THE UNIVERSITY OF MEMPHIS

Department of
Supply Chain Management

Are you the type of person who loves to solve complex puzzles with lots of moving parts? Are you highly organized, detail-oriented and value data-driven decision making? Are you fascinated by the intersection of business, operations and engineering? If this sounds like you, then Supply Chain Management (SCM) is the major you're looking for.

Moving material and goods throughout a globally interconnected economy is an amazingly sophisticated activity that's a vital component of any modern business. By majoring in SCM, you can build a rewarding career with skills that are important for any industry. In this major, you'll immerse yourself into the multifaceted aspects of supply chain management: sourcing, procurement, operations, transportation and distribution of products. You'll study how to analyze and design supply chains, to identify and implement measures that improve supply chain performance to become a vital part of any organization.

Fogelman College of Business and Economics (FCBE) is the ideal training ground for a career in supply chain management, as we are located in the heart of Memphis, a global supply chain center!

A CAREER IN DEMAND

In recent years the critical importance of effective supply chain management has been demonstrated on an ongoing basis. Hardly a day passes without the report of a supply chain disruption. Supplier shortages, manufacturing interruptions and logistics challenges are commonplace.

In addition, with e-commerce on the rise, the way customers make and receive purchases continues to evolve, further complicating the process of moving products from development to delivery. Today, companies have an even greater need for qualified SCM professionals who are prepared to design and manage resilient supply chains that are capable of meeting these challenges.
