In addition, the recipient will be offered a paid summer intern position with Rice, Amundsen & Caperton PLLC for the summer following the awarding of the scholarship.

Nahon Saharovich & Trotz PLC Law Firm Scholarship is given to a student who has shown an interest and desire to advocate for personal injury victims. Recipients must be in the top third of their class and/or a member of Law Review and/or past, present, or prearranged service in a judicial office. Preference is given to rising 3L's.

Applicants may be requested to appear for an interview with representatives of the law school and the donors who provide the scholarship funding. Every attempt will be made to notify scholarship recipients by May 1 for the following academic year.

For additional information or questions about scholarships, please contact:

University of Memphis School of Law
1 N. Front Street
Memphis, TN 38103
901.678.5403
lawadmissions@memphis.edu